The Thumb-Print of a Shadow

By Margaret T. Applegarth

(Copyright, 1923)

THE Shadow rubbed his hands together softly. He smiled all over his dark brown face as he watched the money-lender do the trick called writing, covering white paper with curious hooks and curves. It was all very mysterious to him,—this writing business, but very delightful: for had he not paid the next-to-the-last instalment of the debt he owed on his tiny farm? One more small payment of hard-saved rupees and the farm would be his—no mortgage, no money-lender holding out an avaricious hand croaking spitefully: "Pay up! Pay up, or your farm becomes mine, you slow-poke!" Oh, how he had saved! Oh, what a nightmare it had been all these dreary years—the fear of losing that little farm forever! But now he was nearly free. One more payment and he would be entirely free. Free! Free! Free! He rubbed his hands together softly as he watched the hooks and curves of writing being scratched on paper, stating exactly how the transaction stood.

"There!" said the money-lender, "it's all ready for you to sign your name here."

Of course you are not expecting a poor ignorant Hindu Shadow to know how to write his own name! But there were ways known to money-lenders in the market-place, and the Shadow obediently dipped his thumb in a drop of ink, pressed it on the paper, and lo! the print of his thumb was a signature which no living man could fake. Secretly he was proud of that thumb print; proud, and relieved that his freedom from this staggering debt was so nearly won. He tucked the precious paper under his turban, and walked away, beaming. There had been so little to smile over in his life that when he met another man of his caste in the market-place he stopped him and made a boast of his recent accomplishment:

"Just look here," he chuckled, as he fumbled in his turban for the paper. "See where I signed my name? Well, that means that I shall soon be a free man, for this says that in one more payment I shall have paid my debt."

"All very fine! Very fine!" groaned the other farmer enviously, for was he not up to his very eyes in debt himself? And was it not going to be a bad year for crops? So the envy of one Shadow was very pleasant to the other Shadow as he walked toward his little thatched hut to boast even more fully in the secrecy of his family. Seven smiling Shadows laid themselves down on the earthen floor to sleep that night, and seven smiling Shadows rose up from that floor the next morning. Seven smiling Shadows spent a very laborious day hoeing and planting the poor little farm which had so small a payment between it and freedom; so the labor seemed less labor than usual until sundown, when two strange men appeared upon the scene. Men bustling with importance and arrogance, rubbing their brown hands together as our Shadow had rubbed his only yesterday. They were evidently pleased over something.

This department is conducted by Miss Margaret T. Applegarth. Communications to her may be addressed in care of The Baptist.

Said Stranger Number One: "Quite a fair little piece of property, on the whole, isn't it? Of course, I shall want to make certain changes."

"Oh, decidedly! Decidedly!" said Number Two, nodding his big scarlet turban. "You will doubtless make many changes. This poor fellow has been so ground down by debt that he hasn't . . ."

"This poor fellow?" repeated the Shadow to himself. "Can they mean me?" So he walked over toward them: "Sirs, I overheard your remarks, and I think you must have come to the wrong place, for this piece of property belongs to me. Puntiah is my name."

Stranger Number One laughed; a fat, disagreeable laugh: "Oh, is it? Puntiah, eh? Well, Puntiah, tomorrow morning early you must move out, for this little farm of yours is mine now. All mine. You understand?"

But no, Puntiah did not understand. "Yours?" he repeated. "But how can that be, when only yesterday afternoon I went to the money-lender in the market-place and paid off all but the last small payment of rupees, so that in just a few more months of hard saving the farm will be all free of debt. Think of that, will you? How I've saved! Why, I have a paper that the money-lender wrote. With my own eyes I saw him write it, and when the proper time came, I signed it just where he told me—with a thumb-print. I have the paper all safely hidden in the thatch of my house, very secret, sirs! But I will go and fetch it and show you that you have made a mistake in coming here." Puntiah hurried away.

"Poor fool!" said Stranger Number One.

"Simple old fellow! Almost too easy to swindle, isn't he?" said Stranger Number Two.

Presently Puntiah came running toward them with the precious document, and behind him trailed the six startled members of his family. "Oh, surely this is going to be all right!" their faithful brown eyes pleaded. "Oh, surely when you strangers see our highly important paper with its highly important thumb-print you will nod your heads and go away bowing apologetically."

But no! Stranger Number One read the paper and said: "This seems to be just as I thought, it gives me a clear title to the farm."

Stranger Number Two looked over his shoulder, and read also: "Yes, assuredly, all perfectly clear. The deed states that as he cannot hope to pay off the staggering debt he still owes, he, Puntiah, hereby and herewith forfeits all claim to this farm, this building and its contents and hands the same over to you; and in order to make it quite legal here is the thumb-print of Puntiah."

"No! No!" cried seven stricken Shadows, their voices sounding strangled and agonized. "It is not clear! Puntiah's debt is not staggering, it is small For only yesterday he carried to the money-lender a big basket of rupees. Oh, a surprising number of rupees, sirs—it took years to save them! We all helped! Oh, the meals we have not eaten, the clothes we have not bought in order to pay that old money-lender. He took them and counted them, didn't he, Puntiah?"

"Yes, and when he counted them he said: 'Now I will write you a receipt,' so when he wrote it I made my thumb-print. See, here it is! You don't suppose I would sign away my farm, do you? Not just when I had paid the savings of years to clear it from debt?"

The strangers said they did not know what he supposed he had done, but according to the document he certainly had signed it away. Seven stricken Shadows could hardly believe their ears.

With great dignity Puntiah took his paper into his own hands: "There is the law and the British government," he said.

"Oh, yes, there is the law and the British government," said the strangers "Tomorrow we will settle this trouble."

So they set an hour to meet with the authorities, and departed. A little later seven stricken Shadows lay down on the earthen floor, but they could not sleep; they rose up in the morning with great circles of anxiety around their eyes. Not in all India were there people as stricken as they.

Not in all India! Ah, well, that is hardly true, for at any moment of any day in India other ignorant Shadows are being played upon by other crafty money-lenders; other thumb-prints are innocently signing away other farms; other strangers are turning out other families. . . .

"Can't I even keep my grindstone?" wailed Puntiah's wife.

"Woman, the document says that this entire farm, with the house and all its contents belongs to me. Your husband has signed it. The law and the British government say that he has signed it. So nothing belongs to you. Nothing! You had better be gone!"

"Alas!" sighed the seven Shadows; and like a million others, before and since, they trailed unhappily down the dusty roadway with none to care and none to help. This whole business of writing—was it not a frightful thing? To think that a little paper plus a little ink plus a thumb-print was doing this heart-breaking thing to families every day, and no one to care. No one to help. Oh, those money-lenders! What enormously high interest they charged! How crafty they were! Even the law and the British government could not help. There was no one to help. . . . Seven Shadows trudged wearily down that dusty roadway, all on account of a thumb-print. Seven Shadows lay down in the fields under the stars that night, all on account of a thumb-print. Seven Shadows arose in the morning, homeless and hopeless and breakfastless, all on account of a thumb-print. And no one to help or to care!

But wait a minute, Puntiah, do not be quite so hopeless, for a man is coming briskly down the roadway, one of those white-faced men seen in town occasionally. Perhaps he is one of the British government men, or maybe one of those Christian sahibs about whom one heard such remarkable tales. Yes, that was a good guess; a Christian sahib with a voice much kinder than the British government voice. "Tell me all about it," he says.

So they tell him. It is not a new story; he has heard it over and over about other thumb-prints. There was nothing that could be done, for if a money-lender said he was writing a receipt when he was writing a deed, who was to know what he said when there was the tell-tale thumb-print. It was all very sad; but the sahib had one solution:

"I cannot give you back your farm or your lost rupees, Puntiah, for you have signed them away. But this I can do. I can put your boys and your girls in our mission schools so that they will learn to read and write. Then if there are ever any more documents to be signed, they can at least know what they are signing, and receipts will not be all the same as deeds in their eyes."

"Now that will be a good thing" nodded their father.

"Oh, very good," nodded the mother.

"Good for boys, anyhow," chuckled the sons.

"Good for girls!" smiled the shy daughters, not daring to dream that the wonder of an education was to be theirs. What a day it had been! Despair; and now this!

Then, in the kindness of his heart, the missionary let Puntiah build a small mat hut on a corner of the mission compound. He even gave him a job—raising the mission vegetables; so that today, if you should visit India, you might find him among the pumpkins and peppers from Monday to Saturday, but on Sunday mornings you will always find him in our little mission chapel singing with a grateful face to the God who can take the humblest of Shadows and turn them into self-respecting, self-supporting men and women through education and guidance and—love.

[Note: In line with the thought of "writing," we have chosen for the Young Reserve stories two delightful little talks to children from a new book by Doctor Shaw: "Jack-in-the-Pulpit," issued by the Judson Press. There are 51 of the story-talks, each full to the brim of interest and force. A word to the wise!

The Lead Pencil's Sermon

By Dr. Avery A. Shaw

(Copyright, 1923. The Judson Press. All rights reserved)

I found in a paper the other day a sermon by a Lead-pencil that I am sure the children will want to hear about.

The Lead-pencil began it by saying: 'Hello, Ronald! You and I are alike!"

"We're not. I'm not made of wood."

"No; but I'm made of two parts, wood and lead; and you of soul and body."

Ronald smiled. "Yes," he agreed, "and is the lead the best part of you or the wood?"

"Both are needed if I am to be of any use in the world," returned the Lead-pencil. "The lead is necessary and is the most valuable part of me—much the most valuable; but the wood covering is very useful, too."

Ronald nodded. He was amused, and began to think perhaps he and the Lead-pencil were alike after all.

"What's your work in the world?" he asked, putting down his baseball bat for a moment.

"To make marks. What's yours?"

"Perhaps to make marks, too."

"I make marks with the most precious part of myself, the inside part—the lead," continued the Lead-pencil. "What do you make your marks with?"

Ronald thought of his batting average and his hockey score, of the prizes he had won, and at last he shook his head:

"I'm not sure," he said; "but," he added, "when you were first bought in the shop you were of no use at all, you couldn't even make a mark."

"That's true," agreed the Lead-pencil. "What could you do when you were a baby? But I've been sharpened since. Have you?"

Ronald considered. Were his lessons, the rules he had to keep, the games he played, all part of the sharpening? What kind of a mark was he getting ready to make?

"There's one difference between us," said the Lead-pencil, "I'm old; I've made a great many marks in my time. Angry words have been written with me, and kind ones too, I'm glad to say. I'd like to see them all together; they would make the history of my life."

Ronald considered once more. Was he, too, making marks all the time? "Your marks can be rubbed out," he said.

"Yes," returned the Lead-pencil, "Can you rub out the marks you make?"

Ronald did not answer, his eyes were on a name.

"You're three parts," he said, "not two; there's the name of the maker on you in gold letters."

"So there is," agreed the Lead-pencil. "What about you? Do you also bear the name of your maker?"

What Is Written On You?

A little while ago I heard a lovely story about a pastor's wife who went to call on a sick parishioner. One day while she waited until the nurse was ready for her to see the patient, the hostess's little girl, who had been walking curiously round and round the visitor, suddenly asked if she might climb up on her lap, please!

"Indeed you may!" smiled the pastor's wife, lifting her up in her arms. "And now, tell me why you wanted to come?"

"It's this way," said little Miss Five-Years-Old, confidingly, "the last time you were here mother said she just loved to have you come, because if ever there was a lady with the word sympathy written all over her face it was you! So I would like to see the word, please."

Dear Friend,

"Miss Margaret Applegarth,

I always knew I loved the Chimney Corner but when you wrote me that my poem had won a prize I almost turned a somersalt or however you spell it. I am so glad now that out of all the books you let me take a choice of I chose "India Inklings," for it is simply great. I think Manikam is some boy, with all those questions he keeps asking the missionary. My mother is a Presbyterian so she takes Inklings to her Sunday-school class every Sunday and tells a chapter. They will know all about India, won't they? I guess you won't mind their being Presbyterians instead of Baptists, will you? With just about forty 'leven thank yous,

Very respectfully yours

What are Some Reforms that Call for Our Help? Luke 3:7-14.

This is a day of reforms, and we have all sorts of would-be reformers. There are those who think the modern world is making progress too fast, and they would tie it down to the days of the ox-cart. Some think we are going too fast in the matters of education, and they would bring us back to the days of the little red schoolhouse where they were taught reading, writing and arithmetic. Some think there is great danger of America becoming entangled in world affairs. They would thus bring about a reform by adhering to a policy seclusion or exclusion.

What Are Some of the Reforms?

1. Inside the church. Yes, there are reforms in which young people can help. In many cases, the whole educational program of the church needs to be made over. Perhaps there is need for graded instruction. Perhaps there is need for a leadership that knows how to lead. Perhaps there is need for training classes in which teachers should be trained for effective teaching. Perhaps there should be a study of the real life situations of the young people of the church, and then materials and programs put into effect that could meet those needs. What a pity that we are always trying to solve the problems of the young life of the churches, from the point of view of the adult! Especially is this a pity in the case of so many of our splendid city churches now dominated by a rural type of mind. The leadership does not, cares not, and can never see the needs from the city point of view. The only solution is to grow a leadership that understands the problems of city life. Perhaps those who are entrusted with the sacred duty of planning programs should also remember that there are small rural and village churches where the program for the city church is an impossibility.

Again, the young people can reform the ministry of the preachers. Often it is dry and uninteresting, simply because the young people have held aloof. If your preacher is a poor one, set yourselves to the task of making a good one out of him. If he hasn't the stuff in him, of course, it may be necessary to suggest a change on account of his wife's health. A better plan would be to tell him the plain truth that he is a failure. Maybe he would have sense enough to try to overcome his failure.

There is need for a genuine reformation of the prayer-meeting services of the churches. The young people are responsible in a measure. Of course, none of us likes a corpse. Neither do we care always for a prayer service where we pat each other on the back, tell how good we feel, get outselves all "heated up" and yet, do nothing. I think prayer meetings would be of great value if, after our emotions are stirred to the depths, each and every one be asked to tackle some of the big jobs of the church and of human living.

2. Outside the church. There is the problem of the liquor traffic. It would not be much of a problem at all, if only those who profess to be Christian would live and vote like Christians. We are soon to see a generation who have never looked upon a saloon. But there are yet a number of scalawags, thieves and thugs, aliens and un-Americans who would fasten again upon us the lines of the old gang. We are, of course, done with the thing, even though states like New York give all sorts of encouragement to bootleggers and lawbreakers. Of course, we are going to outlaw war with all of its attendant evils. We are going in for some form of governmental reforms that will cause us as a great nation to assume our rightful share of obligation to a needy world. Why mention others? Let's get busy with some of the above, right where we live!

Philadelphia Doings

My Dear Mr. White:

As you probably know, Philadelphia B. Y. P. U. has been down (but not out) ever since the war, and this year this committee was organized and told to take the largest delegation to Boston that has ever gone from Philadelphia to the annual convention, by the president. While the enthusiasm is not as high as it should be, I am sure we are going to take a bigger crowd than has gone for a good many years.

While the numbers were not so high at the "tea party" held on April 16, I am sure the quality was there. We had about seventy-five young people out and all said they enjoyed the entire program; so that helped considerably. The program was as follows: We opened with several hymns used at the St. Paul Convention a great deal; this was followed by prayer by one of the ministers present; then the chairman outlined the purpose of the meeting, how the convention could help the city organization, the individual society and each individual; then the trip was explained and the party was taken as far as the Copley-Plaza Hotel (Philadelphia's headquarters); at this point the crowd was taken through Boston by pictures of the city (the slides having been secured from the Boston committee); the trip was followed by an imaginary visit to the Convention Hall, and several young people at this time spoke on "Conventions I've Attended"; following this was a description of the program, by the chairman, of the 1923 Convention. Rev. George C. Horter of the Eleventh Church then spoke on his experiences, the reasons we should go, etc., and packed about an hour's talk or more in a very entertaining and joyous fifteen minutes. After a closing prayer we adjourned for a social period.

Delegates were registered as they passed out the door and literature on the convention was distributed. While only twelve of those present signed the registration cards provided, we have secured a list of about fifty "prospects" and hope to have their dollars before very long.

This committee is also preparing a booklet which will be distributed within a couple of weeks concerning Boston and the trip, etc.

J. WILLARD MCCROSSEN, Chairman.

Burma

By J. Herbert Cope

Again it has been proven that figures do not always tell the truth. After the great revivals and mass movements it was discouraging to read of only a 20 per cent increase in the number of Christians in the decade. But now it comes to light that there is a determined and concerted effort on the part of the Hindus to keep down the Christian figures while padding theirs. Thus one can add a generous figure to those given in the Indian census and not be far wrong. Even at that the Hindus show a net loss along with the Animists.

The first meeting of the new reform council in Burma has been held. There are about 100 members, seventy of whom are elected by the people. Of this number in turn eleven are Christian, the ten Karens and one Indian. The only thing which developed was a flood of questions on various matters which were answered duly by the ministers. But as one Christian Karen said, one could see the answers were written by the British subordinate to the Burman minister so it looks as if the British still have something to say. But it is a good thing to have things aired now and then, publicity never hurt any cause, except war. But the people are going to exert their influence. The Indian council not long ago adjourned as a protest against an action by the India Secretary. This in London would lead to the resignation of the ministry. Unfortunately for the Indians, the secretary is responsible to the throne, not to the India Council.

Associational meetings in Burma are often used for evangelistic purposes. Doctor Commings writes that at their last gathering they had great meetings every night for the non-Christians when four or five hundred heard the gospel. The Karen band was present and added much to the meetings. Then one day, with the band leading, a parade was formed and street meetings held in various parts of the town. The meetings of the association were held during the day. Bands are almost a necessity in the Karen stations. All the larger ones boast their musical organizations and they assist the missionary in evangelistic work regularly. While even in far off Kengtung they have organized a band and are making progress. Perhaps some of you will hear a concert by them through your "etherphones" some night.

The birds are flying north again. A large number of Burma missionaries are taking their sabbatical year this spring, eight men in all I believe. This leaves stations undermanned once more. So few were sent back last fall and fewer still new recruits came out, that things are serious. One wonders when those taking furlough will return. It looks as if the debt will be increased and that means another cut and a shortening of the lines and perhaps worse. At any rate the churches will be blessed by this large number coming home and the members will learn more of the field and the work.

Miss Eastman of Toungoo recently celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of her arrival in Burma. What a long time on the mission field! Think of influencing so many generations for good. Her work has been very quiet and is little known but the Karens know it and have been blessed by the life she has lived here. Nor is her work finished; she still continues and will have many more useful years.

Southern California Convention

By James P. Cadman

The thirty-second annual meeting of the Southern California Convention was held May 8-11 at the First Church, San Diego, of which Rev. P. O. Belden is pastor. All the sessions were well attended, interesting and helpful.

At its organization in 1892 the convention had 4,357 members and gave $12,000 for missions. Now there are 115 churches with 32,000 members who last year gave over $569,000 for missions. During the past year seven new churches were organized and 1,800 baptisms administered. The total attendance was 716 and the churches represented, 109. Judge Robert H. Scott was elected president for next year and Rev. C. D. Eddy, secretary.

The first day's sessions were allotted to the Woman's Mission Society and the Ministers' Conference. The former organization was presided over by Mrs. M. G. Edmands, Mrs. F. L. Blowers and Mrs. C. M. Carter. Addresses were made by Mrs. R. R. West and returned missionaries. O. S. Russell presided at the Ministers' Conference and an address was made by Chas. L. White.

During the convention, O. P. Gifford gave a number of sermons on various subjects. In the evening of the first day addresses were made by F. O. Belden and president W. W. Catherwood. The annual convention sermon was delivered by S. F. Langford. A feature of the evening was the social supper given by the young people of the church.

On the second day, and throughout convention sessions, Rev. W. W. Catherwood, president, presided. An address of welcome was made by Mr. John J. Bacon, mayor of San Diego. Reports were then given by W. F. Harper for the board; treasurer's report, George E. Reid; promotion department, S. J. Skevington. A. W. Rider presided at a conference of the promotion board. Addresses were made by J. A. Francis on "Our Jerusalem and Judea Testimony" and by J. D. Springton and C. L. White. Reports were given of the San Diego Mission Society, by L. P. Valentine; of the Los Angeles Mission Society, by J. B. Fox; of the Woman's Mission Society, by Miss Mary A. Greene; of the brotherhoods, by Judge R. H. Scott; and of Atherton Villa, by E. E. Ford. A feature of the evening was the annual layman's banquet at a down-town hotel, attended by over 200 persons.

On the third day, which was announced as missionary day, addresses were given on the negro, by W. R. Carter; on Mexico, by E. R. Brown and Miss Martha Blackmore; on Burma, by Mrs. E. B. Roach; on Africa, by J. Royal Dye; on India, by Theodore Fieldbrave; and on Assam, by C. H. Tilden. At the close of Mr. Dye's address, a voluntary collection of $150 was contributed to him by the audience for his work. All of these missionary talks were informing and inspiring.

On the fourth day, promptly at 9 o'clock, about 600 of the delegates and visitors assembled at the pier at the foot of Broadway and were conveyed on tugs across the bay to the U. S. naval air plant at North Island to witness stunt flying that had been arranged for them as guests of the officers. The visitors saw the plane which recently flew from New York City to San Diego in twenty-seven hours. This treat was arranged for the delegates by Rev. Floy T. Barkman, the convention's representative among the U. S. service men in the port.

The topic for the afternoon was Christian education in the home, local church, vacation Bible schools and in Redlands University. Reports and addresses were given by F. Durham, S. W. Cummings, George E. Joy, J. H. Montgomery and H. E. Marsh. A missionary drama, entitled "Gifts of the Wise Men" written by Mrs. O. S. Ellis was enacted. At the invitation of President Catherwood, assisted by Amy Lee Stockton, over thirty young people, including a few adults, came forward for reconsecration and for devotion to missionary or other religious work. Thus closed one of the best sessions ever held by the Southern California Convention.

Mention should be made that the chapel car of the Publication Society was used in holding services for three nights on Seventh street in the city. It was also used on the evening of the fourth day at the Mexican mission in Tijuana, Mexico, where twenty-five Mexicans signed a pledge in which they renounced Romanism and asked for Christian baptism.

Delaware State Convention

By Samuel C. Welsh

The seventh annual meeting of the Delaware state convention met with the First Swedish Church, Wilmington, May 2-4.

All of the sessions were inspirational, helpful and practical. Rev. Charles A. Walker, Dover, conducted a consecration service and delivered an address at the opening meeting on Wednesday.

On Thursday afternoon, May 3, the woman's missionary organization of the state held its meeting. Mrs. O. Grey Hutchison, president, presided. Miss Luella Adams of the Christian Center, Rankin, Pa., and Miss Mabelle Rae McVeigh gave excellent addresses.

The convention sermon was delivered on Thursday evening by Rev. A. F. Williamson, the new pastor of Bethany Church, Wilmington.

The speaker Friday morning was Dr. James H. Franklin, who gave the convention a new vision of our work. On Friday afternoon there were three splendid addresses, by Rev. Arthur B. Strickland, on "Stressing Soul Winning in the Local Church;" Rev. George Boddis on "Modern Tendencies in the Christian Church," and Rev. W. L. Pettengill of Wilmington on "May We Expect Universal Peace?" The closing address on Friday night was given by Dr. F. Howard Taylor, son of Dr. Hudson Taylor of the China Inland Mission.

Idaho Convention

By W. H. Tolliver

On May 8-10, the Idaho Convention was in session in the First Church, Blackfoot, of which Rev. E. O. Butler is the beloved pastor.

The annual opening sermon was preached by Doctor Tolliver of Twin Falls from the words, "Thy Kingdom Come."

Rev. W. A. Shanks, state secretary, and three state field men, Rev. A. L. Black, Rev. J. E. Kanarr and Rev. R. L. Mills, put before the delegates a program which gave an excellent résumé of past experiences and achievements, a survey of present conditions and an optimistic presentation of future plans and prospects.

The layman's session Wednesday afternoon was presided over by Mr. W. A. Buis of Boise.

One important feature was the adoption of a statement on fundamentals. This had been recommended by the state board, then passed by the ministers' conference in session on the first day of the convention. This conference, of which Doctor Spriggs of Nampa was president, adopted the recommendation with slight amendments and passed it on to the convention. It was a good strong statement of the fundamentals of our faith and was passed by both the ministers' conference and the convention practically unanimously.

Speakers from outside the state who brought powerful messages were, Dr. W. H. Bowler, Dr. and Mrs. C. R. Manley and Dr. G. Clifford Cress.

Keen interest, deep consecration and unswerving determination characterized the convention from beginning to end.

The Arizona Convention

By W. B. Percival

The thirty-first annual session of the Arizona State Convention was held in the First Church at Douglas, May 9-13. It was generally acknowledged by the delegates present to be one of the most hopeful and encouraging gatherings held in the state for many years.

The convention was marked by a growing spirit of unity throughout the sessions. When we first gathered, there were a number of divergent opinions in regard to policy, but by prayer and conference and a spirit of consecration unanimity was practically accomplished, and the churches are prepared to go forward in a spirit of cooperation. At the convention and ministers' conference resolutions were adopted clearly stating belief in the inspiration of the scriptures and reaffirming acceptance of the New Testament as the sufficient rule of faith and practice.

The opening day was given over to the pastors' conference with addresses on prayer life, combined Sunday morning service, cooperation in the local church, power and the place of gospel songs and the authority of the scriptures. At the women's conference addresses were given by a missionary from the Philippine Islands and by a former missionary worker among the Indians of our state.

One of the encouraging features of the convention was the report of the work among the Indians of Arizona. Some of these Indians themselves were present at the convention and gave ringing testimonies to the power of the gospel in their lives.

Of the 551 baptisms reported for the year, more than 100 were from the Mexicans of the state among whom Rev. R. Marion Garrett, of Phoenix, and others, have been doing such splendid work.

The spirit of devotion was kept to the fore during the convention by the daily inspirational addresses of Rev. C. T. Garnett of Bisbee. The denominational program was presented from many angles, and the delegates manifested determination to stand by the denominational leaders and the missionary program. The presence of Dr. Chas. L. White of New York, Rev. E. R. Brown of the Mexican work, Dr. C. H. Tilden of Assam, and Rev. J. D. Springston of Los Angeles, as well as Rev. H. Q. Morton and Rev. L. M. Darnell of Arizona, enabled our delegates to have first hand contact with all phases of our work. It was generally agreed that the two outstanding addresses of the convention

Ohio State Convention

By Robert W. Peirce

With songs of praise led by Rev. Clarence M. Eddy, of Granville, and devout prayers by Rev. S. A. Sherman, New Lexington, and Dr. G. R. Robbins of Columbus, Ohio Baptists opened their ninety-eighth convention at the First Church, Cambridge, May 14-17. The warm spirit in which Rev. A. R. Stark, pastor of the entertaining church, welcomed the delegates, and the cheerful tone in which President Rhodes responded, portended an atmosphere of brotherly love and good will which pervaded every session of the convention.

The addresses were all of a highly devotional character. The annual sermon preached by Rev. F. W. Sweet, Cleveland, set forth some of the weaknesses of modern civilization, pointing to Christ as the only solution for all our ills. The noon hour of prayer each day was in charge of Rev. I. N. De Puy, of Lakewood. The talks of Dr. Joseph Taylor of China challenged his audience to a more earnest consecration to the work of the mission fields. Rev. W. H. Geistweit, who recently assumed the pastorate of the First Church at Dayton, brought a ringing appeal when he spoke on "Our Task." Mrs. O. R. Judd, of Brooklyn, outlined the progress that was being made on the home fields, while Miss Elizabeth Vickland, of Assam, made a plea for the work in foreign lands. Rev. B. F. Lamb, executive secretary of the Ohio Council of Churches, spoke on the need of cooperation of Baptists with other denominations to defeat the foes of righteousness in the state.

Mr. W. A. Holmes, of Granville, presented the report of the department of religious and missionary education, and characterized the year just closing as one of gradual forward movements in the field of religious education. Rev. M. W. Smith, of Norwood, discussed the subject of week-day religious education. Rev. C. W. Atwater, of Cincinnati, who is successfully working out a plan of organization and administration in his own church school, spoke on "Correlation of the Forces and Methods in Religious Education." Prof. George Platt Knox, of Denison University, insisted upon a four-square development of every healthy boy and girl, and emphasized the demand of young people for honest play, exercise and physical development, for mental growth, and a corresponding religious development. At the session of the Ohio Baptist Education Society, an address was given by Rev. Clarence M. Eddy.

Rev. W. H. Thompson, director of rural work, reported that during the past year addresses had been made at association meetings; conferences of pastors had been held; and fields were visited with a view to arouse interest in the possibilites of effective work in town and country fields. After an address by Rev. Clive McGuire, of St. Paris, in which he showed how the country community has been revolutionized by the rural free delivery, consolidation of schools, good roads, automobiles, daily newspapers, radio, etc., a symposium was held in which pastors discussed the question "How I Do It On My Field."

The report of the board of managers set forth the diversity of the activities of the state convention and pointed out the need of stewardship and the value of cooperation. The treasurer's report, read by Dr. F. B. Wiley, revealed a total of $101,122.60 received, with various sources of income, and after all expenditures, a balance of $4,561.93. Dr. V. S. Phillips, of Columbus, presented the report of the Francis Wayland Foundation, which showed a large increase over the two preceding years. The report of the committee on evangelism was read by Rev. Millard Brelsford, of Cleveland. Emphasis was placed on the group meetings of pastors held week-ends over the state under the guidance of Rev. C. H. Stull, state director of evangelism. The report also showed that superintendents have been maintained in three out of the four districts throughout the year. Reporting for the work among foreign speaking peoples, Rev. Joseph H. Lloyd, of Youngstown, stated that much of the work was now either self-supporting, or has been taken over by various city mission societies. Mr. Frederick Moore, Middletown, made the report of the committee on negro work. The report of the state board of promotion was made by Rev. F. G. Cressey, of Granville, who was optimistic although only $464,500 had thus far been paid. He stated that there was a shortage of only $33,000 from the churches themselves and that 171 churches had given more the past year than the previous year. The obituary report was presented by Rev. S. P. Stapp, of Wellston, memorializing thirty-five members in the denomination who had passed on since last anniversary. Among them were eight ministers: Dr. Joel B. Slocum, of Dayton; Dr. Joseph A. Bennett, Philadelphia, Pa., formerly of Newark; Dr. R. B. McDaniel, Martins Ferry; Rev. F. B. Rundell, Perry; Dr. J. S. Detweiler, Tarrytown, N. Y., formerly of Granville; Dr. Robert B. Smith, Springfield; Dr. Henry Brandt, Troy; Rev. S. S. Denny, Gallia County. A large number of new pastors were welcomed by Rev. W. E. Bridge, of Canton. At the women's meetings the work of the various societies was outlined and missionaries were introduced. Ohio reported 207 W. W. G's with an enrollment of 3,803 young women, and 93 C. W. C. bands with a membership of 2,300 boys and girls.

The convention voted to accept the invitation to go to Middletown next year and Rev. A. D. Hilton, Marietta, was invited to preach the convention sermon. Mr. E. H. Rhodes, of Toledo, was re-elected to his eighth year as president of the convention, with Rev. F. L. Fraser, of Newark, vice-president. There were between 400 and 500 delegates and visitors registered representing more than 225 churches.

MASSACHUSETTS

On May 18 a council met in the Chelmsford Street Church, Lowell, to examine Rev. Arthur B. Clarke, formerly a minister of the Adventist denomination. As a result it was voted to recommend to the church that a public service of recognition be given the candidate.

The First Church, Randolph, has received forty-seven new members by baptism during the year. At the May communion service, the pastor, Rev. Eugene S. Philbrook, gave the hand of fellowship to fourteen. As the result of a successful series of meetings conducted by Evangelist W. Gellotly of Boston, about 200 persons took a definite stand for Christ and the church has been greatly revived. Pastor Philbrook has the full cooperation of a united and harmonious church.

VERMONT

A council of the Windham County Association met May 15 at the South Newfane Church to consider the ordination of Sidney D. Cahoon. Rev. C. O. Dunham of East Dover was elected clerk, and Secy. W. A. Davison, moderator. The ordination sermon was preached by Rev. Clark T. Brownell of Brattleboro.

CONNECTICUT

The second annual meeting of the Women's Mission Society was held at Calvary Church, New Haven, May 10. The officers are: Pres., Miss Mary P. Howard; vice-pres., Mrs. A. L. Mulloy and Mrs. C. S. Carter; secy., Miss E. Louise Carey, treas., Mrs. A. J. Ward. An interesting and profitable program was given. Addresses were given by Dr. Edward Hume, head of the Yale Medical University of China, Miss Elizabeth Krasnye, and a Chinese student of Yale. Reports of the various officers and committees indicated increasing interest in all phases of the work. However, the crowning achievement of the year was the part Connecticut women played in the Continuation campaign. Although the quota was $40,000, $47,529 was raised. The society declared itself ready to combat any propaganda of the Anti-Volstead League.

NEW YORK

A council of the churches of Monroe County was held May 17 to consider the ordination of Seibe S. Feldman, a graduate of the German department of Rochester Seminary. Prof. F. W. C. Meyer, of the same department, preached the ordination sermon. Alfred E. Isaac was moderator and F. G. Reynolds clerk.

On May 6, Rev. A. T. Mercer, pastor of the Hilton Church, gave the hand of fellowship to thirty-seven new members, seventeen of whom he had baptized. Eight candidates are awaiting the ordinance. These additions were secured without any special evangelistic meetings.

The dedication of the new auditorium of the Emmanuel Church, Buffalo, took place May 6, with special services. Rev. Samuel Russell, pastor of the First Church, delivered the address. For a number of years the membership had considered the advisability of replacing the old frame auditorium with a modern brick structure to conform with the architecture of the Sunday-school and chapel sections. For various reasons action was delayed until last year, and as a result the new auditorium, costing $45,000, was built. With such equipment and the progressive spirit of the present pastor, Rev. W. Norman Liddy, Emmanuel Church should become one of the strongest Christian forces in Buffalo.

Rochester Commencement

Although the student body reached a total of eighty-three this year, the graduating class was not one of the largest, since it numbered but seventeen, fourteen of whom received the degree of bachelor of divinity and three the diploma.

This anniversary marks a new epoch in the life of the seminary by virtue of the retirement from active service on the faculty of Prof. J. W. A. Stewart, for the past twenty years dean and professor of Christian ethics and pastoral theology; and of Prof. John Phillips Silvernail, for the past thirty-two years professor of elocution. There will be three additions to the faculty: Prof. John H. Vichert, of Colgate Seminary, who becomes professor of practical theology and public speaking; Prof. Earle B. Cross, now with the foreign mission board, who becomes professor of Hebrew language and literature; and Prof. Frank O. Erb of the Publication Society, Philadelphia, who becomes professor of religious education.

President Barbour preached the baccalaureate sermon, and Doctor Merton S. Rice, of the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church, Detroit, addressed the Genesee Ministers' Conference. Doctor Frederick Lynch of New York gave a characteristic and effective discussion of "The Church and the New World Order." At the social occasion, held at the Baptist Temple Monday evening, the speakers were Rev. Charles N. Arbuckle of Newton Centre and Rev. William A. Cameron of the Bloor Street Church, Toronto.

At the alumni association meeting Secretary Lipphard traced the contribution of Rochester to world evangelism. The association elected Doctor Joseph Taylor of West China as its president for the current year.

The final address was given at the alumni dinner by Doctor Frank B. Bachelor of Kalamazoo.

President Barbour has entered upon the ninth year of his administration at Rochester. The year just closed has been one of solid achievement.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

At the annual meeting of the Ridley Park Church, reports showed twenty-three members received, thirteen by baptism; more money raised for current expenses than any previous year; a 40 per cent increase in the Sunday-school enrolment and the pastor's salary raised $300. Rev. Wayland Zwayer is in the third year of his pastorate.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

Doctor A. J. Meek has begun the twelfth year of his pastorate with the New Kensington Church. During the eleven years the membership has grown from 120 to 465, a new edifice was erected and the average attendance of the Bible school has grown from 90 to 325. There is every indication that there will be continued growth.

The Temple Church, of which Rev. A. Schade is pastor, undertook to raise $2,850 to liquidate its indebtedness and $3,500 to paint and decorate the church building. The amount secured in pledges was $4,545.

The young people and Sunday-school workers of the Erie and Ontario district of German Baptist Churches recently held a two-day institute at the Central Church, Erie. Two hundred and sixty-three delegates were present from churches in Rochester, Buffalo, Folsondale, Cleveland and Pittsburgh. The primary aim of the institute was to bring the young people of the denomination into closer fellowship. Speakers were Prof. F. W. C. Meyer and Mr. H. P. Donner. Officers of the district organization are: President, Doctor Bodenbender; vice-president, J. A. Zurn, Jr.; secretary, Miss Frieda Sayenga; treasurer, Miss Olga Fisher. The next meeting will be held with the Temple Church, Pittsburgh.

Mississippi Valley

OHIO

April was a banner month for the Westwood Church, Cincinnati. Financial receipts, baptisms and the attendance at Sunday school and church services reached its highest mark. Pledges and cash to the amount of $1,621 were received to cancel a standing indebtedness. This exceeded the amount needed by $317. Rev. Andrew M. Smith is pastor.

INDIANA

The Baptist Temple, Logansport, burned its $15,000 mortgage May 20. The membership is united in a program to increase the Sunday-school equipment and to reconstruct the parsonage. The cost will be about $10,000. Work will begin the last of June. Rev. M. C. Tunison is pastor.

ILLINOIS

On May 6, Pastor E. M. Griffin of the First Church, Maywood, welcomed forty-three new members.

KANSAS

Rev. Earl Riney became pastor of the First Church, Coffeyville, in November. Since that time 140 new members have been received and the attendance at the Sunday school has reached the 700 mark. The church is considering the erection of a new Sunday-school building.

IOWA

Rev. James MacOwan Wilson, who was pastor of the church at What Cheer for nearly two and a half years, recently resigned to accept a call to the First Church, Lake City. He will begin his new work June 3. Any minister who is interested in becoming pastor of the What Cheer Church may communicate with Mr. A. E. Nelson.

MICHIGAN

Rev. A. M. Conklin, pastor of the church at Rockford, recently preached his farewell sermon. He began his work in Rockford in 1913. At that time the church had no parsonage, the building was in need of repairs and the congregation was small. During his pastorate the church edifice was remodeled, two additions and a parsonage were built and the membership increased in all departments. The missionary budget which formerly was from $12 to $20 is now $200. Mr. Conklin intends to spend considerable time in mission work in the state.

OREGON

The McMinnville Church voted May 10 to proceed with the erection of the Sunday school unit of a $100,000 building. During the year 123 new members were received, the school passed the 500 mark, and the missionary apportionment, amounting to $6,000, was paid in full. Rev. C. L. Trawin is pastor.

A council of the Umpqua Association was called recently for the purpose of ordaining the pastor of the First Church, Springfield, Edgar B. Luther. Rev. J. H. Irish was elected moderator, and Rev. H. B. Iler, clerk. Rev. C. E. Dunham of Eugene preached the ordination sermon.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

On April 15 the new building of the Willits Church was dedicated. Rev. E. R. Couch, of Ukiah, preached the dedicatory sermon. At the evening service, an evangelistic campaign was begun under the leadership of Director A. V. Willey. The former one-room, unattractive structure was utilized to full advantage. Five class rooms, suitable also for social purposes, and the pastor's study were built on the front of the old building which was covered with stucco and redecorated inside at a cost of $5,000. The building fund was started ten years ago and continued to grow slowly until the coming of Rev. C. I. Ford as pastor last July. He summoned Director C. H. Bancroft last October for an efficiency institute. Definite plans and a thorough canvass for funds were made.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Rev. E. M. Hulett has recently completed the seventh year of his pastorate at the First Church, Whittier. During these years 361 new members have been received; the total expenditures of the church have grown from $2,600 to $18,000 per year; and the property value has increased from $8,500 to $80,000.

On his return from Berkeley after attending the commencement exercises at the Divinity School, where his two daughters had taken a post-graduate course for foreign missionary service, Doctor Samuel J. Skevington, pastor of the First Church, Hollywood, found that the church had voted to raise his salary to $5,000 and to call an assistant pastor at a salary of $2,500. The church has three student volunteers ready to sail, but the denomination cannot send them this year because of lack of funds.

B. F. Martin

An Appreciation

By D. C. Henshaw

Wednesday, April 25, after 34 years of preaching, Brother B. F. Martin was called from the active pastorate of Immanuel Baptist Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., to the higher place our Master has appointed.

Last June he suffered a hemorrhage and another in November, which weakened him somewhat throughout the year, but he held to his work and seemed to improve.

He preached twice on Sunday April 22, and did considerable pastoral work up to Wednesday evening. He was calling with his wife in the afternoon, returned, rested a little and was about to eat supper when the final stroke of apoplexy came, at the close of a well-spent day. In a few minutes he was unconscious and died at 9:15 p. m. The whole day's work was done.

WILLITS CHURCH

A day or two after I arrived at Morgan Park about Sept. 1, 1889, I met Brother Martin who also had come to enter the Theological Seminary.

In the thirty-four years since that time I have visited him and his location in six of nine pastorates, sometimes preaching for him, and he returned by helping me on different occasions.

He was a good preacher of the great evangel; bravely personal in applying it to himself and to others. In theology he was Spurgeonic; in preaching, expository, clear and forceful; in modes of thought, direct, self-tried and vigorous; in life, clean and energetic. He was a charming friend because he was well-read, his points of view well-adjusted, and his conversation ready. Withal he had a sweetly humorous vein and a power to see a droll side to otherwise very prosaic affairs. He was quite remarkable in combining good preaching with good pastoral work.

His pastorates were all successful, averaged four years and were at Lostant, Ill., where he was ordained, Berwyn, Oconomowoc, Wis., Joliet, Moline, Humboldt Park, Rogers Park, and So. 7th St. Springfield, Illinois, and Fort Wayne, Ind. A host of friends in all of these places will feel the sense of loss but particularly in Fort Wayne.

Christian Citizenship Program

By A. J. Gregg

The Christian citizenship training program has been in use for three years. Its growth has been largely due to the use of it by associations and churches which have become interested because of demonstrations of possibilities they have seen the association make.

The program is now in its second stage of development, in that not only local churches but state, sectional and national groups representing the various denominations are becoming interested in using it.

The fact that the fundamental relationships of a boy's life—his home, his church, his school and his group—are fully recognized in the activity requirements of the program has been the strong feature in winning its support by church bodies.

The activities which go "to make up the day" for a boy are the basic activities of the program. Certain tests are required of him, wherein the standard for his home relationships is set; standards for the work which he does every day in school; standards for the motives guiding his attendance and participation in church and Sunday school, as well as standards for such habit-forming activities as the use of money, development of self-control through health habits, the observance of daily devotions and right habits of daily reading.

The things which boys like to do, both as individuals and as groups, furnish the appeal of the program to the boy. In carrying through its activities under the guidance of leaders, it is expected that boys will develop character through team play, excellence of effort and excellence of attainment in a great variety of situations.

The best results which have come from the use of the program are in communities where the churches of the city, in cooperation with the Young Men's Christian Association, have gone forward to a common use of the program with both younger and older boys. An increase in interest and attendance at Sunday school is reported wherever the program has been tried in this team fashion.

The Comrade program has within it possibilities of challenging the older boys of Sunday schools throughout the city to solve the problem of maintaining the interest and increasing the participation of older boys in Sunday-school and church work. Through an interchurch council of older boys, elected by the group of boys from each individual church, these comrade activities can be coordinated on a city-wide basis, so as to make the program a medium for attracting older boys throughout the community to participate in things which fellows of their age like to do.

Say It with Books

By Helen B. Montgomery

WHY is not a book one of the very best presents to be found? To the pleasure of receiving it is added the lengthened pleasure of reading it, and the pleasure of reminiscence. Books do not grow old and feeble along with ourselves. If they are the right kind they only grow stronger and more lusty with the years.

So here are some suggestions for your book list. You want to remember your pastor? He would just love a book. In fact, the average pastor is starving for books. Why not give him a book shower? There is the new "Harmony of the Gospels," by A. T. Robertson of Louisville Theological Seminary (Doran.) This a superb piece of work. It is scholarly, clear, has wonderful analytical outlines, tables that enable you to find any passage in the Harmony, an illuminating series of explanatory notes on points of special difficulty, a list of the parables and miracles of Jesus, a list of Old Testament quotations in the Gospels, and of the sayings of Jesus preserved in various traditions and manuscripts. Any one, pastor or Sunday-school teacher, or Christian worker, would rejoice to get this book.

Two books of Glover's are to be recommended, if you have a really scholarly pastor. "Progress in Religion to the Christian Era" is a remarkable book. With a wealth of scholarship that makes the task seem easy, Doctor Glover threads his way through the religious ideas and ideals of ancient Greece and Rome, of the Orient, of the Jews after the exile. He discusses Homer, Plato, the Greek World after Alexander, all with equal assurance and illumination. The purpose of the book is to show the background of inherited ideas against which the gospel was projected into this world. It is the work of a reverent and consecrated scholar.

Another book of Glover's is called "The Pilgrim: Essays on Religion" (Doran.) It is a book of charming essays on topics chosen from both the Old and the New Testament. To mention only a few: The Making of a Prophet, The Holy Spirit, The Training at Nazareth, The Writer to the Hebrews, The Religion of Martin Luther, The Study of the Bible. Every one of these and the other seven essays which make up the book, will stimulate and inspire the man who reads them.

"The Bible in English Literature," by E. W. Work (Revell), will open the eyes of many a minister to the absolute saturation with the ideals and language of the Bible which is revealed by a study of the great authors in English literature. The book traces historically the coming and the influence of the Book. Augustus, Polinus, Columba, Caednon and the venerable Bede march across its pages. We trace the influence of the Book upon King Alfred; show the mighty work of the great translators, Wycliff and Tyndale, and trace the Bible through the great epochs of modern literature.

"Jesus, an Economic Mediator," Darby, (Revell Co.) This book belongs in the rapidly lengthening category of the attempts to apply the gospel of Christ to the social and industrial uses of the world. Christ's own teachings in regard to stewardship, democracy, capital and labor, are studied, and the autocratic assumptions of great organized Christian bodies are criticized.

Another intensely interesting book is Roger Babson's "The Future of the Churches" (Revell.) Almost any pastor could find in this stirring and practical study by a master Christian, material for a series of sermons that would grip his laymen as he discloses the bearing that historic and industrial facts have upon the health and progress of the church.

Henry Sloane Coffin, the pastor of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York City, has published a series of lectures on experimental religion, under the title, "What Is There in Religion?" (Macmillan.) Here, under the parable of the Hudson River, he discloses in ten chapters of rare charm and insight, what religion does do for the soul of man. It brings him refreshment, cleansing power, illumination, fertility, buoyancy, serenity and adventure, beauty and unity. A richness of illustrative material bathes the whole in an atmosphere of revealing clarity. You follow the river as you follow the story, with increasing joy—a book to reinforce faith and hope.

Jowett is a master preacher of the ancient writers. His skill and insight do not fail him in "The Eagle Life" (Doran.) Dr. Jowett takes us back again to drink from the wells of the Old Testament. Each brief chapter forever illuminates some text for the reader; each lifts into high relief the spiritual riches of the Old Testament.

In "The Hebrew Prophet and the Modern Preacher" (Doran), Rev. Henry J. Picket has shown what the ministry today can learn from the Hebrew prophet of old. The book opens with a clear and authoritative study of the place, training, and function of the Hebrew prophet.

Prayer Will Prevail

By Howard W. Pope

OH, blest is he who can believe
When earthly signs all fail,
That God is working to achieve
His end, though foes assail.

When ev'rything seems to go wrong,
Let not your heart bewail,
But just strike up a cheerful song,

For wrong will never be set right,
By sad complaints and tears;
God's way is to let in the light,

Bad men cannot for very long,
Retain their place and power;
God always works against the wrong,
And judgment has its hour.

So let us put our trust in God,
Nought else can e'er avail;
The path of faith God's saints have trod,
And prayer will still prevail.

The chapters on the Messianic ideal and the prophet as reformer are especially to be commended. Then follows a second section of the book, in which the results of the study are applied to the modern preacher.

Sir William M. Ramsay, the veteran archaeologist, is the author of "Luke, the Physician" (Doran), a book that will be of the deepest interest to any Bible student. It shows how the discoveries in archaeology confirm Luke as a historian at every point. The story is one of romantic interest and fills many a gap in our knowledge of Apostolic Christianity.

A timely discussion is that contained in Sidney Gulick's "The Christian Crusade for a Warless World" (Macmillan.) There is no question so vital before the church of today as its duty in the attempt to outlaw war. This book is a veritable arsenal of facts and arguments. If every Baptist pastor could read and digest it, and then preach on it, we should weld the denomination into a tremendous engine to aid in the bringing to a successful completion of the churches' most daring crusade.

These are only a few of the many fine books open to the pastor of today. Why not include in each year's budget of the local church an amount to be expended by the pastor on good modern books? That way lie fresh sermons and renewed powers.

A Baby Hunt

BY MEME BROCKWAY

Eleven thousand miners in Wales this spring stopped work to hunt for a little lost two year old boy. They found him and put him in his mother's arms.

Would you have helped in that search? Will you? Two and a half million babies were born in America last year. The Heavenly Father wants them found and given the protection of Christian parents and Christian homes.

The churches of the Northern Baptist Convention have united in a great spring cradle-roll campaign, for the cradle roll has proved to be the best and surest means of finding babies and reaching the babies' parents. Many states are now contesting, not only for the largest increase in cradle-roll membership, but for establishing in the churches parents' classes and mothers' clubs. Ohio is awake and Miss Nellie Dunham, director of children's work, reports three new mothers' clubs, one in Lincoln Park, Cincinnati, with a membership of fifty-five; another in Goodyear Heights, Akron, with a fine enrolment of 100.

New York has learned what the cradle roll can do. Mrs. Frederick Tomlinson, director of children's work, has an interesting story. One of her associational workers found a church which held a preaching service, but had no Sunday school. She talked with the minister who went out there each week, but he thought that the community would not be interested in cradle-roll work. The enthusiastic associational director was not easily discouraged so she called upon the telephone a woman member. A cradle roll was started and in two weeks the aroused people started a Sunday school.

If your church has not heard of the cradle roll campaign, ask your state director of religious education whether your state belongs to the Northern Baptist Convention and shares in its nation-wide movements—or ask your pastor or superintendent if some letter relative to the campaign is hiding in his waste paper basket. Get in the game! The campaign ends on Children's Day.

W. T. B. Williams, field director, John F. Slater Fund, has made the second report on negro universities and colleges after ten years. This includes eighteen institutions having the title of "university" and fifteen having the title of "college" located in eleven Southern states, four Northern states and the District of Columbia. The list of "universities" is somewhat different from that of 1913 since six which had that name then have changed their designation to college as more consistent with the work they are doing. One of the institutions is supported by the federal government; three are owned and supported by states with the aid of the federal government; two are owned by negroes but supported largely by state appropriations; nine are owned and supported mainly by negroes; and eighteen are supported mainly by northern philanthropy. In 1913 only four out of twenty-two of the most advanced educational institutions for negroes in America had more than 15 per cent of their non-professional students in their college departments. Now twelve of them have from 24 per cent to 100 per cent enroled in college departments. Now there are five of the universities and three of the colleges with more than 100 non-professional students each in their college departments, and eight additional institutions with from fifty-six to ninety-eight students each. Nine years ago only ten of the twenty-two negro institutions had more than twenty college students each.

The report continues: "In the eighteen universities and fifteen colleges covered by this study there are 3,264 college students.

Virgin Mary through the power of the Holy Spirit. He was the divine and eternal Son of God. He wrought miracles, healing the sick, casting out demons, raising the dead. He died as the vicarious atoning Saviour of the world and was buried. He arose again from the dead. The tomb was emptied of its contents. In his risen body he appeared many times to his disciples. He ascended to the right hand of the Father. He will come again in person, the same Jesus who ascended from the Mount of Olives.

3. We believe that adherence to the above truths and facts is a necessary condition of service for teachers in our Baptist schools. These facts of Christianity in no way conflict with any fact in science. We do not sit in judgment upon the scientific views of teachers of science. We grant them the same freedom of research in their realm that we claim for ourselves in the religious realm. But we do insist upon a positive content of faith in accordance with the preceding statements as a qualification for acceptable service in Baptist schools. The supreme issue today is between naturalism and supernaturalism. We stand unalterably for the supernatural in Christianity. Teachers in our schools should be careful to free themselves from any suspicion of disloyalty on this point. In the present period of agitation and unrest they are obligated to make their positions clear. We pledge our support to all schools and teachers who are thus loyal to the facts of Christianity as revealed in the scriptures.

The most spirited discussion came when Mr. J. P. Brownlow, a banker from Tennessee, offered on the floor of the convention a resolution which asked Southern Baptists to commend the action of the trustees of William Jewell College and at the same time appoint a commission on survey to cooperate with the trustees and boards of all educational institutions fostered by the convention to bring to an end teaching of infidelity under the guise of evolution. The resolution was referred to the committee on resolutions, which committee made a special report to the convention suggesting that the Brownlow resolution be not adopted. The recommendation of the committee was passed by practically a unanimous vote.

Great interest centered in the report of the commission on conservation. This report was the third annual report made since the $75,000,000 campaign was launched. The commission called attention to the fact that during these years the denomination had faced a series of unusual difficulties. We are in the back wash of the war with unrest in politics, industry and social relationships. The collection of the pledges has been embarrassed by the difficulty growing out of long term pledges, an unusually large number of pastorless churches and by the fact that many of the largest givers have become financially embarrassed.

During the four years 3,068 churches have been organized and 762,880 persons have been baptized—an annual gain of 171,716, or a net increase in members for the four years of 478,783. A net gain in the number of Sunday schools is 3,287 and an increased enrolment of 459,223. There has been a net gain in the enrolment of B. Y. P. U. societies of 233,917. And the Woman's Mission Union reports 7,094 new organizations. The receipts for missions, education and benevolence over the four previous years show a gain of $28,776,937 or an annual gain of $7,194,244. The increase in the value of church property during this period amounts to $45,405,118, or an annual gain of $11,351,279.

With all of the encouragement to be found in these facts, the convention faced heavy debts on many, if not all, of its missionary boards. The foreign mission board reported a debt of $403,879. In addition to its present actual debt, there are now outstanding letters of credit to the amount of $1,399,310 on which drafts are due between now and Dec. 31, 1923. Acting on the instructions of the convention, the board made a program on the basis of an income of $4,000,000 per year and last year received one and three-quarters millions and this year, $1,705,325, net on which to take care of a $4,000,000 program.

The home board reported debt in excess of $400,000.

To sum the matter up, Southern Baptists raised in cash on the $75,000,000 campaign from May 1, 1919 until May 1, 1923, $43,933,815. This leaves a balance to be raised of $31,066,185, during the last year. The commission answered its own question "what will it take to win?" in the following suggestions:

1. Prayer, believing prayer, importunate prayer, constant, perennial prayer to a God who never failed.

2. A faith which conquers difficulty and staggers not at the impossible.

3. Cooperation. We must work together with God—Baptist team work with every man doing his duty, the cooperation of love and fellowship of a great task, the loyalty of brothers in doing a big thing for Jesus Christ. It will take this to win.

4. A conscience on holy covenants. We must regard our pledges to God certainly as sacred as our notes to banks. A denominational looseness of conscience on kingdom pledges will dissolve the strength of our people. We must call our people back to the payment of their vows to God if we win.

5. We must put first things first and Christ's cause is first. We should put it above the needs of automobiles, amusements, the demands of appetite, the luxuries of dress and the pleasures of travel.

6. Our leaders must lead if we win. I speak of the pastors, the laymen leaders, the women leaders, our secretarial leaders, our religious paper leaders. All up and down the Baptist line we must have a leadership of loyal, royal leading now. A leaderless leader is the "abomination of desolation standing where it ought not" spoken of by Daniel.

The Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary of Fort Worth, Tex., was tendered by its board of trustees to the Southern Baptist Convention. The consensus of opinion seemed to be that the convention would eventually take over the institution if the details of the transfer can be worked out satisfactorily.

More or Less Personal

J. T. Henderson, secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement of the convention, reported 500 new local men's brotherhoods organized during the year.

William J. Bryan spoke in the social service session on "Christian Citizenship." His acceptance seemed to be conditioned upon the outcome of the election at the Presbyterian General Assembly in Indianapolis, where he was a candidate for the position of moderator.

President Mullins announced a vote as unanimously carried. A brother arose to explain that he had voted in the negative and asked if he didn't count. President Mullins corrected himself and assured the brother that every Baptist counted one.

In the Southern Convention there is always some one ready to make a speech. Almost every action is preceded by one or more addresses of considerable length.

After wide inquiry as to the probable influence of the Baptist Bible Union we came to the conclusion that Southern Baptists were neither seriously interested in nor seriously disturbed by the pre-convention meeting of that body.

Our Book Shelf

Robin Hood's Barn, by Margaret Emerson Bailey. New York. Doran. $2 net.

The confessions of a garden adventurer, the author confesses the book to be. It is a collection of leisurely and wholly delightful essays, several of which have appeared in magazine form. The many drawings by Whitman Bailey, scattered throughout the volume, are not by any means the least part of its charm.

A Moneyless Magnate and other Essays, by Frederick F. Shannon. New York: Doran. $1.50.

The whimsical title is a key to the spirit of this volume of essays by Doctor Shannon, pastor of Central Church, Chicago, successor to Doctor Gunsaulus. Doctor Shannon is a practical idealist. He is ever on tiptoe to see the beautiful, that which is just beyond the sight of ordinary vision; then he delights to interpret it in terms that every one can understand. "A Moneyless Magnate" is one of the best of the essays—so is "Beethoven in the Backyard," "An Artist in Living" and "A Letter to Main Street."

Mark Gray's Heritage, by Eliot H. Robinson. Page Company: Boston. $1.90.

An entertaining, quaint teen-age story of the efforts of a Quaker lad, Mark Gray, to overcome his impulsiveness. His "heritage" was a quick temper and a love of manly sports forbidden by the Friends. Life in the Quaker village of "Content" was uneventful until the advent of a professional wrestler and his manager. Mark Grey becomes involved in a series of exciting adventures and is finally arrested for the attempted murder of Mr. Robert Means, a dissipated, wealthy idler who is in love with Sister Faith Franklyn, Mark's fiancee. Boys especially will admire his prowess in wrestling, shooting and his enforced self-control under trying circumstances.

Old Testament Law for Bible Students, by Roger S. Galer, A. M. New York: Macmillan.

This volume is the fruit of careful study in the contents of the Old Testament, and especially the legal portions of it, as found in the Pentateuch. It is in the Mosaic code that we find indeed the basis of all law, and here we have the main body of our modern jurisprudence, as well as the moral law traced back to its original source. The author has adopted largely the modern critical and evolutionary method and makes more perhaps of Hammurabi and the Assyrian culture in general than the most of us are accustomed to do, but he gives supreme credit to the Deuteronomic enactments, and displays a real reverence for the Holy Oracles. The debt the world at large owes to Israel as the special custodians of God's revelation is clearly brought out, while at the same time a close study of the human development and adaptation of the original declarations and apprehensions is diligently made. The digest and classification of the moral and ceremonial law, as embodied in the Bible, is of particular value, and the book ought to do much to commend the sacred text to the legal fraternity. Theological students and Sunday-school scholars are also kept in mind, and the aim has been to provide a real side-help to the general study of the Word and the progress of religious thought in the world.

At the Master's Feet, by Sadhu Sundar Singh. New York: Revell. 75 cents.

In this remarkable little volume the Hindu preacher, termed by many the Saint Paul of India, gives to us a series of heart-stirring messages on the great themes—prayer, sin, the cross, service, God's presence, heaven and hell. These messages are brought closely home to the reader as they are given in the form of conversation between the Master and the disciple. They are stimulative for use in the prayer service and contain a great many useable illustrations for the minister and the Sunday-school teacher. The book was first published in Urdu, India, and has recently been translated by Mr. Arthur and Mrs. Parker. The name of the author is familiar to those who have been studying the recent great religious movements in India.

Critical Hours in the Preacher's Life, by Ernest Clyde Wareing, D. D. New York: Doran. $1.25.

The many phases of the present day minister's life are sympathetically understood and most frankly and constructively treated. Doctor Wareing writes out the experience of his own heart and life and with unusual power reveals the responsibilities and struggles, tragedies and temptations as well as the great heights of achievement possible for the minister of the gospel. The author writes with a double purpose in mind. He desires to point out the weak spots in the modern ministry with a view to remedying the same by arousing his fellows to a deeper appreciation of their opportunities and perils. He also desires to bring about a better understanding of the problems of the ministry by the layety and to deepen the channels of their relationships to the ministry. It is a very timely book and is bound to be read with interest by all those deeply involved in the work of the church of today.

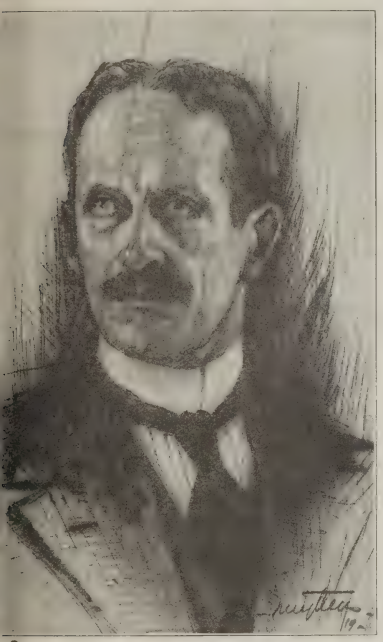
The story is told of a scientist engaged in the archeological discoveries at Luxor who picked up a sandwich near the excavations and immediately called around him a group of students. He then proceeded to lecture, directing their attention to its wonderful state of preservation.

There were, as he pointed out, unmistakable traces of butter.

Evidences of ham were plainly visible and the bread was far from being petrified.

"Of course," he was concluding, "this sandwich is not now edible——"



Just then another member of the party ambled up and remarked: "I am sorry to hear you say that, professor. That is a part of my lunch."

HARRISON M. WILD—A TRIBUTE

The subject of this sketch is Harrison M. Wild, of Chicago, nationally known as the conductor of the Apollo Club, of the Mendelssohn Club, of the Chicago Woman's Chorus; long eminent as an organist, as a choir-master, as a teacher and as a man. The contributing impulses to the writing of this article, (outside of my admiration for this giant-musician, and a keen appreciation of what his idealism and tenacity of purpose have meant to the musical life of the Middle West), were three things: The dramatic thrill of the performance of Georg Schumann's musical version of the biblical idyl of Ruth—a work of stupendous difficulty, but potent appeal. My wife sang the soprano solos in this, so I had ample opportunity to study the score and recognize the consummate artistry and the intense difficulty faced in performance! The second provocation was the recent, excellent, inspiring performance of the stupendous B minor Mass, of Bach. And then, as the final stimulus, came a dinner given at the Auditorium Hotel, Chicago, to commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of Mr. Wild's accession to the honorable part of director and leader of the Apollo Club of Chicago, a choral organization of world-fame, with a tradition and background dating to the beginning of things musical in this great and growing city, with a record of achievement and performance second to none in the world, and with a future of certain success. No other factor has been such a force in the cultivation of Chicago music—which has reacted on the entire Middle West. The only influence comparable to it has been and is the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Wild has been for twenty-five years the guiding hand in this accomplishment! From the ranks of his individual pupils, and by way of the choral body itself have come a goodly part of the active organists and choir-leaders in Chicago today. Because of the initiative of this man we have had the priceless opportunity of hearing the best of the new and the old in choral music, done with sympathetic and intelligent appreciation of the composer's meaning and desires, choral work of first-class grade, orchestral settings adjusted to a nicety and soloists perfectly fitted to the individual demands. No other organization that I know of has given such tangible, valuable encouragement to the young native artist as has this one; and this without in any way lowering standards or keeping out the best of the established celebrities. A list of the great choral works given initial American performances under Mr. Wild's baton would read like a list of all the most prominent achievements of the past generation in the choral field. And this enthusiasm has not been a devotion to the work of the club alone. On many occasions, whenever opportunity presented itself, we find the Apollo Club, led by Mr. Wild, cooperating with the orchestra, with the Civic Music Association, with the Art Institute—in fact being really a people's possession. To talk with Mr. Wild for a short time is sufficient to make one realize the value and vitality of the man. With his practical idealism and his executive ability, there seems to be no limit to his aspirations and his accomplishments.

All of these points—and many more—were stressed in after-dinner speeches by such authorities as Lela Macauly, Herman Devries, Albert Cotsworth, Edgar Nelson, and others. It was a fitting recognition of a great moment—of a great past, of a still greater future. May Harrison Wild go on as he has been doing for many more years. We, the musicians, and you, the appreciators, will reap the benefits. Wild is one of the most potent influences on American musical taste today!

One redeeming feature about this article is the fact that it resembles Mr. Wild in this: you get what he has done first and in most detail; the man himself comes last, modestly and simply! There is not much to tell of his life. The biographical dictionaries present little detail. About all we can get is condensed in the few lines below—

Harrison Major Wild: organist, conductor; born, Hoboken, N. J., March 6, 1861; educated at Dhyrenfurth College; studied organ with Creswold and Eddy Rust; piano with Liebling, Zwintscher and Maas; married Gertrude Younglove Cornell, Oct. 29, 1884 (three children). Was organist Ascension Church, Chicago, five years, Memorial Church, one year, Unity Church, thirteen years, and at Grace Episcopal until last year; conductor Mendelssohn Male Chorus and Apollo Club since 1895 and 1898 respectively; member American Guild of Organists, Chicago Manuscript Society, etc.

The Memorial Sublime

Erect a living monument to your pastor

WOVEN into the web of your church affairs—a leader of its spiritual and social life, with a definite heart interest in each hearthside, inextricably a part of every church activity, times without number giving every ounce of his strength and every farthing of his compensation in his ministering to your spiritual and bodily needs, his whole life devoted to the smoothing of your pathways with oft-times meagre or disheartening results—is the central figure of your pastor.

A living monument to his years of continuous efforts, token of his fortitude and courage in the face of frequent reverses, and written in enduring bronze—is the memorial sublime.

Deagan Tower chimes provide the most fitting tribute to a lifetime of service. Sweet harmonies that blend into and emphasize the eloquence of constant effort. To interested individuals and church organizations we will gladly send the fullest information.

The amount in our money is about $850.

June

REST! This is the year's bower. Sit down within it. Wipe from thy brow the toil. The elements are thy servants. The dews bring thee jewels. The winds bring perfume. The earth shows thee all her treasure. The forests sing to thee. The air is all sweetness, as if all the angels of God had gone through it, bearing spices homeward. The storms are but as flocks of mighty birds that spread their wings and sing in the high heaven! Speak to God, now, and say, "O Father, where art thou?" And out of every flower, and tree, and silver pool, and twined thicket, a voice will come, "God is in me." The earth cries to the heavens, "God is here." And the heavens cry to the earth, "God is here." The sea claims him. The land hath him. His footsteps are upon the deep! He sitteth upon the circle of the earth! O sunny joys of the sunny month, yet soft and temperate, how soon will the eager months, that come burning from the equator, scorch you!

Henry A. Backemeyer, of Indianapolis, won the admiration of the convention by the way he conducted the convention's singing. In the first place he selected the great old hymns of the church and in the second place he did not turn himself into a musical gymnast, diverting attention from the singing to the singer. Mr. Backemeyer is a singing evangelist.

Speaking of music leads us to say that the girls from the Baptist Bible Institute of Philadelphia, the glee club of the Peddie Institute and the boys from Shaw University, added not a little to the enjoyment and helpfulness of the convention. We almost forgot the Empire State Male Quartette. The night of the laymen's meeting the Shaw boys had to leave the hall before the chairman could proceed with the regular program. With no lack of appreciation of others, we must say those negro "spirituals" capture the hearts of an audience.

The music of the Fundamentalist Conference was directed by Mrs. Helen W. Lamson, soloist of Tremont Temple, and Carl Lamson, accompanist of Fritz Kreisler.

In the report of the convention reference is made to the critical illness of the wife of Secretary T. B. Palmer of Colorado. Later in the session a message was received which brought joy to the delegates. The tide turned in favor of the patient the very day upon which such earnest prayer was offered.

On Sunday, Dr. John A. Earl of the First Church, St. Paul, became critically ill. He was resting easier when we left Atlantic City.

Never, so far as we recall, has there been a convention with so little machinery in sight, but Chairman H. V. Howlett and his associates were at all times on the job caring for the interests of delegates. We did not even hear complaints about the heat this year.

In THE BAPTIST and repeatedly in the convention we have been reminded that while we have not secured the full $100,000,000, we have at least that amount in experience. It is doubtless true. Much of this "experience" we label as "mistakes." Is it not high time to cease talking about these mistakes and to begin to realize on the heavy investment in experience?

The speakers at the convention, as a whole, ran along pretty close to hard fact. In an occasional session a speaker would start some laudatory statement about a member or officer of his board. In most cases one good turn seemed to deserve another. But at the seaside you should expect some salt water taffy. Even THE BAPTIST received a little.

Early in the sessions Dr. John R. Stratton of Calvary Church, New York, was called to Atlanta where his daughter Katherine was critically ill with meningitis. When the announcement was made the convention engaged in prayer for the family. Later it was announced that the girl died shortly after her father reached her bedside.

The fraternal delegates from the Southern Baptist Convention received a cordial welcome. One of the speakers got on dangerous ground when he expressed himself upon the question of biennial sessions, which was at the time under consideration.

One rarely attends a convention where the attendance is so uniformly large at all the sessions. The mission-study classes were a feature this year. There were at least two reasons which will account for the sustained interest. The weather was comfortable and the air at all times on the pier was fresh and refreshing. The other reason was the magnitude of the questions we faced and the fact that the delegates were so generally concerned in finding the answer to them.

It Is One of the "Causes"

We attended a recent meeting of a state convention. It is a contrast to some we know of. We studied the program assiduously to see how the place of denominational journals would be recognized as a vital part of the work of Baptists in that state. As far as that program was concerned no would ever guess that the denomination had two such journals as THE BAPTIST and Missions. It is true that there was a man at the door taking subscriptions. He found what will always be true—the folks who are doing things denominationally have the papers. These journals are one of the denominational "causes," and as such they are usually recognized on the programs of associations and conventions. We cannot hope to secure many subscriptions at such places, but we can send the folks back to put on an every-family canvass for the papers.

Killam's Kollum

Our President

Our president, Corwin S. Shank, has for years rendered the denomination most valuable service. Those who know of his work, for instance, on the now historic adjustment committee know him as a man of large ability and a great reserve of good nature and patience. He will make the convention a most worthy president. President Shank, THE BAPTIST is your house organ for the year 1923-24. We hope that you will make large use of it.

Couldn't Be Promoted

It did look for a time as if the editor might be "promoted" at Atlantic City. Oh, no, I was not in danger of dying. I mean that a new job stared me in the face. But, after all is said and done, how can you "promote" an editor? He has a pretty big job, going each week with a message into thousands of homes. No, the kollum still stands.

Fourteen Is a Multiple of Seven

We have been warned not to speak lightly of our newspaper committees. We have referred to them by number, for there was no possibility of identifying them in any other way. They have been created with such rapidity that a suitable designation could not be found before another committee would appear on the scene. On this account we fell into the discourteous habit of giving them a number, as they do in some institutions into which, as far as we know, no member of any one of our committees has ever been admitted. No committee ever complained until we reached our last, or, rather, our next to the last committee—its number was thirteen. We were not at fault. We did not mean to be mean but we could find no way to fourteen except through the road marked thirteen. All this is in the past. Our next to the last committee honestly tried to make provision for an element of permanence in the link between the convention and its organ by asking the executive committee to become responsible directly as they are in reality for THE BAPTIST. This action had the unanimous approval of the newspaper committee, of the administrative committee, but failed to pass the Board of Promotion. We are where we have always been, and await with interest the announcement of committee fourteen. If it would be more satisfactory we are willing to designate these committees by the letters of the alphabet. But even then, what committee would want to be known as committee X, Y or Z?

Seaside Sayings

The report on future denominational program received the most careful consideration. Again and again after discussion it was referred back to the committee for slight amendment and was finally unanimously adopted. We are unable to give the amended report in this issue. We shall print this report in full later, for it will be of most practical interest to our people generally. The committee received enthusiastic commendation for its work.

A pleasing feature of Professor Cummings' visit to Latvia will be the conferring of a degree of Bachelor of Divinity upon Mr. Frey under authority of the trustees of Redlands University.

Fresh from the Field

Rev. E. E. Shoufler of Alma, Mich., has accepted the call of the First Church, Hastings, Neb., and will begin his new work July 1.

As the result of meetings held among the Cajan Indians near Malcolm, Ala., by Rev. B. C. Hening, a Baptist church was organized and a house of worship was built.

Rev. J. D. Freeman, the well-known English minister, will come to this country this summer and will preach in July at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, and in August at his former church in Toronto.

Mr. J. L. Colville, a railway engineer, who was converted last summer, has resigned a position paying $3,000 yearly, and has entered Mars Hill College, a Southern Baptist school, to prepare for the ministry.

Dugald Macfadyen, the British historian, writer and lecturer, said to be the originator of the idea of interchanging public speakers which was put into effect during the war by the United States and Great Britain, has arrived in this country and will spend two or three months lecturing in different sections.

Hon. Hubert Work, secretary of the interior, has named a committee of 100 prominent men and women of national vision to study with him the whole Indian question. His desire is to plan the best possible policy in its relation to these people. Among the hundred who have been requested to join in an appraisal of this American problem, are Dr. Thomas C. Moffett of the Presbyterian Home Board and Dr. Charles L. White of the Home Mission Society.

Enclosed with the diplomas granted nineteen graduates of the Mounds Park School for Nurses, St. Paul, Minn., was a card bearing the words: "She has found her work." The exercises were held on Friday, May 11, at the First Church, St. Paul. The chief speakers were, Dr. Eugene C. Riggs of the medical staff of Mounds Park Sanitarium, and Rev. John A. Swanson, pastor of the First Swedish Baptist Church. Dr. Robert Earl, chairman of the board of directors of Northwestern Baptist Hospital Association, conferred the diplomas.

The Northern Baptist committee to promote attendance at the alliance has suggested that some English-speaking Swedish Baptist meet all incoming trains and steamships at Gothenburg immediately preceding and immediately after the congress at Stockholm. The suggestion has been accepted and visitors upon reaching Gothenburg should look for some one on the dock or at the station with the initials "B. W. A." on hat band or sleeve who will be ready to give assistance as occasion may require. English-speaking friends will be found at the railway stations in Copenhagen and Kristiania. This service on the part of the Scandinavian brethren will be greatly appreciated.

Prof. John Knudson of Franklin College, has been made a member of the American Association of College Professors, an organization including in its membership leading educators of the country.

World Kindred Week, celebrated in Chicago, May 14-18, was the first attempt by a federation of young people's societies to conclude the year's united mission study campaign with a dramatic festival. Two productions were staged at the Medinah Temple.

At the Baptist World Alliance held in Stockholm, the Home Mission Society will be represented by two members of the board of managers, four members of the secretarial staff, two general workers and one Indian layman. Of this party the expenses of only two will be borne by the society. The expenses of two secretaries, two general workers and the Indian layman will be met by funds provided by friends. The following persons will compose the party: D. G. Garabrant, Dr. and Mrs. A. T. Fowler, Dr. and Mrs. C. L. White, Dr. C. A. Brooks, Dr. and Mrs. H. F. Stilwell, Prof. A. Mangano, Dr. Bruce Kinney and David Paddlety. Professor Mangano, through the liberality of friends, has been able to extend his studies by a visit to Roumania, Latvia, Lithuania, Czecho-Slovakia and Poland.

Baptists of Great Britain and Ireland had a most successful annual meeting. One event of special interest to Americans was the election of Dr. T. R. Glover as president for the next year. In commenting on his election, the Baptist Times and Freeman says: "Doctor Glover has one supreme qualification, and there is one contribution which he can make in a way and to a degree possible perhaps to no other man. Doctor Glover has the ear of the young men and young women of this country. They will listen to him as to no one else, and we hope that he will make his year of office the opportunity for a great effort to bring the young life of our country back into the service of Christ and of his church."

American travelers who visit Europe this summer will be interested in the striking exhibit of ecclesiastical history and art which is part of the Gothenburg Jubilee Exposition on the west coast of Sweden, which opened May 8 and continues until September 30. A communication has been received from Rev. K. A. Molden indicating that the Baptists of Gothenburg are anxious to render all possible assistance to alliance delegates while passing through that city. The exhibition presents perhaps for the first time the complete history of Christianity in an European nation. It includes not only Swedish exhibits, but also exhibits from the various congregations of Swedish Americans. There is a large number of models, paintings, photographs, charts, books and printed matter illustrating the growth of these denominations throughout the United States. Another feature is an exhibit of sepulchral art which will be shown in a churchyard beside a medieval church built especially for the purpose.

The Baptist

The "Second Wind"

THE denomination has gotten its "second wind." Any person who has ever started to run to some goal, so that stopping short was to fail, will know exactly what we mean. The first few rods of the course were comparatively easy. Then gradually the breath became shorter and shorter. The feet became heavy and there was a dull ache in the body. Perspiration started on the brow. If the runner continued toward the goal, a moment came when he felt that he couldn't go another rod. Then something happened. The breath came easier. The pain disappeared. The pace was quickened without increased exhaustion. Nature had made some internal adjustments and the attainment of the goal was possible.

What the "second wind" is to the runner, that was Atlantic City to the Baptists of the North. We were at the close of a hard year—the three-quarters post on the course mapped out. The pace had gradually slowed down until defeat stared us in the face. Our denominational breath came in short gasps. The working body itself seemed a dead weight. The hour of complete exhaustion was at hand. "We might just as well give up the race," was on the lips of more than one runner. But in the course of the convention a change was gradually apparent. The denomination was getting its "second wind" and the runners themselves began to feel that while they might not set any new world records, a creditable showing was now not only possible but assured.

We are not prepared to tell scientifically just what took place either in the case of the runner or in that of the denomination. Of this we are sure—that the change was in the body itself and that the change was vital. We can point out in the latter case some evidences of the new spirit. In all of the actions after the first session there was practical unanimity in the business of the convention. We have never attended an annual gathering where this was more marked—not even at Denver. Even when it came to the election of officers, there was not a single person in that vast audience who would raise his voice in objection to a motion to instruct the secretary to cast a ballot for the officers as nominated. This was not the result of indifference, but rather of oneness of mind.

The finance committee of the convention had its report prepared recommending a budget almost identical with that of last year. When the hour for the report came the committee asked for postponement in order that it might revamp that report so as to include all the facts concerning the indebtedness of the denomination. This was done and the results are printed in full in this issue. They give evidence that Baptists are being reassured as to the outcome of the race. The adoption of this report was not perfunctory. The men and women who know most intimately the difficulties in the way of success were in that meeting. The secretaries of the general societies and boards, the secretaries of the state conventions and city mission societies, the pastors of the churches and, last but not least, interested laymen, all took part in the discussion and voted in the light of intimate knowledge of the local situations.

The report of the committee charged with the task of suggesting a future denominational program was no small factor in the new spirit which came into the convention. This report was not immediately adopted, but was referred back to the committee again and again for such changes as the convention thought essential. The question where there was most difference of opinion was upon the size of the "Board of Missionary Cooperation," as the new promotional body will be called, and the proper representation of the varied interests. We still believe that the smaller body suggested by the committee was a more workable body, quite aside from the matter of the expense involved. As amended by the convention the size of the new body is almost equal and may surpass in numbers that of the present Board of Promotion. Nevertheless, this question of the constitution of the new board is incidental and will be subject to revision.

SUFFICE it to say that the denomination has not lost sight of its main objectives. We are no longer talking $100,000,000, but we do propose to carry on all our work this year without any further retrenchment. We do propose to discharge our obligations, not only to the banks but to the members of the denominational family. We will not be satisfied with anything short of a clean slate for the beginning of a new era of denominational achievement. The New World Movement is just one short chapter in our history. Its victories and its defeats; its fellowships and its estrangements are all too clearly in mind to need explanation. We may rest assured, however, that when the future historian delving into the denominational archives forms his unimpassioned estimates of the period which is now drawing to a close, he will picture it as one of the most fruitful periods in the life of a great denomination up to this day.

We know as we never knew before the mighty resources we have in the prayer life of our people. They do have, and avail themselves of, the privilege of access to God. We have mighty resources in the young life of the denomination. Thank God for the boys and girls of our churches, who, in spite of the moral slump in the world, are walking with heads erect and hearts that are true to the call of the highest and best things. We have discovered undreamed of sources of financial strength. We may have failed to make fruitful appeal to those of great wealth, but the common people have responded as they never have done before in our history. Our people having begun this good work, will complete it if they can understand and feel the urge of the world's need. We are going to forget what is behind. We are going to keep our faces toward the goal. We are going to run as we never ran before, for on the outcome of the year hang large issues. Our honor and Christ's are at stake.

The Testing of Love

IT IS such an easy thing to say that we love one another and also that we love God, but it is just as easy, by the way we live, to cast doubts upon the truth of our protestations of love.

Love is tested whenever there is a call really to sacrifice for the one you profess to love, for where real love dwells there is no limit to the price a true lover will pay in order to serve or save the object of his affections.

Love deters us from doing harm and incites us to do good, and in this again it is tested by its willingness to go beyond the person loved and do all men good and to do no one any harm.

Christianity is built upon love, and it is that type of love which rejoices in its sacrificial elements. Because he loved us, God gave his only begotten Son to die for a lost world. Jesus Christ was a willing sacrifice because he loved us in spite of our sins, and the horror and agony of his sufferings and death testify convincingly to the greatness and sincerity of his love for lost men and women. Great trials and sufferings are but the added glory of a rich, deep love.

Now comes our profession of love to be tested in the same arena of life. We are told, "By this ye may know ye have passed from death unto life because ye love the brethren." How are we showing our love for the brethren in the household of faith? By neglecting them when they need our help? "But," says some one, "they resent your trying to help them." Then love is tested by your willingness to suffer their resentment while you persist in your efforts to help them. The true mother persists in helping her child despite all the resentment and anger that follow her loving ministry.

Love casteth out fear, we are told. But in our church relationships we lose a large part of our power and progress because we are afraid to help each other to do what is right. Our fear betrays an existing lack of love, while indwelling love conquers fear and goes on its way triumphant. Our love is tested and either proved or denied by the practical happenings of every-day living among our brethren.

We are sure that our present-day world needs the proof of our love for God and each other which is furnished by sacrificial living and giving. We are afraid that there is not much likelihood of saving a world outside until our love has been glorified and deepened by sacrificial service with those with whom we have church ties. However, the ultimate test of our love for God lies in our helping to save the world outside.

A Progressive Church

AS AN institution the church of Jesus Christ has nearly always earned the reputation in the world of being conservative to a fault, or even reactionary. We believe, however, that both ancient and modern history will show that many times the church has been foremost in progressive movements which have had great weight in constructive advances along moral and spiritual lines.

Also the church has had a real place in providing backing to progressive movements in the economic and political realms.

The church, however, is very prone to be foolishly conservative within its own life and organization, and we believe that it is in that sphere of its operations that it has gathered to itself the reputation outside for ultra-conservatism and lack of progressiveness. At times the church has been far more concerned about future realms than concerned for present salvation. Therefore men and women have been pointed to a fanciful and unknowable future rather than to a present sacrificial Christ-like life of service. In this respect progressiveness is needed.

So far we have been using the term church as applied to the church universal. Now we want to apply what we have said to the operation of the local churches.

As we understand the revealed word of God there can be no future salvation for any one except as the Lord Jesus Christ brings to him a saved life here and now. But the practices of many a local church are so wound about with precedents and inefficiency that the average local body is unable to produce a worth-while group of professing men, women and children. There is too much inequality between the best and the worst of us in the average local group.

Truth is always truth and it cannot be changed. But the application of an unchanging truth can be applied in new ways to different circumstances in different ages so that the old truth has new and resultful powers to meet present conditions.

It is in this respect that we are now appealing for a progressive local church because in many places the local body has lost its vision and punch, and needs to be aroused so that it can meet the needs of the people who must live in the world of today.

The Gospel Anew

And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the nations, believed on in the world, received into glory.—1 Tim. 3-16.

THE CONVENTION SERMON

By W. W. Bustard

THE need of the age is not a new gospel but the gospel anew. Here it is. It may have been part of an old Christian hymn, or it may have sung itself out of the heart of Paul. "God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the nations, believed on in the world, received into glory." It is no wonder Paul speaks of the mystery of godliness in connection with this marvelous verse. Problems unsolved and insoluble present themselves in every sphere of numan investigation. The simple fact that the finite can never fully comprehend the infinite must always be taken for granted. Man may apprehend both the mystery of God and godliness but he can never fully comprehend either. Man by searching cannot find out God; he may find God, but he cannot find him out. God is more a revelation to man's faith than he is a discovery of man's reason. The present tendency to make God a creation of man's reason, or human necessity, will get us nowhere. Any attempt to take the miraculous and supernatural out of religion will only weaken it.

The Mystery of Godliness

This statement of Paul that "without controversy great is the mystery of godliness" will have to stand. Of course this does not mean that it cannot be known. In fact, Paul intimates that more and more it is being made known. Made k n o w n—not so much through reason as by revelation. By revelation—to reason, through faith—seems to be the divine human process of imparting truth. It is best that it should be so. We can never float the morals of this world on a religion that is purely natural and wholly rationalistic. Religions, as begotten of men and born of women, no matter how well patented or securely copyrighted, are poor substitutes for the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Eddyism with its gospel of physical health and denial of sin, spiritualism with its ectoplasm and spirit pictures, Russellism with its "little flock" and "second chance," will never solve the problems of the world or meet the needs of the times.

It is not a new gospel we need, it is simply the gospel anew.

There are few verses in the New Testament which contain more of the gospel than our text.

The first thing it tells us is:

I. God Was Manifest in the Flesh

Paul seems to have no doubt here as to who Christ was, or how through him God came into the world. In this statement we recognize the great truth of the incarnation, and realize the great proof of the deity of Christ. The very word "manifest" implies the pre-existence of our Lord. Herein Paul agrees with the declaration that "in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God and the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us."

The life of Jesus did not begin with his birth. In the beginning he was with God. The incarnation then is only an earthly manifestation of a divine presence which had been domiciled in the heavenly place through the eternal ages. A baby may be spoken of as having been born; Christ was spoken of as being the manifestation of God in the flesh. The idea of manifestation is not opposed to nonexistence, but it does take for granted a previous existence unmanifested in the flesh. This phrase "manifest in the flesh" would be absurd if applied to any one else but Christ; and inappropriate, if applied to anything else but his birth. "Manifest" implies the previous existence of the person manifested, and so Christ could say of himself, "Before Abraham was, I am."

As a great denomination always loyal to the truth, we should raise our voice in protest against any modern attempt to take inspiration out of the Bible and deity away from Christ.

The Word testifies to the deity of our Lord. Take what Jesus said about himself, and what others said about him.

In his midnight conversation with Nicodemus, Jesus declared, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life."

In the closing verse of this same chapter, he said, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life. For the Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hand."

In the conversation Jesus had with the woman of Samaria at the well, she said, "I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ." Jesus answered, "I that speak unto thee am he."

On another occasion while talking with his disciples, Jesus asked them this significant question, "Whom say ye that I am?" and Peter answered, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

"My Lord"

After his resurrection, appearing in a room where the doors were shut, he said to Thomas, "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands, reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side"; Thomas answered and said unto him, "My Lord and my God." It is worthy to note that Jesus here did not rebuke his disciple nor repudiate the title.

In Hebrews, we are told "God in these last days has spoken unto us by his son whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds. Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high."

The history of the last two thousand years bears witness to these divine claims made so long ago.

Is it not true that Jesus Christ is the greatest factor in human history and has made the greatest impression on the world? In an incomparable way the influence of his thought and life has been felt in art, in literature, science, and music. We have talked about our superhuman men in history but there are none; there is but one superhuman man, the man Christ Jesus. Usually when we find one of any kind in life, it is reasonable to expect that we shall find more of the same kind but Jesus was the only one of his kind. He is the moral touchstone of humanity, the matchless character of the ages, towering above all others, as Mount Blanc rises above the surrounding foot-hills.

The Great Argument

Reinforcing the statement of scripture concerning the deity of Jesus and the proofs of history, there still remains that great argument: The experience of the human soul. We know that Christ is God because he has done the work which God could do for us. None other could give us the peace of heaven in our hearts through the forgiveness of our sins.

There is no argument against experience. "Beholding the man which was healed standing with them, they could say nothing against it." Religion becomes more and more the accumulated experience of faith through the ages plus man's personal possession of God.

While not attempting to establish by argument the deity of Christ, yet we ought to consider in connection with this great fact the value of personality. Undoubtedly the great thing in God, and in man, is personality. This has been defined as reason, will and love in self-conscious unity. Jesus possessed the personality of God. The great credential of his diety is his personality. His personality cannot be that of a man for no other man has had a personality like his. In Christ alone we see God's reason, will and love in self-consciousness unity; his teaching is a reflection of God's mind. His work is a revelation of God's power; his person is a manifestation of God's presence. When we say Jesus we mean God.

II. Justified in the Spirit

There are two interpretations of the rather difficult statement. One is that he was vindicated in his own spirit; the other is he was justified in the Holy Spirit.

If we take the first, the words "in the spirit" present an obvious contrast to "in the flesh." He who was manifested in the flesh was justified in the spirit. "In the flesh" refers to the material part of Christ's nature. "The spirit" undoubtedly means the higher part. In other words, what he did in the flesh was always vindicated by the spirit as having been the right thing to do. What a commendation this is for a man's higher nature to make concerning the deeds of the lower nature. No wonder he could challenge the Jews with the question, "Which of you convicteth me of sin?" If his own spirit could not do that, surely it was impossible for any one else to accomplish. Here is a most unique condition that ought never to be overlooked; in Christ and Christ alone, we have every deed of the body commended by the spirit.

This great truth has been depicted with keen insight and rare artistic beauty in John Watson's "The Mind of the Master." He says: "No one has yet discovered the word Jesus ought not to have said; none suggested the better word he might have said. No action of his has shocked our moral sense; none has fallen short of the ideal. He is full of surprises, but they are all the surprises of perfection. You are never amazed, one day by his greatness, the next by his littleness. He is tender without being weak, strong without being coarse, lowly without being servile. He has conviction without intolerance, enthusiasm without fanaticism, holiness without Pharisaism; passion without prejudice. This man alone never made a false step, never struck a jarring note. His life alone moved on those high levels where local limitations are transcended and the absolute Law of Moral Beauty prevails. It was life at its highest. He passes through the daily ordeal stainless and blameless. He was never worsted in the moral conflict. He was often weary, but he was never burdened by guilt; he abounded in prayer, but in his prayers there was no confession, or cry for pardon. This is a unique representation. A keen sense of sin is a constant characteristic of the saints. No word of self-condemnation ever passed his lips, no sigh for a closer walk with God was ever heard."

The Only Sinless Man

Here is a picture of the only sinless man ever known. The one whose spirit vindicated the deeds of the flesh.

The other interpretation of this passage is that he was justified by the Holy Spirit. He not only had the approval of his own spirit in everything he said and did, but he also had the approval of the Holy Spirit. And what is even more, he had the anointing of the Spirit.

The Holy Spirit came upon Christ individually and representatively. He received the Holy Spirit individually at his baptism in Jordan, and, at the time of his anointing God declared, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." The Spirit came upon Christ there as a dove; he came upon his disciples as fire.

We are to be baptized with the Holy Ghost and fire. Jesus being sinless, and having done no evil, did not need the purification made possible by the cleansing power of fire.

In 1665, a deadly epidemic spread over London. Many died. People fled by the thousands into the country. Grass grew in the streets which once were busy thoroughfares. There were not enough doctors to take care of the sick. Each morning men appeared with carts in front of the homes crying, "Bring out your dead." They were buried by hundreds in ditches and trenches. Month after month the epidemic spread, claiming more and more of its victims. Everything seemed to be powerless in stopping it. In the next year, 1666, there occurred that historic fire of London. One-third of the city was consumed. The fire stopped the epidemic and so purified the city of the germs that the plague ended and health was restored. What medicine failed to accomplish at that time, the fire succeeded in doing in a few days.

The "almighty dollar" belongs to the Almighty God. The peril is in separating these two. The only way to escape the peril of wealth is in recognition of God, who gave the power to get it. Coveteousness is one of the blackest sins mentioned in Holy Writ. The love of money may be charged to the poor as well as to the rich. The evil is not in the amount of wealth, but in the attitude of its possessor. A few dollars may be as dangerous and detrimental to the spiritual life as millions.—Calendar, First Church, Wichita, Kans.

It is the baptism of the Holy Spirit and fire that the church needs today if it is to be purified of its sin and endued with power.

The Power of the Spirit

He did need the anointing of the Spirit for the purposes of service. For it was in the power of the Spirit that he went about doing good.

After Christ's ascension, he received the Holy Spirit representatively. He had previously told his disciples that he must go away: "For if I go not away," he said, "the Comforter will not come unto you, but if I depart I will send him unto you."

Just before leaving them we are told in Acts that "being assembled together with them, he commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem but wait for the promise of the Father, which saith he, ye have heard of me."

The first thing Jesus did when he reached heaven was to get the fulfillment of the Father's promise, and the Holy Spirit which was then given to him representatively he immediately gave to his disciples that they too might be empowered for service. This is the thing that makes it possible for Peter to say in his great sermons on the day of Pentecost, "Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father, the promise of the Holy Spirit, he hath shed forth this, which we now see and hear."

Here is the great need of the church today—That we shall wait: wait for the promise of the Father, until we be endued with power from on high. Away with these modern catch-words "pep" and "push" in spiritual work, as though they were the only solution for our problems, the only panacea for our ills. Back to prayer, Pentecost, and power. Tarry, O church of the living God, till ye be endued with power from on high, then go in the strength of the Holy Spirit to do the work which the Master has given you to accomplish.

III. Was Seen of Angels

How little we know about angels in these materialistic days. How seldom they are mentioned in pulpit or spoken in the pew. They have become the playthings of spirit forces. We seem to have forgotten that angels are a created order of intelligent beings. Both the Old and New Testament speak of their existence and define their office.

Modern theology and thought seem to have lost all conception about the ministry of service rendered by angels as the messengers of God. He was seen of angels.

THE Chinese student, K. I. Tai, was to complete his education in the University of Chicago. Some of his friends were concerned as to the bent that might be given to his theology by that institution. This is what he wrote to them, after some time in the University, as told by Mrs. Page, missionary in China: "I am not interested in the theological side of Christian doctrines, but rather in the vital problem of how to present the gospel of Christ to my people in the most effective way. In other words, I am here to learn the methods and technique of making the church a dynamic force in a community, to guide its members individually and collectively to act and react according to the will of God as revealed to us by our Lord Jesus Christ. I cannot afford to waste my limited time and energy to be entangled in the so-called doctrinal controversy which will get nowhere."

It was one of their number that announced his glorious advent, saying, "I bring you good tidings of great joy, for unto you is born this day in the City of David a Saviour which is Christ the Lord."

It was one of their heavenly choirs that sang the anthem of peace when he came as a babe in Bethlehem's manger.

After his awful struggle with the devil in the wilderness of temptation, "behold angels came and ministered unto him."

It was an angel that wiped the bloody drops of perspiration from his divine brow in the garden of Gethesmane when he drank the cup of the world's sorrow to its bitter dregs.

It was an angel that came the first Easter morning from the open sky, swifter than a stroke of lightning, to his earthly tomb.

It was an angel that took the keys from the skeleton hand of death, broke the Roman seal, and defied all earthly power.

It was an angel who proclaimed the news that has come ringing down the centuries with the triumph of eternal victory, "He is not here; he is risen."

IV. Preached among the Nations

"Preached"—let us notice the word. It means to proclaim. God sets supreme value on this work of proclaiming his truth, not to any one nation but to all nations of the world. There was no other way of making Christ known to the nations of the earth at the time these words were written except by preaching him.

Today there is no substitute for this God-ordained method of imparting truth. Christ has never revoked the commandment given his disciples "that they were to go teach all nations." We are still what his disciples always have been—witnesses of the truth. Here is the inspiration for all missionary endeavor. Here is the great urge for every layman's activity. Here is the sublime revelation of the heaven-born fact that we are laborers together with God. This work of heralding the truth, God might have given to the angels as he sent them flying to the four corners of the earth with his message of love—but he didn't. This is a task that he might have given to the stars as he gathered them together across the midnight darkness and made their light spell out his truth of redeeming grace—but he didn't. This is a privilege that God might have given to the mighty ocean, which he holds in the hollow of his hand, as he compelled its waves beating on the sandy beach or breaking on the rock-bound coast, to sing the wonders of his saving love—but he didn't.

Man, a Co-laborer

In his great wisdom he has made man, who alone can experience salvation, a laborer together with himself in the regeneration of a race and the redemption of the world. God gave man only a few original thoughts—a very few—and out of these thoughts have come all science, art, philosophy and religion. They were seed thoughts, which gave birth to all the rest. Socrates, Plato, Shakespeare, and Browning got hold of them and wrote their immortal verses in prose and poetry.

God gave man but seven primary colors. Man has never created a single color since, but out of those original seven he has made some 1400 different shades. God paints the golden sunsets and the glorious sunrises, he tints the petals of the flowers and the plumage of the birds with the seven original colors. Angelo, Raphael, Rembrandt, and Turner got hold of them and painted their immortal canvasses for men to hang on the walls of the world.

The Great Thing Preached

God made but seven notes in music. On these notes the birds sing in the treetops, the winds murmur through the leaves, the storms play among the mountains and the ocean breaks upon the shore. Bach, Mendelssohn, Handel and Hayden got hold of them and produced a crescendo of music that has filled the world with harmony and the souls of men with melody.

What greater joy can man seek than this? What higher privilege can he ask than to be a co-laborer with God, and as a partner, associated with the Almighty, share in the work which God is doing for this needy world?

In this connection, we cannot help but ask ourselves one significant question, "What was the great thing preached among the nations?" Immediately there comes Paul's answer "Brethren, when I came to you I came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom declaring unto you the testimony of God, for I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified."

If excellency of speech and wisdom could have saved this world, Paul was genius enough to have realized it. He knew that the message for his age was the message of Calvary's cross. Paul realized that there was just one thing that God had put in this world as the means of its salvation. The cross is the pivot of the universe around which swings the redemption of mankind. God saw that this was a world of sin. He knew that sin could not be put away either by legislation or education but only by taking it upon himself. When Christ said upon the cross, "It is finished," he meant that God had completed his plan of salvation. Man can add nothing to it.

The question of salvation is not a question of man's work or of human character. It is a question of Calvary's cross. God's way of atonement is not to put responsibility on man to save himself either by his work or his character. God's way of atonement is to provide a sacrifice and to put sin away by the death of his Son, as Peter teaches, "who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree."

There are great truths which need to be emphasized today. But the true focus of modern thought should be Calvary. We are profoundly thankful for all the light we have had on the Fatherhood of God and the new conception of the kingdom of heaven. The fact remains through all the history of the church that the great thing which saved and sanctified the lives of men, increased revival effort and missionary interest, made for a diviner type of human life and a better type of human society, has been the preaching of redemption through the cross of Calvary. This is one doctrine that needs not corrections; cannot be amended. It is the central truth and most conspicuous fact in the New Testament, for a Christianity without the cross is no Christianity at all.

If Baptists cannot stand on common ground at Calvary, there is no place where they can stand. If they cannot agree on the atonement which took place there, there is little left upon which they can agree that is worth while.

JESUS taught that the supreme obligation of man is the necessity that as a child, he is to be like his Father—"Be ye . . . as your Father.". Coincident with this, he taught that the worst aspect of sin is the alienation it involves of the child from the Father, and that the main object of redemption is the restoration of the child-relation in man. It was the Father heart in God that moved him to seek and save us. Christ knew that the deepest cry of the human soul is for the Father. Is the heart of the Eternal a Father's heart? Has he forgiveness for our sins and pity for our weakness? Is he touched by our need? Is he moved by our prayers? These are things which above all others we crave to know, and Christ has made us sure of them. Therefore true life is a "going to the Father," and in it we find life's interpretation and inspiration, and in these, its completion—meeting the Father, looking into his face. . . On this side we call it death; on that side it is reaching the Father. It is not departure but arrival, not sleep but an awakening, not a condition but a passage, not a funeral procession, but a triumphal entry!—Arthur T. Fowler.

We may not understand the act of the atonement but we can accept the fact of it. Christ and him crucified is the evangel for our day, just as it was for Paul's. There is nothing else for the church of Christ to do but to go back to the cross if it is going to find God's solution for the world's problems and God's salvation for the world's sin.

The Gospel is Christ-centered; but, to preach Jesus only as an example of good moral character, or a social worker, is not preaching Christ in all his power. We are to preach God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, a reconciliation made possible through the atoning death of Christ upon the cross.

V. Believed on in the World

This is the purpose of preaching, that Christ might be believed on in the world. The reception of this proclamation of the crucified Christ means the salvation of every one who believes it.

Here is our hope and encouragement, "My word shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it."

The business of the church is to interpret God to the world and bring man out of his sin back to the Father. For this work we must key our lives to the heroic note of service. 'If the church is to save itself, it must immediately, in a far more effective and self-sacrificing way, begin to save the world. Time, money and life must be laid on the altar of service. Unless the Baptist laymen shall come to the help of the Lord against the mighty in this present emergency with consecrated money and ability, we are doomed to failure.

The note of evangelism is the trumpet call to soul-saving effort. Whatever difference there may be among us, in this one thing we must keep step with each other and Almighty God as shoulder to shoulder, like a mighty army under his banner of love, we march forward to the conquest of the world and the triumph of his kingdom.

Some years ago a South American firm purchased in the United States the first printing press that was sent down to that country. After it had been set up, the discovery was made that it would not work. The firm called in the best men in its employ but they could not remedy the difficulty. It then sent for other mechanics but they too were powerless. Finally, they decided to send a message to the people of this country who had sold them the press, asking that some man be sent there who could fix it immediately.

Realizing how important this matter was in connection with their future sales in South America, they immediately called in the man who had been most instrumental in making the machine. They explained to him the importance of going South on this necessary errand. At first he refused because of lack of time, but finally convinced by the firm that it meant as much to him as it did to them, he decided to undertake the journey. He was a very young man and when he reached his destination the company that had purchased the press felt that it did not dare to trust such an important job to a man so young. After a little conversation, they told him they would do nothing about it until the next day. . Immediately they sent another telegram to the firm in this country, saying, "The man you sent is too young. Send us one more experienced." Back over the wire went this significant answer, "He made the machine. Let him fix it."

This is exactly what we must do with this old chaotic world. Bring it back to God. He can fix it.

VI. Received Into Glory

These words refer undoubtedly to the ascension of our Lord and they are a fitting climax to this verse. The ascension of Christ is the crown of his incarnation. It is impossible even to imagine such a perfect and divine life closing with the crucifixion. Death could not be the end of "the mystery of godliness manifest in the flesh." We cannot even think that the resurrection, glorious as it was, as a triumph of the Lord of life over death and a victory over the grave, can be the termination of the mission of Jesus on earth. Simply to have risen from the grave would have been to have returned to it again in death, but, to rise thus from the earth into the sky is to return to life eternal.

With the clouds for his chariot and the winds as his steed, he who was manifest in the flesh is now received into glory. The crown, which he had laid aside thirty and three years before is again placed upon his brow. The throne that he had vacated, again he ascends. The scepter which he had put away he takes up that he might rule the world with peace and power.

The Cross it standeth fast;
Hallelujah!
The winds of hell have blown,
Yet 'tis not overthrown;
Hallelujah!
It shall stand FOREVER.

It is the old Cross still;
Hallelujah!
On which the living one
Did for man's sin atone;
Hallelujah!
It shall stand FOREVER.

Old Cross, on thee I lean;
Hallelujah!
I glory still in you;
Hallelujah!
Thou shalt stand FOREVER.

Exhibits of Baptists in various parts of the world will be housed in this building (Nya Teknishka Högskolan, it is called) in connection with the meeting of the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm, July 21-27, 1923

The great glory of our Christian faith is that we have to do with the Christ that is living still. His biography is not that of one who has slept through all the ages in a Syrian tomb; it is the biography of a divine Redeemer, who is alive forever more. His ascension makes heaven real and eternal life sure. It gives us a living Christ and an assurance that our dead are still living with him.

This is the antidote for the poison of spiritualism, which is spreading over our country. The heaven of Sir Oliver Lodge, with its smoking, drinking and golf, is gross materialism compared to that heaven Jesus described when he said, "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you."

The heaven of Sir Conan Doyle, with its restless spirits and talking ghosts, makes a poor substitute for the heaven John unveils in Revelation, where he says, "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away." No more death! Think of it. No hearse will ever rumble over the golden streets of our new Jerusalem. No crepe will ever flutter from the doors of our heavenly mansions. No coffins will be made. No graves ever dug. Health is perennial. Life is eternal.

These are the great truths of which the church of Christ is the pillar and ground, and its great duty is to preach the truth and live the life revealed in these words. Our position is like that of a lighthouse keeper. If we neglect our duty and no light gleams over the sea, many may be wrecked upon their voyage of life.

We are a born-again company. With a divine power for our work, a divine presence in the Book, a divine person in our heart, we cannot fail. Has he not said, "You go, and lo I am with you always"?

Looking up, this morning, into that heaven where Christ was received into glory, we cry: "All hail! Thou Babe of Bethlehem. God manifested in the flesh. All hail! Thou Christ of the Cross, Saviour of the world. All Hail! Thou risen Jesus, Master of Death. All Hail! Thou ascended Lord, enthroned in the skies. All Hail! Thou coming King of Kings and Lord of Lords. All Hail!

The Seventeenth Annual Meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention

Atlantic City, May 23-29

WHEN the convention was held in Atlantic City in 1918 we met under the stress of the war. It was just before Chateau Thierry. Hundreds of the delegates had loved ones over there. That the same waters over which we were meeting in the Steel Pier stretched away to the eastward until they washed the very shores of those countries red with the blood of thousands seemed to awaken our feelings and bring us near to the terrible struggle just across the sea. As we met on the same pier this year we were made conscious of the mighty revolutionary changes since those days five years ago. It seems that no other like period has ever witnessed such far-reaching disturbances of government, such restless unrest of the race itself. Into these world conditions the church of Christ has thrust itself and sought to comfort, clothe, feed and save a distressed world.

It is not strange that in the face of these conditions problems have confronted us which we have seemed unable to solve. The wonder is, and we praise God for it, that so much has been done with so little loss of confidence in and brotherly appreciation of one another. In spite of the storm and stress, perhaps in part at least because of the travail of soul, we have witnessed in the churches at home and in our missions abroad unparalleled spiritual harvests. As the reports have come to hand we have found ourselves constantly saying "God help us to see what he has been doing both in the churches and in the world."

Wednesday Morning

When President Taylor called the meeting to order the hall of the great Steel Pier was filled with delegates from all sections of the country. The convention from the first sensed the seriousness of the tasks it faced and a spirit of worship pervaded all the sessions. After singing "All hail the power of Jesus' name," Dr. Frank Goodchild of New York led the convention in prayer. The executive committee made its report which was received, action on its recommendations to be taken at a later session.

Rev. T. J. Cross of the Chelsea Church welcomed the convention to Atlantic City. He assured us that if again we were ever disappointed in our place of meeting his city could be depended upon. In fact, it could be depended upon any year or every year.

D. G. Garabrant, speaking for the Baptists of New Jersey, called the convention to the serious consideration of our serious tasks and pledged the earnest cooperation of New Jersey Baptists.

President Taylor's address has been printed in full and deserves careful study.

Something Not on the Program

Pres. W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University had been invited to give the keynote address upon the motto of the convention "Thy kingdom come." President Taylor was about to introduce the speaker when a tall, commanding personage mounted the reporters' table and voiced his protest. It was Dr. John Roach Straton of Calvary Church, New York. He said: "We should not permit Dr. Faunce to speak at this time, when there is a controversy on within our ranks. He should not be permitted to expound his liberal views, which are now under criticism. I demand that he be prohibited from speaking and that he be removed from the speaker's platform." The great congregation in no uncertain way voiced its disapproval and sustained President Taylor in his ruling that Doctor Faunce was the guest of the convention and should be treated as such. This action upon the part of Doctor Straton seemed at once to unify and solidify the sentiment of the convention. Doctor Faunce without any reference to the incident proceeded to give his address which was enthusiastically received. The address has appeared in full in THE BAPTIST.

This year the program committee set aside in the program numerous short periods when the convention as a convention gave itself to prayer. The first session closed in this way and the state delegations met to name members of the committee on nominations and other committees.

Wednesday Afternoon

The convention opened with prayer and praise and then the usual formality of filing nominations by state delegations took place. Dr. A. A. Shaw of New York addressed the convention on the subject "Not in Word but in Power." This address will be printed. In the middle of the afternoon the convention again gave itself to prayer.

D. C. Shull for the finance committee asked to have the report of his committee postponed so that it could be made complete by showing the exact financial conditions of the societies and boards. His request was granted.

At Indianapolis the convention appointed a committee on Baptist service. This committee—Henry K. Rowe, chairman, Lydia C. Edmands, Curtis Lee Laws, John E. Smith and George W. Taft—has made a careful study and its somewhat lengthy report brings together a most interesting array of facts concerning the progress of Baptists in this country. We shall from time to time publish sections of this report.

In the evening inspirational addresses by Prof. S. W. Cummings of California and Rev. James McGee of Connecticut brought to a close the first day of the convention. The former spoke on "The New Crusade" and the latter on "Realizing the Ideal."

Mingled Home and Foreign Missions

The whole day Thursday was given over almost entirely to the joint sessions of the home mission societies. In three great sessions we were made to feel the many-sided work of home missions. By arrangement, Mr. F. W. Freeman, president of the Home Mission Society, presided in the morning; Mrs. George W. Coleman, president of the Woman's Society, in the afternoon; and Dr. C. L. White in the evening. Any attempt to visualize these meetings for our readers can meet with only partial success. If our churches could have heard the reports and addresses of this one day it would have resulted in a new appreciation of the scope of our denominational influence and a new conviction as to our responsibility to the world.

The reports of the societies were presented by Secretaries Chas. L. White and Mrs. Katherine Westfall. An interpretation of the Home Mission report was given by Rev. Frank A. Smith. He made clear that every problem that confronts our nation is a home mission problem. The society has never been able to complete its work in a given area before the necessity has arisen to attempt some fresh task.

This past year the society has received many important gifts, among them $550,000 in United States government bonds from Jackson Barnett, a full-blooded Creek Indian. After the death of the donor the full income will be used for Bacone College and Murrow Indian Orphanage. In announcing this gift the government said that our Home Mission Society is "best equipped in every way to carry on in a permanent and satisfying manner the much needed education among the Indians."

The General Education Board has funded part of its recent gifts for our negro schools by transferring to our trust funds $600,000 to be set aside for the permanent endowment of three of our leading schools. The same board has also given a large sum for a science building at Shaw University.

Mrs. O. R. Judd performed a similar service of interpretation for the woman's society. She sounded a note of real encouragement when she announced that the society had reduced its debt by $125,000 during the year. She told of the Christian centers and how the attempt is made to keep them closely allied to the local church. These centers have their day nursery, kindergarten, clubs, classes, industrial school, gymnasium and clinic. Then, too, there are the English classes, the family nights and the Sunday school. It almost makes one's head swim to think of the activities of a Christian center. Then there is Americanization work with the Indians, negroes, foreign groups. Home missions and foreign missions everywhere hopelessly or hopefully mingle, depending upon one's point of view. There is so much of this work that needs a woman's touch, a woman's instinct, and a woman's devotion.

Prayer for a Brother

Secretary F. B. Palmer of Colorado was scheduled to speak on "A New Frontier." A wire told of the critical illness of Mrs. Palmer and his inability to be present. At the call of the presiding officer, Dr. Bruce Kinney led the convention in prayer and a message conveying the sympathy of the assembled delegates and the assurance of their earnest prayer was forwarded to Doctor Palmer and his family.

Rev. Edward Derbyshire, Ohio, spoke on "Serving the Rural Community." He pointed out there is no essential difference between the problem of the country and that of the city because human nature is the same in both. There is the same average intelligence, the same need, the same sympathy, the same common task to bring all to Christ. The country will respond to a call to the same standards as in the city.

Susie Walking Bear was introduced to the convention. The Indian needs Christ and Christian leaders. She desires to return to her people in order to help them.

Pres. D. B. Weeks, of Bacone College in Oklahoma, made a stirring address on "Training the Leadership of a Race." It was clear that he was and is an enthusiastic friend of the red man. He declared that every broken treaty between the Indians and the government has been broken first by the government and never by the Indians. He described the early work of Isaac McCoy and others who labored among the Indians in Illinois. It was he who encouraged the government at Washington to open Indian reservations and himself in Kansas put the plan into successful operation. There are still thousands of Indian children unschooled. In the college, 386 out of 683 are members of Baptist churches. We venture the guess that this proportion will compare favorably with our schools and colleges among the whites. The Osage Indians, the wealthiest tribe, due to the discovery of oil on their lands, are being debauched by money. What is to become of the 360,000 Indians if we fail to educate them?

In certain cities and sections of the East one need not have a very vivid imagination to picture himself in Europe. On the west coast and some parts of the southwest you have many evidences of oriental peoples and customs, for Old Mexico is at your door. One of our workers helped us to understand the problems these oriental peoples are creating for us in America. There are tongs—secret Chinese societies—which exist to persecute Christian Chinese. A petition to the government asking that these tongs be investigated was passed by the body.

Four More "Home" Missionaries

Rev. Joseph Novotny, Miss Carmela Rienzi, Miss Mildred Kaminskie, Prof. I. V. Neprash—four "home" mission workers. Look at the names. The first reminds us of Czecho-Slovakia and Prague. Mr. Novotny is working among his people in New York. He told how the Czecho-Slovaks in this country had a part in securing civil liberty for their European brethren and how now their interest and such help as they could render was in the cause of religious liberty for their people.

Miss Rienzi was born in Italy and is doing "home" mission work in New York. In a sweet, clear voice and in beautiful English she told of her work among her people. Miss Kaminskie sounds very much like a Polish name but she is doing real service as a home missionary in New Jersey. And what shall I say of Prof. Neprash more than that he is a professor in our International Theological Seminary—a teacher of preachers and teachers. He is a Russian doing home mission work.

Miss Blanche Parks told stories of how children and older ones come into a Protestant church to see what it is like. The Christian center is the solution of the problem in helping people to understand what Jesus is like. The children of the neighborhood soon know the name of the Christian teacher and they come to the Christian center because they expect to find something new and probably some one to love them a little more. When the mother finds out that the Christian center helps her children to be better, she sends them and sometimes comes with them.

John M. Hestenes, the newly appointed to supervise the work of the thirty odd Christian centers of the two Home Mission societies, pointed out the danger of the children of our new Americans growing up and into public affairs without any instruction in the Christian religion. In order that the Christian center may be effective, it must gain the confidence of the community. Mr. Hestenes stated that in the community in Hammond, where the work first began, 49 per cent had no religious affiliations. The leaders in the centers must lead in local improvements such as sidewalks, pavements, sewers, etc.; they must lead in social reforms—temperance, gambling and through promotion of civic and educational clubs.

Miss Louise B. Carter was the first missionary of the Woman's Society to Central America—the place where America is narrow and opportunity great. Miss Carter assisted in the starting of our school with forty. It has grown to 186 children enrolled with three American teachers and one native helper. School has grown to the place where our teachers have to say "there is no more room."

Meeting His Need

I SHALL not count my life as vain
If only in some quiet way
I find my chance to serve my Lord,
My debt of love for him to pay.

An unnamed man supplied the beast
Whereon the lowly Saviour passed
Along the way triumphantly,
Acclaimed the promised King at last.

An unnamed man supplied the room
Where once the Saviour broke the bread
And gave the wine—his flesh and blood—
His life—by which our lives are fed.

And unnamed crosses mark the spot
Where common soldiers chance to lie,
Who for the world's true brotherhood
A Sacrifice, feared not to die.

O grant me, Lord, the grace I pray,
If I the quiet paths must lead,
To give my humble gift to thee,
And know I, too, have met thy need.

—PHILIP H. RALPH, British Weekly.

Frederick J. Peters spoke on "Showers of Blessing in Cuba." He worked six months in Cuba without salary. On leaving, Mr. and Mrs. Peters requested prayer for 1,000 souls in six months. They sang and preached the gospel. God gave them 1,507 by the close of the campaign. This nearly doubled the membership of the churches.

Our Guests

The day closed with an unusual program—Dr. Worth M. Tippy, executive secretary of social service commission of the Federal Council of Churches; Hon. Charles H. Burke, commissioner of Indian Affairs; Mrs. Luke Johnson, a southern Methodist director of woman's work in the Commission of Inter-racial Cooperation; and M. Ashby Jones, pastor of the Ponce de Leon Church, Atlanta, Ga. Any one of the speakers gave a message worthy of a whole evening but there were four and Doctor Jones was introduced at ten o'clock at night and the people remained almost to a man. The great hall was crowded and throughout the service many stood.

Doctor Tippy declared that the Christianizing of industry was inevitable because of the sacredness of human life, service, cooperation, character and integrity of men. When the laws of industry are discovered, obedience to these laws is the way of life for industry. The real Christian "drive" in the world is found in love to God with all one's heart and in love to man—in a struggle for human life. Privileged people who love God, whose hearts have been changed, do care for the welfare of unprivileged groups. An interesting situation is beginning to manifest itself. Industry in spots is beginning to take its place beside the great professions like medicine, nursing, teaching and the ministry. Industry must take its place in the struggle for human life. And here as everywhere it is a question of leadership.

The commissioner of Indian Affairs, Hon. Chas. H. Burke, has lived in the West over forty years. He knows the Indians, not as they are in a wild west show or as seen from the window of a Pullman car in Mexico or Arizona. The Indians, according to the commissioner, now number about 335,000 and are scattered over the country mostly in the West. Their estate is now valued at more than a billion dollars. With such an estate it is natural that there are men who clamor to have government supervision removed. Mr. Burke paid tribute to Bacone College and similar schools. He said that the government was bending its energies to get for the Indian an education. There are 60,000 boys and girls in school and of this number 30,000 are in the public schools. Two-thirds of all the Indians in this country are full citizens.

Mrs. Luke Johnson, of Atlanta, in a most pleasing way showed how by the white woman—the "Hindenberg line" in the way of progress in solving inter-racial conditions, was being broken down. She read the challenge of the women of Georgia to the men of Georgia in which they commended the chivalry of the southern white man but declared that mob rule and lynching was not a mark of chivalry.

Mr. Jones gave a great message the heart of which is found in the working principle which he enunciated. "Let the best of one race meet the best of the other about a common table of conference." The working unit is the community. Let neighbors get together and talk over and tackle the problems of the neighborhood. It was an illuminating hour and we were glad we put off sleep to remain to a very late session.

From the Lands Across the Sea

Friday was the Foreign Society's day. We regret that the pressure of business encroached on the time in the sessions so that the program was more hurried than that of the home mission meetings. The business had to do with that which makes missionary progress possible; we are not complaining, only regretting, that missionaries who have been on the other side of the sea for years and whose souls are on fire, have to be tortured by a presiding officer who, with firm purpose, leads them from the speaker's desk after six or eight minutes. Six years, sixteen and in some cases a long life-time of experience on the foreign field, face to face with the conditions which make progress hard and slow—and six minutes to unburden the heart! But missionaries are used to disappointment and there was no word of complaint. There was a smile instead, and a smile gets one farther into the heart of folks than a frown any day.

Mrs. T. E. Adams presented the report of the W. A. B. F. S. The society has lived within its approved budget—$11,000, but its debt is increased. The load of this society is peculiarly hard to bear. For reasons beyond the control of the board its debt has steadily increased until it has reached the alarming sum of $476,000. The society has made its motto for the year "Ask God—tell the people."

In the missionary work there is much to encourage us. When the 25 per cent reduction was put into effect fourteen missionaries were kept at home. All of these have during the year been sent out through friends. One of the buildings put up with Jubilee money has had to be closed and others but partly used. We have seventy women ready to go as missionaries, teachers, nurses and evangelists, but we cannot send them. Six of our women we have released during the year to the boards of other denominations who have sent them out. We have witnessed a wonderful dedication of life to Christ's service and we only regret that we cannot send out our own loyal women under our own board.

W. B. Lipphard presented the report of the Foreign Society. A fraternal greeting was sent to the Baptists of Sweden on the occasion of the anniversary of the beginning of Baptist work in that country.

Prof. F. L. Anderson gave the report of the board. The year just closed has been a far better year than the one that preceded it. At Indianapolis we raised the cry "not one inch more of retreat." The retreat has been stopped, the debt has been reduced and pentecostal revivals mark the year. In accessions to our church, last year was the best in sixteen years. The year which just closed marked the largest number of baptisms in the history of our work. A great Protestant revolution is on in Europe and movements just as significant mark our work in all lands. Christianity is not the religion of the West nor of the East. It must wear the dress and speak the language of the people where it is implanted. There is a growing spirit of independence in most lands. More and more, native leadership asserts itself and proves its worth. Our Baptist principle of the independence of the local church is a godsend in this situation. Northern Baptists believe in the independence of the local church on this side of the Pacific and it remains to be seen whether they will as earnestly contend for that same independence on the other side.

The debt has been reduced during the year until it now stands at $661,000—the lowest figure since 1919. The plans of the society call for a liquidation of the entire debt within the next four or five years, and sooner if possible.

Miss Linnie Holbrook of Assam gave a contrast between 1,000 or more heathen men and women encamped on their way from the hills to market, and a Baptist convention of an equal or greater number, and yet the latter are the children or grandchildren of the head-hunters.

By Faith

By Fred Scott Shepard

We walk by faith and not by sight.—2 Cor.5:7.

THE eye of faith hath seen the Lord,
How drear is all beside!
The vision of his wondrous grace
With me will e'er abide.

The ear of faith hath heard his voice
In tender cadence sweet;
I listen to his words of love
With happiness complete.

The touch of faith hath made him real—
I feel his presence near,
And rest in this assurance blest,
Unmoved by care or fear.

"One of the greatest missionary speeches I have heard in ten years" we overheard a well-known Baptist say at the close of Dr. J. T. Proctor's address, in which he showed the causes lying back of the growing independence of native Christian leadership in China. He showed how missionary experiences and missionary plans are now available for all mission workers in East China. Associations of educational workers, of medical and evangelistic workers with careful tabulation of facts, is making a science of missions possible. All are agreed that the supreme call of the hour is for the development and use of a Chinese leadership. The changes which have taken place are not an accident, but the result of careful planning for years. The schools are giving us trained men and women and we must use them.

A "Live" Movie

The afternoon session was much like what a certain little girl calls "a live movie." The chairman warned the speakers without fear or favor that not the "three-mile limit" but the eight-minute limit would be enforced. She was reasonably successful as an officer of the law. So one after another the missionaries came before us, spoke a few words and then in some cases were led away by Mrs. Montgomery, who presided.

Rev. O. Brouillette, who has represented American Baptists in the devastated areas in France, brought the greetings and gratitude of those who have been helped to get a foothold again. There has been a great increase of interest in religious work on account of this ministry to their temporal needs.

Rev. J. H. Oxrieder said that there is progress, opportunity and need in Bengal-Orissa. The missionary is developing, and with a studied purpose utilizing Indian leadership here. Two stations are now in charge of native workers and the results are good. This movement calls for greater emphasis on education. It is not enough to have Christian native leadership. It must be trained Christian native leadership. Evangelistic work must ever be at the heart of true missionary service. There, as here, men must be brought to personal decision for Christ.

Miss Harriet Price of Kemendine, Rangoon, took the place on the program assigned to Miss Clarissa Hewey who has sailed for her field in East China. The convention joined in prayer for her safe return to her work.

In South India—a country where it is hot for nine months and for three months hotter, Rev. Chas. Rutherford, our "industrial" missionary, has labored for sixteen years. He referred to the Ghandi movement and commented on the fact that the common people who have followed this leader in large numbers say "Ghandi is like Christ." They do not think of comparing him with any of their gods. Christ in India is "making the unfit fit and the fit fitter." Native leadership is asserting itself.

It was announced that Miss Margaret Suman, whose name was on the program at this point, was now on the Pacific on her way back to the Philippines. Miss Ruby Anderson spoke of the work in Japan.

As the period drew to a close the "operator" speeded up and the actors stepped lively and spoke more rapidly. George Waters of Swatow told a word of the awful night when the tornado destroyed several of the mission buildings and 50,000 lives. He said the work was worth all it cost. It is worth while in redeemed lives, in the opportunity for enlistment and training of native leadership, because of potential significance of a Christian China tomorrow and because of the privilege of planting Christian churches which are the centers of Christian influence for the new China.

J. E. Moncrief, whose field in West China is farther in travel time from Shanghai than from New York to that city, spoke. He was followed by Dr. Catherine Mabie of the Belgian Congo, who told of the "marvelous" things God had wrought in that country during the past twenty-five years.

Then there was Geis from the Philippines, Gile from the Congo, Chanev from the land of Judson and, last but not least, W. E. Witter of Assam. He invited the N. B. C. to meet in Assam. He is an old man with the pep of a boy. He was irrepressible, and even this "movie" fails to give an adequate conception of his technique. The audience was with him and the chairman had some difficulty in enforcing the eight-minute limit. We expected to hear a college yell and "What's the matter with Witter?" All that was wanting was a yell leader.

It Was the Climax

While we rejoice in the enthusiasm of a veteran like Mr. Witter our joy is tinged with sorrow because of the knowledge that his work is almost done. The great days for doing things are almost past. We are not, however, left in fear for God's work tomorrow. Our workers are a procession and something more. They are a great succession—an apostolic succession worth while.

On the platform at the evening meeting was a fine group of Christian oriental students and newly appointed missionaries to the number of twenty-five. A dozen or more spoke briefly, telling of the motives which prompted them to give themselves to the work of missions. It stirs one's soul to witness such a sight and each year the service in which new missionaries are presented is one of the greatest interest. God is calling many of our best boys and girls in college and university, here and there, and in their hands the task will not fail. The testimony of this group of appointees was "vividly vital" in the language of one who was greatly moved by the scene. A message from a converted Buddhist priest added another bit of color to the setting, and was a new reason for encouragement. At the close of the meeting, which was of necessity a long one, there was a great movement of the audience toward the platform. Hundreds surrounded these young folks bidding them Godspeed. It was necessary for attendants to turn out the lights in order to clear the hall.

Promotion and Inspiration

In the minds of some there is no connection between a meeting of the Board of Promotion and an inspirational program. This year, however, they were one and the same thing. No single session of the convention surpassed in interest and enthusiasm the session devoted to the board. The chairman, Albert Scott, presided.

The report of the board was presented. Mr. Scott called attention to some matters where the experience of the past year indicated that improvement was possible. We should, for instance, simplify our denominational bookkeeping and have a uniform system of accounting in each society and board. We could then speak the same financial language. We should more thoroughly correlate the state conventions and city mission societies with our general work, always remembering that the Board of Promotion is only a board of promotion. As a denomination we should at once set in motion activities and processes which will help develop the local church. He congratulated the denomination on having such a piece of machinery as the Board of Promotion.

As far as the national societies are concerned, Dr. J. H. Franklin declared that they had no desire to go back to the old competitive methods. No denomination of more than a half million of members has equaled the per capita giving of Northern Baptists during the period of the N. W. M. We have been too ready to proclaim our failures and too slow to recognize our successes. We have not reached our financial goals it is true, but "unless a man's reach exceeds his grasp what is a heaven for?"

Dr. J. F. Watson told of the benefits of a united program which has lifted and enlarged thousands of churches and brought a new denominational consciousness.

The schools and colleges have not received 30 per cent of the funds of the N. W. M. but 15 per cent, according to Dr. F. W. Padelford. Still great advancement has marked the period. During the three years $5,500,000 has been secured for our schools. Four colleges have been reopened. It is the smaller schools which have most benefitted. Our denominational interest in our own schools is responsible in part at least for an increase in the number of students from 26,000 when the survey was made to 34,000 in 1922.

The women are for a united program. They can render a far-reaching service in the closing year of the five-year period, said Mrs. J. D. Rough, by showing what women can do toward completing our task; by getting back of the stewardship campaign and by promoting in their churches the spirit of unity and loyalty.

The Heavenly Home

Life changes all our thought of heaven;
At first we think of streets of gold,
Of gates of pearl and dazzling light,
Of shining wings and robes of white,
And things all strange to mortal sight
But in the afterward of years
It is a more familiar place
A home unhurt by sighs or tears,
Where waiteth many a well-known face.
With passing months it comes more near.
It grows more real day by day,
Not strange or cold, but very dear—
The glad homeland not far away,
Where none are sick, or poor, or lone,
The place where we shall find our own.
And as we think of all we knew
Who there have met to part no more,
Our longing hearts desire home, too,
With all the strife and trouble o'er.

—Robert Browning.

Rev. D. B. McQueen told how the united program has helped him as a pastor. It has made possible fair-dealing with the less spectacular causes which do not have the popular appeal. It saves him the embarrassment of special appeals and numerous special pleaders. It has fostered the spirit of team-work and given a new spirit of denominational solidarity as he has called his church to the side of sister churches for a common task. It has aided in clarifying the views of his people. It saves the pastor and the church from a policy of opportunism or drift. It also conserves the pastor's energy.

The measure of a man's soul is in his outlook and uplook. A man with a mean outlook may use great terms as he turns his face toward heaven, but he has a little God. In an address in the inimitable Franciscan style the pastor of the First Church, Los Angeles, told of the meaning of the N. W. M. to his church. Its reflex influence on the membership was of untold value. In the campaign which lasted six weeks, sixty-seven four-minute speakers delivered 126 speeches in his own church. "The N. W. M. has done ten times as much for our church as we did for the movement." It generated a decent family pride. They did for the denominational work outside the church what was to them the impossible. This, however, is the way it worked. Instead of saying "We have done so much for the N. W. M. we have nothing for advance work at home," they said, "If we can do so much for objects outside our field what can't we do right here at home." Great heroic action does not grow out of two-cent motives. We must not forget the awful mortgage of gratitude we owe to God for Christ.

Mr. James C. Colgate, treasurer of the Board of Promotion spoke. He said that the position of treasurer gave an opportunity to study human nature. He likened our denomination to an automobile. There have been times when it was evident something was wrong. The motor meter showed heat. The engine lost its hum. Here and there a cylinder was not firing. What was the trouble? I can only guess for I'm not an ecclesiastical mechanic. You have plenty of them here. One says one thing and another another. My guess is carbon in the cylinders. Not so very serious, but serious while it lasts. You can get rid of carbon. Here at this convention I think I hear the hum coming back into the motor. We will not die on the grade. We will go up on high and increase our speed as we near the crest of the hill. Every time I get out on this pier and look and look as far as the eye can see I hear those words "There's a wideness in God's mercy like the wideness of the sea."

The Committee of Nine

Earlier in the week the Board of Promotion had appointed a committee of nine to review the whole denominational situation. The finance committee and other committees cooperated most heartily in an effort to get at the root of the matter. The report was given by Hon. Carl E. Milliken and because of its importance is printed below. In connection with this report we will also publish that of the finance committee.

"The committee to which you submitted the task of studying the present situation of our promotional program, of finding a solution of the problems connected with the debts of some of our organizations, and determining the relation of both of these to the program of next year, beg leave to submit the following report:

"We have found it no easy task to determine the solution of our difficulties. They are many and perplexing. We have given them most careful thought and study. We have sought the counsel of as many as possible who had constructive suggestions to make. We are ready to assert that we believe that our difficulties can be overcome, that our problems can be solved, and that we can bring our New World Movement to a successful and glorious issue during this last year. The victory is ours for the taking.

"We wish to say to ourselves and to you, that this is no time for discouragement. True, we did not last year secure the full ten million dollars which we set as our goal; our receipts were less than those of the previous year; our debts have not been wiped out; we have found it necessary to contract our work at many points. But there is another side to the story which we must not forget. We are three years away from the day when our pledges were taken—these pledges were made at the peak of the recent period of financial prosperity—many of our people since that day have suffered financial reverses—the country has passed through a period of serious depression—our movement has been subjected to severe criticism in many quarters by those who did not understand our methods or our motives. But in these three years we have collected for our benevolent work thirty million dollars; our churches have experienced a marked spiritual awakening; our missionary work at home and abroad has undergone a great development; and during this last year we have had the largest ingathering on the foreign field in our history.

"Why should we not lift up our hearts and rejoice? Why should we not call upon our hearts and all that is within us to bless his hold name? It is the note of thanksgiving that should be sounded throughout our constituency. We challenge all our fellow workers to sound this note abroad.

"In our judgment the most important thing just now is to create a new morale throughout the denomination. What do we mean by this 'morale'? It has two equally important elements—'The confidence in the worth-whileness of our task and the confidence in our own ability to accomplish it.' There is among us no doubt as to the worth-whileness of our task, but there is, in some quarters, serious lack of confidence in our ability to accomplish it. It is this confidence which we need to restore. We believe that this can be done. More than that, it is the most important task of the immediate future. We believe that the series of conferences and luncheons planned for the early fall will help tremendously in this direction. If they can be made to reveal to some degree the great achievements of this period and give our people a vision of the things yet to be done we shall kindle an enthusiasm which will carry us to victory.

"One of the serious factors in the present situation is the excess payments of last year to the states and cities. The fact is that in nearly all cases this excess payment was in accordance with the vote of the administrative committee authorizing the states to hold these funds as a part of the last receipts. The representatives of the standard city mission societies have unanimously voted to return these funds to the general board. The representatives of the states have also taken a similar vote, almost unanimously. We do not fail to appreciate the attitude of our brethren in recognizing thus the equities in the situation. To return these funds, however, in some cases would work serious detriment in our missionary program, and in many cases it would automatically and despite all the efforts which the secretaries could put forth, create questioning and disappointment in the constituencies in the states.

"We recommend, therefore, that instead of seeking the return of these funds from the states and cities we leave them with these organizations and add the total amount thus released to our undertakings. This applies only to such excess amounts as were retained in accordance with the action of the administrative committee. All additional amounts should be returned to the General Board of Promotion, except in those cases for which the finance committee has made special provision, and states which did not retain the full amount to which they were entitled by the action of the administrative committee should be reimbursed from this sum to that full amount.

"We wish to make it clear that no demand for such action has been made by the state secretaries. The proposal was initiated in our committee. The state secretaries are unwilling to accept this arrangement if there is any implication that it is a preferential treatment. There is no such implication. We have made this recommendation because we believe that it will help as can nothing else in retaining for our entire cooperative program the loyal, enthusiastic support of our great state and city constituencies. We also believe that it will relieve the state and city secretaries from serious embarrassment and enable them to enter wholeheartedly into the plans for the current year. The state secretaries have agreed that in case the Board of Promotion adopts this recommendation they will adjust the inequalities within their own group by the creation of an equalization fund from the excess payments. We therefore make the above recommendation. We believe that in many cases these funds will be used to accelerate the promotional program of the next year and will return us many fold. The finance committee has built the budget for the year on the basis of this recommendation.

EDUCATION must be made more personal and spiritual, less machine-like and lifeless. All that I know about pedagogy is contained in a verse in the twenty-third psalm, "My cup runneth over." When the full, strong personality comes close to the small or vacant mind, something spills over and the little empty mind is filled with new inspiration. Our best teaching consists in the things we never try to teach, not in what we say, but what we are. Education is not a matter of files and indexes and catalogs, not a matter of grades and diplomas; it is the touch of life on life, and the truest, highest life is that which shares the insight and the purpose of the Man of Galilee.—W. H. P. Faunce, in convention address.

"We have consulted the finance committee of the Northern Baptist Convention as to the actual debts of the denomination and the various participating organizations. The finance committee reports to us that the total obligations are as here given. We have had no facilities for making an intimate study of these facts ourselves but we report them exactly as the official body of the convention has reported and approved them.

"The indebtedness of our various organizations is $1,822,619.73. The underdrawings form an additional amount of $1,848,740.30. The total amount including all reported obligations of all participating oragnizations is $3,671,360.03.

"In the last analysis these are obligations, not of boards and societies but of our churches themselves. The boards are simply the agents of the churches.

"Having incurred these obligations there is only one thing for us to do, and that is to acknowledge them, assume them and pay them. We can do nothing less, therefore, than to make a determined effort to raise this total amount in addition to our current obligations. The amount of money needed to finance all our organizations for the current fiscal year is $8,409,096. Add this to our debts and underdrawings and include $50,000 for a contingent fund as the finance committee suggests and we have a total budget of $12,130,456.03. This is the amount therefore which the committee believes we should assume as our financial goal for the current year.

"This should not seem an impossible or even a staggering amount, when we recall that we secured an even larger sum during the first year of the New World Movement, that this represents our entire missionary and educational activities, that our people are entering upon a new period of prosperity, that we have an obligation to pay all our debts and that in a spirit of loyalty and pride, our people can be depended upon to make a heroic effort to bring this great movement to a successful issue.

"Without question we shall need a generous supply of new funds to attain our goal. These funds are in the hands of our people. They are ready to invest them in these great undertakings if we will but present the cause in the right way. To this end preparation should be made well in advance to launch after November 15 a campaign to secure the balance in new gifts and pledges. Each church will select for this canvass the time most suitable to its own local conditions.

"This campaign should have two aspects: The canvass of each church for new pledges from those who have never given and from those who are able to make a new gift over and above the payment of their old pledges; and, in the second place, a personal appeal to our people of large means for generous gifts with which to close the movement.

"The plans for this new campaign should be worked out in each state according to the local conditions. It will furnish a splendid opportunity for mutual helpfulness among our churches in the development of a real spirit of neighborliness.

"One of the most helpful features of the first campaign three years ago was the large participation by our lay forces, the four-minute speakers and the church-to-church visitation by groups from neighboring churches. We can gain much by recalling these forces into action. Large participation by our laymen in such activities will of itself almost insure success of our efforts and will result in most helpful relations between the churches themselves.

"The canvass within the church should be made most carefully and systematically and as thoroughly as it was made three years ago. This campaign should be carried on cooperatively. Surely we would not abandon that principle, but in the effort to secure the n gifts from our people of means, each participating organization should be encouraged to make contacts with individuals who are known to be interested in its special work. These individual contacts will undoubtedly result in many gifts.

"While these contacts are to be encouraged, the General Board of Promotion should be responsible for seeing that definite plans are made to reach every individual able to make a substantial gift.

"We have considered with great care and from many angles the request of the Woman's Foreign Mission Society that that society be permitted to include in its operating budget $150,000 for its deficit and to appeal directly to its constituency for those items of work upon the foreign field which would then have to be removed from the budget if the total were to remain at the figure authorized by the finance committee. If there were to be no concerted effort toward caring for the indebtedness of all the societies, or if we did not sincerely believe that this effort would be a successful one, our attitude toward this request would be different. We believe, however, that the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society would itself prefer to join in the united campaign to close the New World Movement with all obligations of each society fully met, than to be permitted to make its own appeal and thus reduce its deficit by $150,000. We therefore recommend that we express to the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society our desire that it will continue to participate fully in the plans which the General Board of Promotion puts into operation, and also our earnest hope that not only $150,000, but its entire deficit may be raised.

"There is little inspiration in the word 'debts.' It will not be easy to raise money for deficits and the less said about these the better. The attention of our people should be focused upon the achievements which we have attained and the tasks which await us. These should be set forth in the most attractive and alluring fashion. Our people can surely be challenged by them.

"We have made a great gain during these years in the development of the cooperative spirit. It is a gain which we would under no circumstances be willing to sacrifice. We need now, however, to re-stimulate the interest of our people in the various activities which make up our great denominational program. These should again be brought to the front. This can be done, we believe, without sacrificing our gains in cooperation.

It is a great task that stands at our doors, but it is a challenging task. One of our state secretaries has remarked since coming here, that this will be the greatest year in the history of the denomination. It is a great ideal which we have before us, to complete this long-sustained effort of the denomination, with every bill paid, with our work remarkably advanced, with a spirit of cooperation among our people, and with a zest to attempt even greater things in the days to come. 'We can do it if we will.' 'We can do it and we will.' 'Our God is able.'"

Report of the Finance Committee

The Finance Committee recommends to the convention for its approval the following operating budget for the fiscal year 1923-24:

| | Share First Distributable $7,000,000 | Per Cent. | Total Approved Budget |
|---|---|---|---|
| American Baptist Foreign Mission Society | $1,148,350 | .16405 | $1,446,215 |
| Woman's American Baptist For. Miss. Society | 408,660 | .05838 | 502,327 |
| American Baptist Home Mission Society | 508,410 | .07263 | 698,879 |
| Woman's American Baptist Home Miss. Society | 310,100 | .04430 | 375,000 |
| American Baptist Publication Society | 187,390 | .02677 | 245,562 |
| Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board | 548,450 | .07835 | 737,865 |
| Board of Education | 120,050 | .01715 | 127,500 |
| Schools and Colleges | 1,859,970 | .26571 | 1,859,970 |
| Northern Baptist Convention | 23,500 | .00337 | 47,300 |
| Baptist Young People's Union | 20,000 | .00285 | 20,000 |
| State Conventions | 931,420 | .13306 | 1,185,231 |
| State Conventions—Promotion Budgets | 200,000 | .02857 | 235,000 |
| Standard City Mission Societies | 392,070 | .05601 | 416,617 |
| General Board of Promotion | 280,000 | .04000 | 425,000 |
| Foreign-speaking Bodies | 36,630 | .00523 | 36,630 |
| Federal Council of Churches | 25,000 | .00357 | 25,000 |
| Roger Williams Memorial | | | 25,000 |
| | $7,000,000 | 1.00000 | $8,409,096 |

These budgets are substantially the same as the budgets for 1922-23, the experience of the various societies and boards in the matter of collections for the past year not warranting the Finance Committee in increasing the budgets, although the committee realizes the necessity for doing so, and hopes that the receipts will increase during the coming year.

While the total amount of the above operating budget is $8,409,096, this is not intended, and should not be understood, as abrogating the rule laid down at the Indianapolis Convention, namely that $7,000,000 shall be the maximum of the distributable funds and that after such amount has been reached the excess shall be applied as provided in the report of this committee approved by this convention at Indianapolis.

The foregoing operating budget sets forth the expenditures which the Finance Committee recommends for the convention year 1923-24. The difference between the total of the budget and the assumed distributable funds of $7,000,000 represents the expected income from investments, legacies and matured annuities.

Indebtedness

The various organizations report indebtedness aggregating $1,822,619.73, made up as follows.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| American Baptist Foreign Mission Society | $661,540.10 | |
| Deduct amount included in the 1923-24 operating budget for debt reduction | 175,000.00 | |
| | | $ 486,540.10 |
| Woman's American Baptist Foreign Miss. Soc. | | 474,203.94 |
| American Baptist Home Mission Society | $220,000.00 | |
| Deduct unexpended appropriations included among Soc.'s liabilities | 31,065.64 | |
| | | 188,934.36 |

Underdrawings

Further, the amounts of underdrawings to April 30, 1923, by our various organizations are as follows:

|---|---|
| Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board | $ 799,310.50 |
| Board of Education | 23,061.01 |
| American Baptist Publication Soc. | 4,221.67 |
| 52 Schools and Colleges | 988,045.98 |
| State Conventions | 30,118.84 |
| Northern Baptist Convention | 1,586.94 |
| American Baptist Historical Soc. | 299.42 |
| Danish Conference | 299.42 |
| Norwegian Conference | 299.42 |
| Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America | 1,497.10 |
| | $1,848,740.30 |

Summary of Needs

A summary of our financial requirements during the fiscal year 1923-24, if we wish to complete the five year period with all debts paid and underdrawings made good, is as follows:

|---|---|
| Operating Budget | $ 8,409,096.00 |
| Indebtedness of various organizations | 1,822,619.73 |
| Underdrawings to April 30, 1923 | 1,848,740.30 |
| Contingent fund | 50,000.00 |
| | $12,130,456.03 |

The foregoing amounts do not include approved askings for budget "specifics" as follows:

|---|---|
| American Baptist Foreign Miss. Soc. | $ 550,000 |
| Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society | 360,000 |
| The American Baptist Home Mission Society | 371,000 |
| Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society | 192,500 |
| American Baptist Publication Society | 100,000 |
| Board of Education | 9,000 |
| | $1,582,500 |

The above specifics, aggregating $1,582,500, will not be disbursed unless funds are specifically contributed therefor.

Basis of Distribution

With respect to the funds to be received during the fiscal year 1923-24 the committee makes the following recommendations:

1. Contributions not applying on pledges made prior to Nov. 15, 1921, and designated for work of any society or board are to be paid to the organizations for which donors designate them (when so reported to the Board of Promotion) in addition to the organization's pro rata share of distributable funds.

2. The promotional expenses for the year 1923-24 (both General Board and state boards), the bank debt of the General Board $276,000, certain special needs of 36 states $60,741, the Roger Williams Memorial $25,000, and extra budget of the Northern Baptist Convention $23,800, are to be paid from distributable receipts of the first $7,000,000 on a graduated monthly basis at a rate not to exceed an average of one-twelfth each month and each participating organization is to be charged with its pro rata share of the total of such payments.

3. The first $7,000,000 of distributable funds (after allowing for proper adjustment according to paragraph 2) are to be pro-rated on the percentage basis approved at the Indianapolis Convention.

4. All distributable funds beyond the items stated in paragraph 2 and 3 are to be paid to the various organizations in proportion to their indebtedness and underdrawings as heretofore stated in this report.

Extra Budget Allowances—1922-23

A severe typhoon destroyed a portion of our property at Swatow. The committee allowed the Foreign Mission Society to make an appeal and solicit for $50,000 to rebuild our property.

On account of the critical condition in Europe, and especially in Russia, the committee authorized the Foreign Mission Society to seek the collection and expend the sum of $166,000 for relief work in Europe, this amount being added to its budget as a specific.

Special Advisory Committee

Your committee has felt for some time there should be some outside body, not connected with any of the boards or societies, and not having membership in the Finance Committee, to make a study of all the societies and boards, their methods of keeping books, finances, plan of operation, salaries, efficiency, and to advise this committee whether the best methods are being pursued, and also to outline a policy for the future which will tend to the greatest efficiency. Your committee therefore appointed Raymond B. Fosdick, chairman; Trevor Arnett, George W. Bovenizer, J. Herbert Case, and William D. Gherky, all of whom are residents of New York City or vicinity, except Mr. Gherky, who is a resident of Philadelphia. We have called this body of men an advisory committee of the Finance Committee. This advisory committee has employed competent accountants who are going over the books of all the societies and boards and are obtaining complete data upon which said advisory committee will finally base a report. Your committee feels that the personnel of the advisory committee is such as to insure a report which will be of lasting benefit to the denomination.

An Appeal to Complete the Task

Your Finance Committee wishes at this time to make an appeal to every pastor, church, delegate to the convention, to all its officers, to the boards and societies, to the state conventions and their secretaries, to our city mission societies, to all school and college workers, and to every one who has any interest in our denomination and its great missionary and educational enterprises to join in one united effort, forgetting all past differences and all mistakes which have been made by any of us, and to give of our time, our talents and our energy unreservedly to the completion of this task.

There are approximately $20,000,000 of pledges unpaid. Allowing for some decrease in the aggregate of our pledges, due to deaths and financial reverses, if the balance of our subscriptions are paid in full, and new members do their part, we will receive an amount sufficient to cover our budget and care for all deficits and obligations.

To accomplish this result, however, plans should be made at once by each church and every church member to see that all subscriptions to the five year program are met in full before the close of our present fiscal year, April 30, 1924. Do not wait until the closing months!

Respectfully submitted,

D. C. SHULL, Sioux City, Iowa, Chairman; WOODS A. CAPERTON, Indianapolis, Ind.; GEORGE W. COLEMAN, Wellesley Hills, Mass.; ORRIN R. JUDD, New York City; FRANK H. LINDSAY, Milwaukee, Wis.; CORWIN S. SHANK, Seattle, Wash.; WALTER A. STAUB, New York City; AMBROSE SWASEY, Cleveland, Ohio; JOSEPH C. HAZEN, Orange, N. J., Secretary.

Baptist Educational Progress

The business of the Board of Education was quickly disposed of and the following officers elected. President, C. M. Hill; vice-president, E. Hulley, and recording secretary, R. A. Ashworth.

Pres. W. G. Spencer of Hillsdale delivered an address in the course of which he made clear that education is not alone the power to adapt one's self to environment, but also the power to create and change environment. Culture is more than the product of good taste, good manners, knowledge and thought. True culture is the product of vicarious living. Culture involves thinking, action, emotion, confidence and respect. Jesus is the supreme type of culture for young people in college.

> THE Board of Education has from time to time voiced its conviction regarding the essential character of our Christian schools and colleges. In this day when the state is investing such immense funds in education and maintaining such splendidly equipped schools, there is but one reason that justifies the Christian church in asking its members to maintain another system of schools parallel to the first, and that is the desire to give its children an education in a Christian atmosphere, under Christian auspices, by Christian teachers, an education which reflects the mind and the spirit of Christ. We believe that he is the supreme revealer of the truth of God. It should be the ambition and the determining purpose of these institutions to discover and to reveal the mind of Christ to their students. Only as they exalt him as the touchstone of thought and character are they true to their mission. We believe that the development of strong, true Christian character should be the ultimate aim of every school or college that bears the name Christian. We believe that our schools are earnestly seeking to approximate this ideal. It is the ambition of the Board of Education to help them in every way possible to achieve this end.—From Report of Board of Education.

Dr. Frank W. Padelford presented the report of the Board of Education.

Summary of Report of Board of Education

The outstanding event of the year has been the retirement of Dr. Ernest D. Burton from the chairmanship of the board. Since the organization of the board in Philadelphia in 1911 he has held this responsible position. To our educational interests as represented in the activities of this board, he has devoted himself with untiring energy. The denomination can never estimate what it owes to him.

The Progress of Our Schools

Only those who keep in intimate touch with the educational situation can know how marked is the progress of our schools. They have shared in the national educational advance of the last decade. Ten years ago many of our schools were deeply concerned as to how they might attract more students. Today most of them are struggling with the problem as to what to do with the crowds of eager students who are clamoring for the privilege of an education. In 1919 when the Survey was made, the reported attendance at our Baptist schools and colleges was 26,462. In the short space of three years this leaped in 1922 to 31,158, an increase of seventeen per cent. The enrolment of this current year is still larger.

The development of our institutions is reflected in these significant comparisons:

| | Value of buildings and land | Amount of endowment |
|---|---|---|
| 1897 ..... | $15,594,601 | $ 8,944,153 |
| 1912 ..... | 27,034,749 | 34,566,233 |
| 1917 ..... | 31,930,381 | 45,577,118 |
| 1922 ..... | 48,783,893 | 73,769,418 |

Most of our cities and states are groaning under the increasing burden of taxation. Much of this increase has been due to the necessity of supplying the demand for more and better educational facilities. Great streams of money are being poured into our public-school system. We can not hope to maintain our system of Christian schools by the side of, or under the shadow of, these state schools without an increasing stream of contributions from those who believe that here in America there is a distinct and important mission for our Christian schools by the side of our splendid system of public education. Our Christian schools must be equal or superior to our state schools if they are going to be worthy of their name or of their mission. The visitation of our schools has revealed the fact that many of them are in desperate need of increasing facilities and income. They need housing accommodations and laboratories as well as funds to meet enlarged expense.

New Equipment Provided

While these needs are pressing hard upon our institutions it is most gratifying to note the progress which is being made in meeting these needs. For the progress in this direction during the last three years our schools are largely indebted to the New World Movement. Many schools have been sadly disappointed that they have not been able to make more of the improvements which they planned when the movement began, but it is doubtful if any other three years have seen so many improvements in our plants. Here is a partial list:

Grand Island College, Grand Island, Nebr., has been entirely renovated and has been reopened for work.

Keuka College and Cook Academy in New York have rebuilt their plants and reopened their work after having been closed for several years.

Vermont Academy in Vermont has also been renovated and reopened after a suspension of several years.

Bucknell University in Pennsylvania has erected a new engineering building and enlarged its chemistry building.

Carleton College in Minnesota has erected a splendid new chemistry building.

Linfield College in Oregon has built a new gymnasium and refitted a science laboratory.

Sioux Falls University in South Dakota has just begun the erection of a gymnasium.

Colorado Woman's College is paying for a new dormitory and chapel erected just before the New World Movement began.

The University of Redlands in California has erected a science building, a new dormitory, and an art building.

Berkeley Theological Seminary in California has completed a new building, including chapel, dormitory, and classrooms.

Broaddus Junior College in West Virginia has built a physical education building which also provides for the library and several class rooms.

Alderson Academy in West Virginia has finished a most complete school building which houses nearly all its activities.

Des Moines University in Iowa is paying for the large plant which it purchased three years ago from the Presbyterians.

The Frances Shimer School for Girls in Illinois is erecting a new dormitory to house its rapidly growing classes.

Perhaps the finest building erected is the new chapel at Denison University in Ohio, the gift of one generous Baptist layman.

Stephens College in Missouri has built a new science building and two new dormitories and has purchased the plant of the Baptist church to provide equipment for its Bible class and other religious work.

Shurtleff College is finishing the first unit in its series of new buildings for women.

We are glad to carry the University of Rochester on our list of schools because of its Baptist foundations and traditions, though it is not now under Baptist control. This institution, through the generosity of one of Rochester's citizens, has erected a building for its new school of music, which is the last word in architecture for that purpose. Through the gifts of this same generous citizen and of the General Education Board, the University is soon to establish a medical school, and a large tract of land has been purchased upon which it is expected that the enlarged university will be built.

The Financial Returns

The Board of Education would like to emphasize the importance of making a heroic effort during the last year of the New World Movement to round out this period with a full payment of at least the fifty-two million dollars that were reported as subscribed in 1920. It is well known that owing to the exigencies of the missionary societies and state conventions in 1920 and 1921, the schools and colleges failed to receive a large portion of their share of the New World Movement funds. Few of the schools have any serious disposition to complain, but all of them have been greatly disappointed, and some of them have been left in a critical situation. They are burdened with debts and have been unable to meet the increasing demands of their growing student bodies.

Many of our schools, especially the younger schools, have profited most decidedly by their participation in the New World Movement. Others, especially the older schools, have failed to receive their usual accretions and have been held back by reason of their inability to go into the field for the solicitation of funds. Because of this situation the Board of Education expresses the strong hope that the Board of Promotion will utilize all its splendid forces in bringing the New World Movement to a most successful issue during the ensuing year.

Report of Committee on Gifts with Doctrinal Conditions Attached

The Northern Baptist Convention at its meeting in Des Moines, June 25, 1921, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Northern Baptist Convention refer to the Boards of the

The Land of the Midnight Sun

Baptists attending World Alliance will be in time to view the midnight sun.

BY J. E. GROLUND

IN the coming months of July Baptists will see Sweden and Sweden will see Baptists at the Baptist World Alliance to be held in Stockholm, July 21-27. But delegates coming from the Great Land of Liberty ought to be planning to reach Sweden, the Land of the Midnight Sun, a few days before the World Alliance opens in Stockholm. Delegates will be able, at a very small extra expense, to go up and see one of the grandest sights that they have ever seen—the sun shining at midnight. How wonderful it will be for people coming from a land where the nights of the summer are dark as the nights of autumn, to see the sun shining all night!

We consider it worth coming from any part of the globe to view the midnight sun, since we have seen in ourselves at the time the picture, appearing on the cover, was taken. During the space of time measured by fourteen months, or from July 7, 1920 to Sept. 7, 1921 we were in ten different countries. Naturally we saw a few things very interesting and beautiful, but we feel that nothing can be compared with the mystical and gorgeous midnight sun of Sweden.

Do not make Stockholm the pole of your summer vacation trip, but continue a little farther north if you have come to Sweden to view the midnight sun or to see nights without darkness. A seventeen-hour ride on the train will bring you to Are one of the biggest tourist's places in Sweden. There is a vast difference between Stockholm and Are in regard to "the white nights of Sweden." At Are it is possible even as late as between July 15-20 to read the newspaper at midnight without artificial light. But it must be understood that the sun is not visible all night at Are.

Delegates wishing to view the midnight sun will continue a little farther north. The distance, measured by the hours an express train requires between Stockholm and Abisko is thirty-eight hours. Starting from Gothenburg a few hours are saved for any one having Are or Abisko in mind, by going over Orebro rather than first going to Stockholm. At Abisko the midnight sun is visible up to the twentieth of July. Thus delegates, making plans to reach Sweden a few days before the Baptist Congress, have, as it may be for the majority, the one chance in a lifetime to view the midnight sun. Those planning for anything so big, for the promulgation of the kingdom of God, as the Baptist World Alliance, should not deny themselves the opportunity to see such a wonderful piece in God's majestic creation, as the midnight sun, the best illustration of our future homeland, where darkness has no place.

With the Baptist World Alliance in mind, and a big party of American, British and European Baptists going up to see one of the great wonders of the world, we have spoken to the railroad authorities in Stockholm about train facilities. And the officials promised that they would gladly give us, if desired, an excursion train with second and third-class sleepers, and, if necessary, first-class, that would take us from Stockholm, or Gothenburg, if preferred, to Are, or to Abisko where the midnight sun may best be viewed. The train would then wait for a night or two, while some other sightseeing was done, and the sleeping-cars be used as hotels, unless one prefers the Tourist Hotel at Abisko.

The price per ticket on an excursion train will, to some extent, depend on the number of people going. We prefer to give an estimate of the regular railroad fare for the round trip from Stockholm or Gothenburg to Abisko and back to Stockholm, including sleeper: third-class about $30 and the second-class not over $50. From the same points to Are and back to Stockholm: third-class about $20; and second $30. Naturally it will be $2 or $3 less per ticket—Stockholm Are—than from Gothenburg. The price on an excursion train carrying 250 persons would be somewhat less per ticket than the prices above quoted. Any one conducting special parties can get special cars on a regular train, if desired.

Delegates interested in the Baptist progress in Sweden will wish to visit Orebro, where the Baptist second theological school is located. The school is known in Sweden as the Mission school, having had for the last two years a few students more than the Bethel theological school in Stockholm. The Orebro Missionary Society, having now more than 50 foreign missionaries, has its home in Orebro. Three good Baptist churches are also to be found in this city. The historic Castle of Orebro must not be forgotten. Orebro lies fifteen English miles off the main line—Gothenburg, Stockholm—and is thus easily reached in forty minutes' time.

I hope, that the suggestions laid out in these lines would change some prospective delegate to a sure-to-come delegate to the Baptist World Alliance, that will meet, as an American has said, "in the most beautiful capital of Europe."

Permit me to state that it does not take so long to reach Stockholm as some might have imagined. Only eight days from New York to Stockholm, provided delegates take the shortest route. It will be a nice little vacation, and you will get away from part of the hot days of summer to the fresh breezy days of the Land of the Midnight Sun.

Popularity Plus—Or, the Tale of a Hurried Man

THE Hurried Man was white and very pleasant. He wore pieces of glass fastened on his face. Sometimes he made a mistake when he spoke, because he had grown up speaking his own white language and not this brown one. But he made very few such mistakes, and nobody cared about them, anyhow, because his remarks were so truly spellbinding: all about anything you chose to ask, but always—from the middle to the end of them—he managed to bring religion. You might begin with that ache in your back—he ended with God. You might begin with that pain in your knee—he ended with God. And that was as it should be, for India may be full of dreadful ailments, but India is also full of heartfelt longings, and the days of a Hurried Man were neither long enough nor many enough to answer all the puzzled questions that his patients asked and to do the myriad things we sent him out to India to do. He was, I think, like Peter in the book of Acts, whose very shadow falling on the sick brought blessings! Yet the Hurried Man lived among people so poor and so hopeless themselves that they seemed like nothing but shadows themselves until a new hope was given them.

There was, for instance, the hope in his hospital. Now a hospital is a job in itself, when you consider that a patient rarely arrives alone. No, there will be relatives galore come to camp around the sick one both to watch and criticize the cure, and besides the relatives there will be pots and pans—for of course you have not forgotten that India is full of caste, and one caste may not eat with another caste or even take food from the pot of another caste's cooking. Therefore one's own pots and pans must be brought to the hospital, so that fond relatives can protect the food. It was all a terrible nuisance to the Hurried Man: for the relatives were noisy—they kept patients awake; the relatives were dirty—they mussed up the hospital; the relatives were curious—they fingered all the things they should not finger, and asked questions when he was too busy to answer. Yes, it took diplomacy and tact to ship half of the relatives home and to secure a little peaceful corner in the hospital compound where the others could camp out in safety and prepare their caste meals. Daily he prayed for this diplomacy, and daily the Lord enabled him to develop new branches of the art, which was one of the causes of his growing into "popularity plus." For the Hurried Man continually reminded himself: "I am all the doctor and all the surgeon and all the drugstore and all the dentist and all the oculist that these poor brown people have! I am all the trainer of nurses, all the compounder of drugs, all the diagnostician—I must not fail my hospital."

And he did not fail it. That hospital flourished like a green bay-tree—there were never, by any chance, enough beds for all the patients; you would always find them strewn along the hallways and verandas until there was need of a special sign: "Watch your step!" It was too bad of us here at home not to have sent out more money to enlarge that hospital decently, for it was abominably crowded and outgrown and inadequate. It was asking a good deal of the Hurried Man to have him perform major operations and minor operations in a makeshift room on a very out-of-date table. But he was getting used to it now. Doctors who follow the Great Physician have skill that is peculiarly God-given; it does not rest on equipment or surroundings. Nevertheless the Hurried Man would have been less on a strain if he had not had to invent new ways and means at every turn. For aside from his hospital there was his community.

The streets of that town were high-walled lanes, unclean and unsanitary; there were the steaming, sunless homes of the rich, harboring dirt indescribable; there were the dirty mud huts of the poor, breeding diseases and epidemics ready to break out any moment; and above all, outside the village walls, there was the outcaste palem where the leather workers lived. Never as long as he lives will the Hurried Man ever smell smells as unforgettably noxious as the one that hangs like a pall over the outcaste villages of India. Such a place is not fit to enter, with its stench of decaying animals, the refuse of an entire village festering in the sun; but the Hurried Man has patients galore in that palem, and he would not skip them by for love or money. He is working a quiet wonder out in that filthy place—do you see, on the very outskirts of it, some huts that are actually whitewashed? Well, they speak for themselves in their frantic attempt at cleanliness! For the dwellers in those whitewashed huts were patients of the Hurried Man—it was to them he spoke first of aches and then of God, first of fevers and then of God, first of pills and then of God. So that by the time they were cured, they were willing to get down into this new religion which sent a Hurried Man to touch "untouchables" and heal them. By encouragement, example, and religion they cleaned up their houses with whitewash.

"You see," smiled the Hurried Man, "I am all the board of health these people have! I am all the commissioner of public safety, I am all the purifier of foul wells, all the boiler of vile water, all the fumigator and disinfector and inoculator, all the sanitary inspector. I must not fail my community!"

And he did not fail it. For year by years there were more whitewashed huts, more boiled drinking water, more practical common sense displayed in times of epidemic and less frantic praying to the wooden image of Pedamma, less horrible orgies when buffaloes, goats and fowls were tortured with slow death and their blood scattered far and wide in mad heathen debauchery. No, the Hurried Man did not fail his community; but after all, he is only one man and he cannot do everything. Centuries of old customs made the worship of Pedamma seem a thousand times more necessary than inoculation or vaccination. And besides his hospital and his community we expect him to keep an eye on the outlying districts. He is the only person to do it. . . . he is all the doctor they have—and all the preacher.

So whenever he can spare a week, or even a day, he goes on tour through those neglected fields which worry him at night when he should be getting sleep and storing energy for a busy tomorrow. Going on tour is not as simple as it sounds: there are coolies to be sent ahead with tent and food supplies. There are boxes of medicines and bandages to be taken, and the gramaphone. Oh yes, always the gramaphone, as you shall hear later.

As for the tour itself, the Hurried Man hates it, for it wastes so much time just to sit in a rickety cart and be pulled by leisurely oxen for tedious mile after mile. But when he finally reaches his destination there will be his tent in place, and likely as not a can of spaghetti cheerfully bubbling over a fire of hot faggots. But there is no time for the Hurried Man to snatch even a bite to eat, for the maimed and the halt and the blind for miles around have heard that he is coming and already their sore eyes, their crippled legs and their horrible sores are on display: "Look, Sahib, look, can you cure this mammoth growth on my neck?" "Just see my knee, is there hope?" "Give me a pill, give me a pill! I was first, Sahib! May my ancestors all turn into frogs if I was not here ahead of this outrageous scallawag."

He loses no time! He could spend ten years in that one group of persons and not finish curing them, such is their ter-

sible ignorance of their own bodies; but he spends one kaleidoscopic day hearing their symptoms and prescribing his pills. It is all he can spare them: One day—for there is still his own hospital, one man's full job; there is still his own community, also one man's full job. And now—this. A hundred square miles of it, dotted with little villages, full of other sick folks. . . .

"I must not fail these poor neglected people in my outlying districts," he says. And he does not fail them! When night-fall comes the sound of his gramaphone is heard in the air and families come hurrying from all ends of town to hear the Box-That-Sings-Like-a-Person. When they seem subdued into quiet listeners, the Hurried Man speaks to them very simply about God. Have they never been hungry in their hearts for a God of love and mercy and justice? Ah yes, Sahib,—they all nod, they all sigh, they all listen. There under the starlight they sit listening as long as he will talk. Then some of them walk home to their little mat huts, but many linger to ask him questions, for he is all the minister they have ever known; he is all the Sunday-school teacher and all the father confessor; he is all the theological seminary professor; he is even all the lawyer. It is long past midnight when they leave. And he is tired.

But he knows that he must not fail other brown people tomorrow so before he lies down he kneels in prayer: "Father," he says, "it has been a hurried day, too hurried for me to do my best for thee, but in thy infinite mercy and understanding wilt thou bless the words I have said and the pills I have given. Bless all those little sad girl mothers with their weazened feeble babies—Dear God, how cruel India is to girls! Bless all the wasted tortured adult bodies, those crippled limbs, those sightless eyes, those anxious hearts. Oh Father, how hungry India is for thee! Give me both strength and courage to face another tomorrow, and in my absence help Soonderaya to care for my hospital patients. I have left undone the things I should have done, but thou knowest my frame, thou rememberest that I am dust. Breathe into me thy divine fire and use me tomorrow. For Jesus' sake, Amen."

But I fear that even in his sleep, he hurries! For hurry is in his blood, hurry is in his muscles, hurry is in his nerves. For this job of being "popularity plus" is too strenuous: you can see for yourself that really he needs a Ford; really he needs an assistant; really he needs a suitable hospital; really he needs, above all, an interested Baptist church membership in America—Baptists like you and like me to pray and to pay: "Here, God, is money for thy work in India. Restore unto me my common sense and let me realize that the nervous breakdowns of thy missionaries are due to the amazing tightness of my pocketbook. Amen."

Two Fountain Pens

(Copyright, 1923. The Judson Press. All rights reserved)

By Dr. Avery A. Shaw

I have here two fountain pens. One, you see, is very plain—just black rubber. The other is very handsome. You see how this silver filigree-work shines and how large and handsome it is. It certainly has this little fellow beaten for looks.

But I am going to tell you a secret about these pens. This little plain modest pen, without any frill or filigree, is worth half a dozen of this big handsome fellow. Why? Because little "Blackie" is always to be depended upon, and you never know when big "Silversides" is going to fail you. They spent so much in decorating the outside of the pen that they missed the important thing of making a good, serviceable pen out of it. Sometimes it works fairly well for a while, and then it skips a word or two. Then when you have shaken it and have written the word over, and have got a fresh start, out comes a lot of ink and spoils your letter; and then it always leaks and blackens your fingers. Besides all this, it has a rough and scratching pen point. It says on it "14 karat," but as the Scotchman would say, 'I hae ma doots." You can not be sure the mark tells the truth.

You know there is a proverb about that. Can any of you remember it? "All is not gold that glitters." We might improve the grammar of that proverb if we said, "Not all is gold that glitters," but this is not a grammar lesson.

Now I wonder if you have ever seen people like these pens?

Here is a boy of fine form, handsome face, and expensive clothes, right in the latest styles. But his handsome face does not match some very ugly sins in his heart, and in spite of all his fine dress he is very unreliable. You cannot depend on his word. You can't rely on his doing what he promises to do.

But here is another very plain and unassuming boy—perhaps he has a turned-up nose and a freckled face and poor clothes, but he would scorn to tell a lie, or say or do what was not right, and you can always rely on him to do what he says he will.

Which would you rather HAVE, big "Silversides" or little "Blackie"? Well, which would you rather BE?

Now I wonder if any of you can guess my text? It is in First Samuel 16:7, where Samuel is trying to pick out the man whom God had chosen to be king of Israel. Eliab comes before him, tall and strong and handsome, but God said: "Look not on his countenance, nor on the height of his stature; because I have rejected him, for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but God looketh on the heart."

The prayer we need most to pray is, "Create in me a clean heart, O Lord, and renew a right [that is, a dependable] spirit in me."

The Two Pipers

He was a long-haired bard;
His daddy was a plumber;
All winter long dad labored hard;
The son worked spring and summer.
And, though he saw some verse in type,
No payments came for days,
And dad makes more at laying pipe
Than the son makes piping lays.

Training for Church Membership

E. W. Annable

In my pastoral work I have had a number of the younger Sunday-school scholars present themselves for baptism.

In order to help them as much as possible in their preparation, I prepared a study of church membership, which, of course, is supplemented by regular instruction.

Perhaps this study might be of some assistance to brother pastors. It is not supposed to be complete in itself, of course, but I find it gives the children a fairly good start in some of the simpler truths which they need to know.

Church Membership.

Four great truths regarding uniting with the church:

1. We confess our sins and our need of salvation. (1 John 1:9)
2. We acknowledge Jesus as our Saviour. (Act 4:12)
3. We promise to live for him. (Gal. 3:27)
4. We pledge ourselves to helpful service in his church. (Gal. 6:10)

Four great truths are taught in the ordinance of baptism:

1. We are not saved from sin by baptism, but follow Christ's example. (Mark 1:9-10)
2. The Bible teaches that Jesus was immersed. (Rom. 6:3-5)
3. Jesus commanded his disciples to immerse believers. (Matt. 28:19-20)
4. Baptism by immersion is the sign to the world that we are Jesus' disciples. (John 17:23)

Four great duties for church members:

1. To live according to Bible teachings. (2 Tim. 2:15)
2. To support the church by our presence and offerings. (Heb. 10:25, 1 Cor. 16:2)
3. To do our part to send the gospel to all the world. (Matt. 5:14-16)
4. To do nothing that will hurt the church and the cause of our Lord. (Eph. 4:31-32—5:15-21)

Obligation:

To read our Bibles, and to pray. (Col. 3:16, 1 Pet. 4:7 Eph. 6:18, Josh. 1:7-8)

GREAT MEN AND WOMEN OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

REVIEW OF QUARTER'S STUDIES.

Two women and nine men have been studied in the lessons of the past eleven weeks. There is a reason why these persons of ancient times have lived through all of these centuries and will live through all the centuries to come. What is it that has made these men and women worthy of a place in the records the Bible hands down to us out of the thousands of other men and women living at that time? As you think of Abraham, Joseph, Moses, Ruth, Samuel, David, Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Nehemiah, Esther—what characteristic of the person instantly comes to mind? There is always a reason why God chooses to move through men. In any of these cases is the person one who holds back, or is he one of initiative, one who talks with God and awaits an answer? Is he one who believes that God is guiding his life and that he must follow that guidance?

Studying history through biography is a delightful and effective way to study it. Familiarity with the records of the lives of the characters taken up in this quarter's work brings Old Testament history very close to the student and in a manner that makes it living history. It does more than give us mere records of these nations of olden times; it shows us always the plans and the working of God—a just God, who demands loyalty and obedience of his children; who punishes unfailingly when he must, but only when he must. His forgiveness is ever ready for the penitent. His justice, his firmness, his loving kindness, his all-seeing eye is felt as the lives of these outstanding characters are taken up. Many who find the New Testament precious because it contains the life and sayings of Jesus are inclined to neglect the Old Testament. But in so doing they are losing much, for unless they see the God of the ages, the God that men worshipped before the birth of the Babe, and see his dealings with men and nations as revealed to us in the Old Testament, they cannot appreciate the Son that he gave as fully as they otherwise might.

Diligens on Childhood

By Roy L. VanDeman

"I've been thinking, Diligens, about children. There are so many of them and so many kinds. They are different from each other. There are dreamy ones and bright ones and slow ones and good ones and I've sometimes been almost tempted to think there are bad ones."

Diligens had just got through with a short article by a Philadelphia man in the Church School and was about to return from lunch to work when Proctor had intercepted him. "Let's go for a little turn in the park, Diligens. Yes, I read that article. I've been thinking about childhood myself. I've been trying to think myself back to a boy again. You remember that bit of a poem we used to like—'Make me a boy again just for tonight?' That poem is a sort of a blessed link for me, a tie between the man and the boy of me."

They fell silent awhile as they walked through the park. Diligens went on, "One thing seems pretty clear to me about all your different children, Proctor. They may be differently balanced but each of them is one child. A life is a unit, old or young, and we must think of a child as a single inner self not as a waiting mansion of empty rooms with other rooms to add as we reach the teens and the twenties."

"I do not see just what you are driving at, Diligens."

"Look at it this way. Shall we develop the same capacities, utilize the same motives, and work with the same characteristics in the church school which we appeal to in the public school or shall we suppose that religion requries an education based on principles different from those of other education? Does a child have to use the same mind and heart on Sunday which he has used Friday? There are a good many rooms in his little house of life but only one child lives in them. Isn't that so?"

"It seems to be Diligens."

"Very well then. If a child has already made the great decision in his heart that he will be Christ's child forever is that the end of religious training or the beginning of it? Shall we give him the chance now to utilize the best educational means that his stage of civilization affords him to gain the knowledge, cultivate the attitudes and fix the habits which belong to his religion? Or suppose he has not yet come to conscious allegiance to Jesus Christ as his knight and Saviour? Do we owe him the top quality of educational training looking to religious efficiency in the years to come?"

"I see no conflict whatever, Diligens, between nature and nurture, between education and evangelism, between leading children toward Christian life decision and leading them toward trained Christian minds, ideals and habits."

"Nor do I. But look at this, Proctor. How is it that we regard the religious education of our children as belonging alongside their public education and think of it as ten times more important than their general education, but actually provide for it less than half as well?"

The young Presbyterian elder answered, "I do not believe that that is true."

"But I can prove it. I have the facts."

"Would you be willing to give them at Rotary next week? We have just had a wire from the speaker cancelling his engagement."

"Yes, I would be willing. I think it would be worth doing."

Instructional Material for Prospective or New Members

By H. G. Weston Smith

Many of us feel that we, as Baptists, should have some more practical means of instructing prospective or new members as to the history and meaning of the great church to which we belong.

There is much wholly aside from the present doctrinal controversy that, with real benefit, can and should be taught new, and, for that matter, old members.

My own feeling was, and is, that this material is largely lacking in convenient form. Our Sunday-school materials supply it in part. Still, there is need for material that any pastor can use in a group that he brings together, giving, of course, his own personal interpretation to the principles and facts suggested.

Last year the material that we used in our own instruction work was printed in the form of twenty-six questions and answers, all contained in a four-page leaflet. At the suggestion of a number of our denominational leaders who had seen the leaflet, mention was made of the matter in The Baptist last year; as a result about 4,000 copies were sold or distributed throughout the country, about half of this number being gratis. Scores of letters indicated that the pamphlets were used and proved helpful. The distribution cost us only about $10 more than we received, and the letters of appreciation were worth at least $300.

Any who wish the pamphlets for use in their evangelistic work may secure them again this year from Mrs. H. G. Weston Smith, 1925 Harrison Avenue, New York City. They will be furnished at 3 cents each in lots of 100 or less and at two and a half cents each in lots of more than 100.

Questions answered are such as these: 4. What is the origin of the Baptist church? 5. Why did the Ana-Baptists form a group by themselves? 6. How did Baptists come to be in America? 10. What has the church achieved? 12. What does it mean to be a Christian? 13. How do we become a Christian? 18. How shall we regard the Sabbath? 20. What does the church expect of its members? 23. What are some of the principles quite commonly held by Baptists? 25. What is the form of our church government?

MISSIONARY MEETING: THE NEGRO IN THE NORTH.

John 14:5-7.

Advertising the Meeting.

Use the picture on the front cover of the leaflet "Our Northern Negro" (General Board of Promotion, price 3 cents), showing a young negro gazing raptly at St. Gauden's statue of Lincoln. Letter the poster, "What is he thinking?" with time and place of meeting.

Helpful Literature.

Like the January program, this also is based upon "The Trend of the Races," by George E. Haynes. The following leaflets are available from the General Board of Promotion: "Olivet—a Negro Center", 5 cents; "Schools for Negro Youth in the Southland," 5 cents. The Survey gives interesting facts.

The Northward Trek.

Sixty years ago 92 per cent of the negroes lived in the South. Soon after the war a migration northward began, increasing year by year, until in 1910 the proportion in the South had decreased to 89 per cent. Now only 85 per cent are in that portion of the country.

The steady stream of negroes flowing from the South grew during the war to almost overwhelming proportions. Within less than eighteen months the colored population of Chicago increased from 44,000 to 110,000; Detroit suddenly found itself with 42,000 negroes instead of less than 6,000.

Many and varied causes contributed to this unprecedented migration. Ravages of the boll-weevil and flood conditions, crop failures, and other economic causes, forced workers to look elsewhere for a livelihood. General dissatisfaction with conditions, poor housing, poor school facilities and, in some sections, rough treatment, directed longing eyes to other more promising fields. Meanwhile the North, humming with industrial war-time activity, faced a serious labor shortage. Cessation of immigration had cut off the supply from European countries; war had called home thousands of aliens; our own country's entry into the turmoil withdrew from industry hundreds of thousands of workers. Steady work at high wages awaited all comers.

Moreover, the North offered better school facilities, better housing and opportunities lacking on the farm or plantation. Reports of high wages and unusual treatment of negroes in the North attracted families by the thousands. In some cases the entire membership of church or of social organizations migrated in a body.

"There were four classes of negro migrants. The first class was composed of the floating casual laborers largely produced by the past system of economy under which they have worked and lived. The second, the majority, were the thrifty, middle-class, honest, hard-working, semi-skilled and unskilled workers who sought better wages, better conditions of labor, and better living conditions. The third class comprised a considerable number of skilled artisans, such as carpenters, brickmasons, and tailors. These three classes were accompanied and followed by a fourth class, a number of enterprising business men, such as small retail shopkeepers, insurance-agents, and solicitors, and a number of professional men—doctors, lawyers and ministers. The wives and children, aunts, uncles, cousins, and other members of families completed the number that made up nearly half a million or so migrants who moved North between 1915 and 1920."—"The Trend of the Races," pp. 29, 30.

The great bulk of this migration settled in the cities. Acute housing conditions immediately followed. The negro sections became overcrowded, and were forced out into localities theretofore exclusively white. Where negroes moved into such neighborhoods they were forced to pay higher and often excessive rents. To pay these heavy charges rooms were crowded with lodgers, bringing physical and moral ills to all concerned.

Negro Churches of the North.

Negro churches do not suffer from lack of attendants. Crowded pews are more in evidence than half-filled or empty ones. The northern exodus created an acute situation. Churches held simultaneous services in different parts of their buildings to accommodate the crowds. Baptists, unable to find a church home within reasonable distance, entered other denominations. These people had grown up in churches; most of their social as well as their religious life centered about the church, and they were lost without it.

In an incredibly short time the membership of small churches doubled and trebled. Newly organized churches grew from mere handfuls to 1,000, 2,000, 5,000 or even 10,000. In five years the number of negro Baptist churches in Detroit increased from five to thirty-eight.

Negro churches deserve high praise for their work in caring for the thousands of strangers during their period of adjustment. Olivet Chuch, Chicago, opened information and employment bureaus which were advertised in the negro weeklies, and found homes and employment for those who would otherwise have been adrift in a strange city.

Negro Leadership.

Among negroes the minister and the school-teacher have always been recognized and honored as leaders of their race. Baptists have reason to be proud of their record in training such leaders. Among the graduates of thirteen of our mission schools and colleges there are 1,535 teachers, 741 preachers, and 570 physicians.

Convention Meeting Place

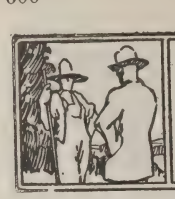
The Boston Convention of the Baptist Young People of America will meet in some of the most historic churches of our denomination. The main meetings will be held in Tremont Temple, that building which was the result of the far-sighted planning of Deacon Gilbert, and which has had in the past such prince of preachers as Dr. George A. Lorimer and P. S. Henson. Its present membership makes it the largest Baptist church in New England, with crowded services morning and evening. It was here that Dr. Robert Stuart McArthur had his important summer ministry for the last fifteen years.



Converse Hall is most beautifully and attractively arranged. The frieze about the ceiling bears names of all the important Baptists of history. The organ is one of the finest in the United States. This, the "stranger's Sabbath home," is a great evangelistic center.

The afternoon conferences will be held in the First Baptist Church on Commonwealth Avenue and Clarendon Street, on Clarendon Street near Tremont. The First Baptist Church was organized in 1665, and has had a continuous history to the present. It was in the old meeting-house of this church that the protest was made against the standing order. Because of the members' non-conformity the doors were nailed up, but in the course of time the fight for religious liberty was won. The present church is a merger of four churches, and has an unusual ministry to the thousands of Baptist students who attend the educational institutions of higher learning in Boston and vicinity.

Clarendon Street Church was made famous by the ministry of Dr. A. J. Gordon. It at present ministers to a great lodging-house population. Its forum has given it a splendid place in the minds of hundreds of common people, and it is the last remaining Baptist church in this particular section of Boston.

The Sunday afternoon and evening service will be held in Symphony Hall. This is the home of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is a building of unusual beauty and attractiveness. Its acoustics are perfect. It will make a most fitting place for the final meetings of the convention, and the staging of the last pageant.

All of these buildings are within ten minutes' car ride of the heart of Boston, and will be within easy walking distance of many of the delegates.

Our Own Folks

Boston Letter

By Charles H. Watson

Anniversary Week

The larger glory of Boston's formerly famous Anniversary Week has departed. Now it is little more than a week of sectarian meetings nearly all of them pertaining to Unitarian activities. Quite different from the old heroic period when great moral issues were up that were destined to shake the nation and the world, when suffragists were looked upon as freaks, and when the hot abolitionists made wordy war on Lincoln because he believed too profoundly to make the haste that they were bent upon making.

It was an interesting time. Oratory was seeing its best days, courageous conviction was common, and so were the men and women who "would be heard!" Agitation and agitators had the floor continuously. Now, oratory has changed, courage has become "indiscretion," and agitation has paled into cool and orderly "propaganda." The unheroic routine of religious education has taken possession. It is not necessarily inferior, but it is different. It seems like the difference between fire, and cool and gradual illumination. Certainly different from the days when almost shaggy reformers defied the chill drizzle of anniversary week, warmed themselves at their own inward fires, and like the old patriots at Concord, fired guns that were heard 'round the world. That was the time that inspired the genial autocrat to christen Boston the "Hub of the Universe." Its centrifugal moral activities were bigger than mere conventional religion was able to be.

This Week

The city has so grown that an ordinary anniversary gets lost in the crowd. And with persistent chilliness it almost went into cold storage. At first, the old orthodox drizzle threatened, and we were feeling natural as we noted "delegates" with the familiar combination of straw hats, overcoats, umbrellas, and goloshes. But skies cleared finely, coolness reigned, and overcoats and convincing speakers, gave our Unitarian brethren quite a week.

Of course they lacked "fundamentalists" to agitate their differences, and "spill their beans." Possibly they would be in line with President Sperry of Andover who uttered a prophecy that may startle some of our Baptists. He said, claiming that he was planting himself firmly upon historical precedent—"Fundamentalism is merely a brush fire that will burn itself out." Many who seem determined to keep the fire alive, will be disposed to doubt that prophecy.

Atlantic City

We have been passing through our annual fear of disruption while the earnest contention has been going on in our great convention at Atlantic City. It is creditable to Baptists that no one can forecaste what will develop when our hosts gather. Evidently we are yet free, and are without a steam-roller attachment, up to date. Let us hope the time will never come when it cannot be said, "Wherever a Baptist is, there is liberty!" At the other extreme from the old Roman hierarchy, there we remain.

The delicious thing that annually pops up at the critical moment in our great assembly is the "unexpected." Some extremist, highly radical, without taking counsel with any other flesh than his own, suddenly takes all his rope, and goes so far that he shocks his own faction. It has happened, perhaps it will happen again—and the result is not altogether unwholesome.

Some of our returning delegates are to share with us their indelible impressions on the Fourth. The comforting conviction is annually strengthened that under all surface agitation our people are holding up the Lord, and would draw all men to him. Loyalty to Christ, and to the spirit of Christ, is the overcoming combination in us that holds us together, and that will give us the victory.

City Missions

Boston Baptists have never permanently majored on city missions as now they promise to do. Instead of being languid and incohesive, lately we seem to have girded up the loins of our minds, soberly conceived the city problem, and organized to solve it. Rev. Charles L. Page, the director, has brought to the work plan, personnel, and far-reaching effectiveness. So many interesting missionary elements center in a great city, that it gets attractive when they are all touched, and begin to respond with their own tone and color.

At the recent annual meeting, Director Page tapped some unexpected reservoirs, and their responding flow was a delightful surprise. Only when the Christian touch brings out its richness can the racial variety appear at its best.

One of the great incidents of modern development is the gathering of enormous urban populations around old centers. They are largely alien, or else indifferent, to our faith or its proclamations. When that indifference is probed by a live ministry and a loving message, and it becomes responsive, we find ourselves in the realm of Christian fascinations, sometimes even of romance.

Winchester

A town of unmistakable attractiveness is Winchester. Such a bower of beauty right on the rim of the great city, comes to you like a revelation, as your approach is along the boulevard or parkway that skirts the winding edges of lovely Mystic Pond. Fresh Pond, Spot Pond, Spy Pond, Mystic Pond—they fleck the more beautiful nearer suburbs of the city, and seem to have set the standard for loveliness, and the towns around their shores have come up to the scale.

We have a church of high character there, and one that is marked with cultivation and self-respect. Its location, just out of noisy traffic, yet in everybody's way, where a church should be, is ideal. The minister, Rev. Clifton H. Walcott, who came to them from a notable pastorate at Sharon three years ago, is solidly building a sturdy church body, and already pastor and people are dreaming of a new house for work and worship—one that in every way will be worthy of the devoted church and the beautiful town.

Now for Newton!

We are right on the edge of commencement week. Before this letter gets in type, we shall have revelled in "Newton Night" at the Social Union. We shall have looked over the unusual senior class, who with the faculty, will be the guests of the Union, and Mr. C. L. Seasholes, the pastor elect at Watertown, will have spoken for a most promising company of young ministers.

When President Hyde of Bowdoin had passed away, his widow, with a sort of impulsive prescience, handed her husband's watch to Prof. Kenneth C. M. Sills of the Bowdoin faculty, saying to him that she "was certain that he was able to keep it going." Professor Sills was soon made president of Bowdoin, and it was certainly befitting that he should be the principal speaker at "Newton Night," on "The Need of an Educated Ministry." Mr. Albert L. Scott, president of the board of trustees, brought the board's message to the Social Union. As to the particulars of this, and the other feasts of commencement, shall not the appointed chronicler tell The Baptist family all about them?

Twin Cities Letter

By Don Mac

The notable event since the last Twin Cities letter was the fortieth anniversary of the organization of the Calvary Church of Minneapolis. On Sunday, May 6, 1883, the church was formally organized with twenty-four members, all but one coming to it from the First Church. It was soon after duly recognized by a council called for that purpose. The church was organized under the leadership of Rev. W. W. Pratt who became its first pastor and the first of a splendid succession of able and useful ministers of Jesus Christ. Mr. Pratt was succeeded in 1884 by Rev. G. I. Morrill who served for ten years and was succeeded by Rev. Herbert F. Stilwell—1895-1898; Rev. Loren A. Cleveger, 1898-1903; Rev. Arthur T. Fowler 1903-1909; Rev. Franklin W. Sweet, 1909-1919; and in 1920 came the present pastor, Rev. John H. McLean.

Rev. John A. Earl, minister of the First Church in St. Paul, preached a strong sermon on Sunday morning, on "The Call of Progress." In the afternoon at 3:30 there was a united communion service. The evening service was a union gathering of the Judson Memorial Church, a daughter of Calvary and a nearby Bethel Presbyterian Church. On Monday night, May 7, the anniversary dinner was served. There were greetings from the First Church by Dr. S. Marx White; from the Minnesota state convention, by its executive secretary, Rev. E. H. Rasmussen; in behalf of the Minneapolis Union, by its president, Rev. John H. McLean, the pastor; and for the Baptists of forty years ago, by Donald D. MacLaurin.

This church has maintained throughout this significant period of its growth the splendid "unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." It has a strong, evangelical, progressive and able membership in its personnel, both as to men and women. It has a fine church building though it will soon need a larger auditorium in order to accommodate its growing congregation. The church has the earnest congratulations of all the Baptist brotherhood in the city on this eventful achievement and the brotherhood is confident it will continue to grow splendidly in the coming decades.

Dots

The youngest church in the brotherhood is the Lake Harriet Church, located west of Lake Harriet in a new and rapidly developing part of the city. The church has as its pastor, Rev. Mr. Fred H. Fahringer, formerly of Chicago. He is a thoroughly active, aggressive and progressive minister of evangelical type and is rejoicing over the constant additions to the membership. The school board demanded the present site for an addition to the plant in the community and the church was therefore forced—much to its gratification now—to relocate on what is believed to be one of the finest sites in the community. The young church has the full sympathy and cooperation of the brotherhood in the city as expressed through the Baptist Union.

It is reported that Professor Nixon of Rochester Theological Seminary, where he went from Judson Memorial Church, is secured for supply during the coming vacation. He will have a cordial reception from the church membership which remembers his ministry with appreciation. Rev. Henry F. Waring has been supplying the church as pastor ad interim for the whole winter season. He closes his work the first of June. His ministry has been acceptable in every way. He will be glad to continue that sort of ministry wherever the door shall open. He was formerly pastor of the Berwyn Church near Chicago.

Minneapolis pastors are regretting that Doctor Henderson of the University Church is still unable to take up his work because of his recent illness. He may be obliged to take a rest for a month or two more. He has done an immense amount of work, and since the passing of Doctor Pope much more of the responsibility for the great enterprise has rested on his shoulders.

The old Immanuel Church on Bloomington avenue and twenty-third street, Minneapolis, which was sold by the Temple people to the Free Evangelical Church, is being repaired. The building, always beautiful, has taken on again the old forms that were a delight. The people are glad it has fallen into such worthy hands.

The writer is expecting to spend the summer in outdoor life in the state of Washington but expects to return East in the fall when he will be glad to serve any church.

The Arizona Convention

In the make-up of last week's issue, several lines were dropped from the final paragraph in the report of the Arizona State Convention. These lines are herewith given, completing the report:

It was generally agreed that the two outstanding addresses of the convention were given by laymen—one by Harold A. Fickett of Douglas on "The Layman and Evangelism," and the other by Dr. W. W. Watkins of Phoenix on "Stewardship and the Work of the Kingdom." On the closing day there was held the young people's session, at which time emphasis was laid upon the coming Baptist State Assembly to be held at Carr's Ranch July 27-August 5. It is hoped that a large delegation of the Baptist young people and families of Arizona will attend.

Northern California Convention

By F. Carl Truex

The seventy-first session of the Northern California Convention met with the First Church of Oakland, May 8 to 11, Dr. John Snape, pastor of the church, presided for the second time.

The theme of the convention was "The Kingdom of God," and every address was on some phase of kingdom service. In the address of welcome, delivered by the president, the ideals and hopes of the convention were set forth. The keynote of his address was the church's welcome to the convention because of its interest in the kingdom of God.

Special mention should be made of Dr. J. N. Garst's message. He preached the annual sermon on the subject "Christ Preeminent in the Kingdom."

When Dr. C. W. Brinstad, executive secretary introduced the speakers and workers who had come into the convention since the last annual meeting, we were delighted to find that many strong men had joined our ranks, and we are sure because of this addition of strength and spiritual power that the convention will go forward in the kingdom service in the coming year.

Dr. George M. Lehigh, pastor of the First Church of Porterville, was asked to conduct the devotional service at 11:45 each day. The spiritual atmosphere of the convention was largely influenced by these addresses delivered by Doctor Lehigh.

Space will not permit calling attention to all of the work done by the convention during the past year, but I must glean a few of the special achievements from the report of the board of directors. When our convention was asked, in keeping with all the other societies and conventions of the denomination, to reduce its expenses 25 per cent, our board after making a careful survey of the field did more than it was asked, by reducing our anticipated budget 34 per cent, in order that our resources might be applied on the payment of the accumulated debts of the national societies. This will explain why the receipts were $14,000 less than they were the preceding year. The total receipts for 1922 were $226,901.38; 1923, $212,495.12; total disbursements for 1922, $198,981.46; 1923, $213,331.21. Doctor Brinstad called our attention to the fact that during the month of September, 1922, our convention stood thirty-fourth in the list of state conventions in the percentages paid on pledges to the New World Movement. Month by month, we have risen in this scale until we stood first among the state conventions, according to the last official statement made April 1, 1923.

Another significant statement made was that the opposition to the New World Movement is waning and for the first time in seventeen years practically every Baptist church in Northern California has contributed to the denomination. Nine missions have also made regular contributions. The report revealed that we are supporting, in whole or in part, 104 men and women who have given their full time to kingdom enterprises in Northern California, and that we are now preaching the gospel among native Indians, negroes, Mexicans, Portuguese, Russians, Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, Chinese, Japanese, and Syrians.

Special mention should also be made of the work of the board of education, under the leadership of Dr. M. L. Thomas, director of religious education, working through the Sunday schools and young people's societies, conducting daily vacation Bible schools.

This report would not be complete without mentioning the work done by Dr. Luciele Withers who worked under the direction of the Board of Promotion, and Miss Naomi Fletcher, the coast Americanization secretary. These two women have done good work in our churches and among the foreigners in our midst.

Attention should also be called to the work done by our evangelistic committee, directed by Arthur V. Willey. Nearly every church in Northern California had some kind of evangelistic meetings during the year. This accounts for the large increase in membership and baptism, and the waning of opposition against the New World Movement.

The women of the convention did well in the Continuation Campaign, under the direction of Mrs. C. E. Tingley. The rapid strides made by the Bay City Union under the superintendency of Dr. C. E. Tingley, is a notable event in Baptist history during the past year. Too much cannot be said of the work done by Dr. C. W. Brinstad who has been our executive secretary for more than sixteen years. Year by year he has built up the convention work. The fact that our convention stands in the lead in per-capita giving, is largely due to his efficient work.

Neither would this report be complete without speaking of the other people who appeared on our program. There were so many able addresses delivered that comment cannot be made

O God of the Storm

By H. R. Carstens

O God of the storm, with its howling, rough blast;
With its power, and its fury, and flash—
In the midst of whose raging the weak cannot last,
In a landscape that's rent by its dash—
O, give me a soul like the storm, I pray,
To crush all that hinders my heavenly way.

O God of the flower, that bends over the stream,
And sways to and fro in the breeze—
With its sweet fairy face like some delicate dream,
As it bows to the towering trees—
O, give me a soul like the flower, I pray,
That my life may be humble, more humble each day.

O God of the sky, with its vastness of space,
Where the far-distant suns blaze bright—
Where systems have vied in an infinite race,
Through the ages, by day and by night;

on all of them, but special mention should be made of those delivered by Dr. F. A. Agar, New York; Dr. C. M. Hill, president of Berkley Baptist Divinity School; Dr. Charles Shepherd, Berkeley; Dr. Thomas B. Frizelle, pastor of Fresno First Church; Dr. P. H. J. Lerrigo, New York. Rev. C. A. King was an inspiration to all in his unique way of conducting the song service.

There were 398 registered delegates and guests from ninety-three churches. There are about thirty-five persons going to the Baptist World Alliance from California. On the whole, Baptists of Northern California are optimistic and we believe all the splendid achievements of the past year give evidence of the presence of God with us, and that we have abundant reason to look forward to the future with the expectation of continued blessings.

We meet next year with the church at Dinuba.

MAINE

NORTH LIVERMORE: After a pastorate of nine years of strong constructive service, Rev. J. Frank Jones has handed in his resignation to take effect July 1.

BELFAST: Pastor George C. Sauer and the church have developed the young people into a strong force. At the recent meeting of the Lincoln Association Mr. Sauer delivered an address on "Working with Young People."

BREWER: On a recent Sunday nine persons were baptized by Rev. Howard A. Welch. This church, though the youngest of the four churches in the Bangor district, now has a membership of over 300 with a Sunday-school enrolment of 310. Last year $5,311 was raised, of which $2,100 was for missions. A church school of missions was held last year with seven sessions and a total attendance of 588.

SEVERAL YOUNG PEOPLE of the Second Church, Calais, will attend the summer school at Machias and the school of methods at Ocean Park.

RHODE ISLAND

THE PLAINFIELD STREET CHURCH, Providence, is granting its pastor, Rev. Charles E. McColley, a ten weeks' leave of absence for travel in the West. The church building is being remodeled. Mr. McColley is doing constructive work.

CONNECTICUT

THE ANNUAL MEETING of the Bridgeport Council was held recently in the First Church, Bridgeport. The following officers were elected: Pres., W. J. Grippin; vice-pres., Mrs. R. D. Trick, A. F. Jones, Mrs. G. G. Goulden; secy., Miss J. A. Zielfeldt; treas., Walter Oddy, Sr.; auditor, Miss Clara Berger.

NEW YORK

DURING THE FIRST TEN MONTHS of the pastorate of Rev. A. F. Houser, there have been 136 additions to the church membership, ninety-nine by baptism. Eleven more are awaiting the ordinance. A $55,000 Sunday-school plant is under construction. The church is now issuing a sixteen-page paper.

THE SUMMER SCHOOL FOR PASTORS, so well attended last year, will be held July 23-Aug. 10 at Cook Academy, Montour Falls. The cost for room and board will be $22.50 for the eighteen days. All missionary pastors and pastors having a salary of $1,200 or less, will receive one-half of their traveling expenses and board. It is hoped that many churches will aid their pastors by paying part of all of their expenses. Those desiring to enroll in the school should write to Rev. F. W. Tomlinson, 487 South Salina St., Syracuse. The faculty is as follows: Rev. D. E. Abrams, Prof. Alfred E. Alton, Rev. H. Wyse Jones, Pres. C. A. Barbour, Rev. Samuel Zane Batten, Rev. George A. Briggs, Rev. William E. Chalmers, Prof. Frank Otis Erb, Rev. Robert E. Farrier, Rev. Donald B. MacQueen, Pres. Milton G. Evans and Mrs. Frederick W. Tomlinson.

FINANCIAL REPORTS FOR THE LAST YEAR show that approximately $52,000 was raised for benevolence by the Lake Avenue Church, Rochester, $11,548 for the building fund and $30,916 for current expenses.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

THE BEREAN CHURCH, CARBONDALE, has voted to adopt Miss Sigrid Johnson of the Clough Memorial Hospital, Ongole, India, as its foreign representative and will support her while on the field. She will sail June 19. The pastor, Rev. Frank A. Stanton, has been granted a ten weeks' leave of absence. The church is sending him as a delegate to the World Alliance. Mr. and Mrs. Stanton will sail June 16.

Crozer Commencement

The fifty-fifth commencement exercises of Crozer Theological Seminary were held May 20-22, two weeks earlier than the usual date in order to make it convenient for those who wished to attend the commencement and the Northern Baptist Convention.

The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Rev. George W. Quick, pastor of the First Church, Greenville, S. C., in the Upland Church on May 20. The Sunday evening service was held in the First Church, Chester. Pres. Lincoln Hulley of John B. Stetson University, Deland, Fla., preached the sermon on "The Tragedy of the Cross."

According to established custom, the Ministers' Conference of Philadelphia and vicinity met at Crozer, May 21. Dr. Harry B. Benninghoff of Waseda University, Japan, delivered an address.

On Monday afternoon occurred the annual meeting of the board of trustees of the seminary and the annual business meeting of the alumni. The officers of the latter society for next year are: Pres., George C. Horter, '97; vice-pres., Thomas H. Sprague, 1900 and Henry G. Weston Smith, 1916; secy.-treas., Charles A. Walker, '92; asst. secy., Rittinhouse Neisser, '02. Rev. James M. Stifler delivered the annual oration at the banquet.

Pres. Frederick E. Taylor gave the commencement address, emphasizing the necessity of a vital gospel message for those who will be useful ministers in the generation to which the graduating class belongs. Of the sixteen members of the graduating class, nine received the diploma of the seminary for completion of the English course and seven the degree of bachelor of divinity. Nearly all of the graduates are located for future work and the seminary has completed another successful year of service in the training of men for the Christian ministry.

MARYLAND

REV. W. E. PICKERING has resigned as pastor of the Franklin Square Church, Baltimore, because of ill health.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

WHEN REV. F. PAUL LANGHORNE became pastor of the Petworth Church in 1916, the membership numbered less than 100 and the building was heavily mortgaged. The mortgage has been cleared and $75,000 subscribed for a new building.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

REV. EDMUND GODWIN died Sunday, May 20, at his home in Santa Rosa, Cal. He was born in England but came to this country at the age of five. He graduated from the Morgan Park Theological Seminary in 1877 and during the same year was ordained. The active ministry of Mr. Godwin covered twenty-three years, during which time he held pastorates in Wisconsin, Illinois and California. Mr. and Mrs. Godwin spent several years as frontier missionaries in South Dakota. A memorial service was held on the Sunday following the funeral in the First Church, Santa Rosa, of which he had been a member for over twenty years. He is survived by his wife and two children.

THE QUARTERLY MEETING of the circles of the San Francisco Bay Association was held May 17 at Burlingame. The vice president, Mrs. Carpenter, presided. The morning session was devoted to annual reports of the various circles. The new officers are: Pres., Mrs. C. W. Brinstad; vice-pres., Mrs. Wright; secy., Mrs. Carlson of the First Swedish Church; treas., Mrs. Banks. Dr. Sara Wise gave an interesting address on "The Child and Amer ica's Future." Miss Chan, who has been a great help in the Chinese work in San Francisco, told the story of her early life in China. The next meeting will be held with the Alameda Church.

cooperating organizations and the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board and the Board of Education the whole subject of recommending to the Convention a policy in regard to receiving, holding, and administering any gifts or trust funds to which doctrinal conditions are attached, and that said Boards report at the next meeting of the Convention; and that the Board of the American Baptist Home Mission Society be requested to convene the Boards herein named for the consideration of said subjects."

By vote of the convention also the following resolution was referred to the boards:

"Resolved, That the Northern Baptist Convention place itself on record as opposing the reception of any gift with a creedal text contrary to the New Hampshire or Philadelphia Confessions of Faith or any Confession of Faith which may be adopted by the Northern Baptist Convention."

Pursuant to the foregoing resolutions, the boards rendered a report to the convention at Indianapolis, June 19, 1922. This report was referred to the boards for further consideration. At a meeting held in New York, March 6, 1923, the subject of a denominational policy relative to gifts with doctrinal conditions attached received thorough and prayerful consideration. It was fully recognized that only findings which are based on the fundamental Baptist principles of loyalty to Christ and freedom in his gospel can commend themselves to Baptists who, in dependence on the Divine Spirit, have held throughout their history to the competency of the soul in religion. With these considerations in mind the Conference of Boards adopted the following

Recommendations

1. A large degree of liberty must be left to all our missionary, benevolent, and educational organizations which receive and administer denominational funds. With such a wide and varied constituency, and with such complex needs to be met, it is necessary to trust the judgment of the men and women who constitute the management of our societies. In the exercise of liberty due regard must be given, on the one hand, to the demand of loyalty to fundamental Baptist doctrines and to the integrity of gifts. On the other hand, we must always insure the complete freedom of our boards, executive officers, missionaries, and other representatives from subjection to formal creedal tests.

2. While recognizing the right and freedom of any individual to proffer a gift to our societies or boards for use in our denominational enterprises with such specifications as may seem desirable to the donor, we nevertheless recommend that the convention advise all donors to trust the loyalty and integrity of our respective societies and boards, and to make their gifts to our denominational enterprises without doctrinal conditions. And we furthermore recommend that the convention advise the officers and managers of our societies and boards to make clear to donors desiring to attach doctrinal conditions to their gifts the difficulty of administering such bequests and the danger of embarrassing entanglements.

We express the hope that the spirit of mutual confidence through which Baptists have been so greatly blessed in the past may continue to abide with us. We stand together facing a world which needs our ministry of faith and love. Our program of advance at home and abroad calls for our united strength. In common devotion to Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord, let us finish the work which he has given us to do.

Respectfully submitted in behalf of the conference of the boards.

FRANK M. GOODCHILD, Chairman.
CLARENCE M. GALLUP, Secretary.

This report was unanimously adopted and another chapter in denominational history closed.

Summarized Reports

Report of the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board

Every phase of the work of the board shows a healthy progress. Beneficiaries have increased during the year so that today we have 1,461 on our rolls. The total assets now exceed ten millions of dollars (book value).

The Retiring Pension Plan

The interest in the cooperative Retiring Pension Plan also has steadily increased. During that two-year period the membership has increased five and a half times, while the aggregate salaries, expected pensions, and current dues approximately six times. This is, indeed, a healthy growth and demonstrates beyond doubt that the Retiring Pension Fund is thoroughly established. The membership trebled in 1921 and more than doubled during 1922.

Brunswick, Canada, Southern Baptist Convention, England, and the various countries of Europe, that the board, in justice to the worthy workers who have given all their services within the bounds or under the auspices of the Northern Baptist Convention, has found it necessary to amend the rules in such manner that workers, part of whose service has been given within and part outside the Northern Baptist Convention, should be placed upon a pro-rata basis. The eminent fairness of this action has been recognized by all. It will not only simplify the work but provide a just and needed protection for those for whom the board was specifically organized.

Ordination

The problem of ordination is still pressing. Many reports have been received of the ordination of men who have been advised by a council regularly called either to postpone ordination until a more complete preparation had been made, or in other instances the council had advised against such proposed ordination. It is a source of anxiety that there have been not a few cases in which the advice of such a council has been ignored. The right of the local church to ordain is granted by all, but the right of such a church against the advice of sister churches to insist that their ordination shall be accepted by all other churches is neither sound nor wise in accord with established polity. The action of the Northern Baptist Convention at Indianapolis in June, 1922, in recommending a minimum requirement for ordination and provision for an accredited list of ministers in every state, has already been accepted by many of the state conventions. It will simplify the work of the board and add greatly to the effectiveness of the denomination when this recommendation of the Northern Baptist Convention shall have been confirmed by all the state conventions. Since the meeting in Indianapolis ten states have formally approved and accepted the recommendation; eleven other states had previously taken action which was equivalent to or stronger than the recommendation. Seven report no action as yet, though several of this number expect soon to approve formally. It appears from the above reports that the action of the convention last year calling for the creation of an accredited list of ministers will soon be an accomplished fact. The board does not make grants to unordained men. On the other hand, with conditions of ordination so chaotic, it has been impossible for the board to make mere ordination the basis of its grants. It does not give to unordained men, but the basis of its grants is service rendered. This plan has worked well.

The Only Helper

Has it ever occurred to our ministers that the board is the sole organization within the denomination whose purpose is to help them? The minister pleads for every worthy cause except the one which concerns him personally. He is beset to present the appeals of certain causes, to preach on certain topics, he is to be a leader in numerous good works, to say nothing of opening his pulpit to many peripatetic philanthropies. He is glad to do his best and seldom refuses his aid to any worthy object. On the other hand he asks little or nothing for himself, and the only specific board promoting his interests is the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board.

E. T. Tomlinson,
Executive Secretary.

Summary of Report of Federal Council Delegates

The principle of cooperation in Christian effort has won its victory. Cooperation may be worked in a bad cause; team-work builders started Babel; but that constructive Christian cooperation bears good fruit the Federal Council has demonstrated. The concerted movement of thirty denominations in the direction of Christian progress has written a page of church history such as no former generation could have dreamed. These church bodies, so diverse in forms and methods of work, becoming partners in establishing the kingdom of God, have each been greatly strengthened, and the churches of other countries have been stimulated to form similar unions of their own.

Every commission has made notable advance, that on evangelism leading the way. The emphasis upon evangelism as the task of the whole church throughout the whole year, brought into clearer light the major things in which we are at one, as it is also bringing a larger number into the membership of the churches. The topics for the Week of Prayer and a pamphlet, "The Fellowship of Prayer," have been reprinted in daily sections in more than a hundred newspapers. Educational evangelism and evangelistic education, showing the energy of the gospel in common life and connecting it with the daily toil of the factory and the farm, make a good team and have produced good fruit. "We may think too much of the gospel as pointing the way to heaven, and too little of it as empowering the whole man for the heavenly life on earth."

The Commission on the Church and Social Service has given special attention to community interests, child welfare, and delinquency.

Whites and negroes of the whole country have come into truer accord through our Commission on Race Relations, led by John J. Eagan, an honored business man of Atlanta, Georgia.

The chaplains of the army and navy are now organized with Colonel J. T. Axton and Captain E. F. Scott, eminent Christian men, as respectively chiefs of staff. It is their judgment that in no nation are more enlisted men regularly attending divine worship than in our army and navy.

The Commission on International Justice and Good-will, in addition to its many public meetings, has circulated half a million copies of pamphlets on international questions in the light of the Christian conception of human brotherhood. A text-book, "The Christian Crusade for a Warless World," has been prepared and used by many study groups, and the International Ideals of the Churches have been adopted by most of the denominations and by many other Chirstian bodies.

The Federal Council has opened the way for all churches to unite in aid for the stricken countries in Europe, and has sent a special representative to Russia at the request of the American Relief Administration; our Doctor Gulick has been at work in China and Japan for a year; much relief has been given to religious minorities in Europe, and much service rendered in the Canal Zone and to Latin America.

Albert G. Lawson, Chairman.
Robert A. Ashworth, Secretary.

foreign groups and the Northern Baptist Convention.

For the purpose of encouragement and mutual helpfulness, it is doubtless wise for the several groups to form themselves into district and national organizations. It would be disastrous, however, to let these organizations become estranged from the larger group. The convention itself will be profited by their devotion and the strength of their loyalty to the Saviour. In order that the closest possible cooperation be maintained, the committee recommended that a special effort be made to secure representation of these foreign-language Baptists in the annual meetings and that representatives be elected to position on the general boards and committees of the convention; that in the annual and district meetings of the foreign-speaking bodies, the various interests of the convention be presented by the American representative. The churches of these foreign-speaking groups are urged to unite with the local Baptist association and to cooperate with Baptist interests in their communities. Such cooperation will help to stem the drift from the church of the young folks. Among the constructive suggestions, the committee further urged a wider use o the denominational journals, and also requested the Home Mission Society to invite once each year the whole committee on coordination of Baptist bodies using foreign languages to meet in joint session with the board of managers of that society. The committee then presented a directory of the foreign-speaking conferences which will be printed in the Northern Baptist Convention annual.

We Do Resolve

The committee on resolutions presented their resolutions in five groups. In the general group, of course, the Baptists of Atlantic City and other friends were duly thanked. Hon. Charles H. Burke, commissioner of Indian affairs, was commended for his recent appeal to all Indians to cooperate with the Indian office in the control of Indian tribal dances with the view of eradicating the features which harmfully affect the life of the Indians.

In all cities of our territory interracial committees or commissions for the purpose of securing mutual understanding cooperation and good will was urged upon Baptists especially in the case of the negroes. The Northern Baptist Convention wishes to call the attention of the United States government to the un-American and illegal practices of secret Chinese tongs which have endeavored to collect assessments upon Chinese Christians.

In the judgment of the committee, week-day religious education has passed the experimental stage and boards of public school education are asked to grant to churches which wish to engage in such work at least one hour of public school time each week for the religious instruction of public school children whose parents desire them to attend such schools.

The relatively small number of Baptist young people attending institutions of higher education led the convention to urge its pastors and other workers to use their influence to increase the attendance.

The service of the Baptist League of Christian Stewards and Baptist Tithers' League was recognized. By special resolution the work of the department of missionary education was emphasized and the churches are called upon to give renewed emphasis to this important work in the local church.

The denomination was called upon to give more attention to training rural leaders and the development of rural fields through special provision in our colleges, seminaries, state conventions, and home mission boards.

Under social and industrial relations the committee felt that the time had come for the definite principles for Christian adjustment of economic relations to be definitely incorporated into the educational program of the local church. It was felt that both Christian men and Christian institutions ought to scrutinize their own business interests and methods with a view to bringing them into harmony with the teachings of Christ. Attention was called to the fact that it was the duty of government in all of its functions as expressed in the scriptures and in the constitution of the United States to place the protection of life, liberty and human welfare above the vested rights of property and power. The convention put itself squarely o record for obedience to law and for its faithful enforcement.

The resolution on international relations is of such importance that we are printing it in full.

International Relations

1. WHEREAS under the Province of God the nations of the earth have become so vitally inter-related that no single nation can longer hold itself aloof in selfish isolation without guilt; therefore

BE IT RESOLVED that we urge the administration at Washington to effect such international agreement as shall enable us to put the strength of our wisdom and experience at the service of humanity and enable us to carry our share of the world's burden through an association of nations and an international court; and that we express our approval of the efforts thus far made b President Harding to this end.

2. We record our horror at the unparalleled outrage suffered by the Armenians and other peoples at the hand of the Turks, and we deplore as a wrong against humanity the attitude of the allied nations, and especially America, for failure to protect these people from the despoiler. We rejoice in the splendid work of the Near East Relief in caring for the needy children, and reaffirm our sympathy and cooperation in its work, but believe that the problems presented are too great to be solved by private charity. We, therefore, urge our government to take a strong initiative in securing the cooperation of the nation in handling these problems, regarding the protection and promotion of human rights more important than economic concessions.

3. BE IT RESOLVED that in the interest of justice and peace we believe that the United States should take the initiative in calling an international conference to consider the whole economic and political situation in Europe, including reparations, debts and armaments in the endeavor to accomplish in Europe a result comparable to that which was achieved by the four-power part in the Far East.

Appreciation of the Baptists of Sweden

WHEREAS the Baptists of Sweden are to celebrate at Stockholm on July 19, 1923, the seventy-fifth anniversary of the organization of the first Baptist church established in their country;

BE IT RESOLVED that the Northern Baptist Convention send its most fraternal greetings to the Baptists of Sweden.

We rejoice in the inspiring record of the heroic stand made by the Baptists of that land, in the face of persecution for many years, on behalf of the historic distinctive principles for which our own fathers fought so valiantly. We rejoice as well in the remarkable progress made by them, not only in numerical strength, but also in the development of a program of service in their own country, in other sections of Europe, in Africa and in China.

We are honored in the fraternal relationships which have so long existed

The Fisherman of Galilee, by Harmon A. Baldwin. New York: Revell. $1.25 net.

A devotional study of the Apostle Peter, written with the sole desire to be helpful to God's children. It is free from controversial spirit and is a careful exposition of the Petrine conception of the gospel as Jesus taught it.

Casual Wanderings in Ecuador, by Blair Niles. New York: Century Co. $2.50.

A fresh viewpoint, even of the best known places, is always interesting. This is what Mrs. Niles gives us in her South American book. Her casual wanderings take her down the western coast of Ecuador, across the Andes, and then down the eastern slope of the mountains by horseback. Mrs. Niles views present conditions in the light of the past, and thus is able to picture and interpret conditions in a fashion not usually given to the casual observer. Illustrations by Robert L. Niles, Jr., add much to the attractiveness of the book.

Anthony John, by Jerome K. Jerome. New York: Dodd. Mead & Co.

"Anthony John" might baldly be called a sermon, were it not such a delightful novel. The story begins with the lowly birth of Anthony John and takes him through a sordid boyhood, which his personality alone makes charming, up to manhood, in which he finally amasses a great amount of money. Betty Mowbray, the daughter of his employer and friend as well, is in love with Anthony John. He loves her also, but not in the supreme fashion. In mystic manner he learns that Eleanor Coomber is his destiny. Anthony John is blessed with an ancestor who was a monk. Fighting against the practical and somewhat acquisitive side of Anthony John's nature is the spirit of this idealist and saint. In the end the idealist triumphs. Anthony John is to be commended to our readers as one of the best works of fiction of the day.

St. Mark's Life of Jesus, by Theodore H. Robinson, M.A., D.D. New York: Doran. $1.75.

If you are looking for plain information on the Gospel of Mark that will enable you to grasp the reality of the life of Jesus you will find such in this unconventional commentary. Doctor Robinson does not try to furnish a substitute for the Gospel but to give such comments and explanations as shall enable the reader to take the position of that group to whom it was originally addressed. It is rich in illustration and historical material. Prof. James Moffatt, D. D., in his foreward for the book says: "This Gospel though little in size is one of the great books of the world; it is within the grasp of our intelligence, but we need to be put in the proper focus for seeing it. This I think the author has suceeded in doing." It is so written as to be especially helpful to clergy and laymen alike. It has been placed among the Student Christian Movement Handbooks.

The Christian Doctrine of Peace, by James Hastings. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.

A posthumous volume from the pen of a great author, presented by his son. The author of this book has a name and reputation that far exceed in worth any praise or commendation given by a review and is the best introduction to any book that might appear under his name. This pretentious volume deserves a review far exceeding the space our columns can afford. Doubtless the doctor prepared it with a purpose to restrain the awful spirits called forth by the world war. It is a burning appeal to the universal church of Jesus Christ to labor through its pulpits and press to help restore "peace on earth and goodwill to men" after the great devastation. The work is encyclopediac on the subject. Having defined the word and its uses, it considers the God of peace, then the peace of Christ,—peace of conscience peace with men; war, its uses, its evils and its avoidance. The contents are virile in presentation, religious in spirit and practical in purpose. In a word, the book is a classic on the subject it presents. Its references to authors, its quotations from hosts of writers of prose and poetry show the limitless acquaintance of the great author with the literature of the ages. 'Tis a rare book and a rich contribution to the enduring fame of the author.

The Servant of Jehovah, an Exposition of Isaiah 53, by Rev. David Baron. New York: Doran. $2.

Bible students who are interested in a very thorough and detailed study of the Prophesy of Isaiah as found in the fifty-third chapter will find this book a most ready and suggestive reference. The interpretation of every part of the chapter is given in reference to our Lord Jesus Christ with an attempt to show that the Sufferer as mentioned in this chapter was the Messiah. The first part of the book is given over to a critical examination of the non-Messianic interpretations of this chapter, showing the untenableness of modern interpretation. The thoughtful reader will probably not agree with Dr. R. A. Torrey's statement concerning it when he declares "It is a crushing exposure of the crudity and unscientific character of the methods of destructive criticism," for one does not feel it to be such, nor even intended for that purpose. But one cannot help but be impressed with the earnestness and devotion and scholarly ability with which the author endeavors to show that Jesus of Nazareth is indeed the Christ, the promised Redeemer of Israel. He "of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write."

"It Is to Laugh"

Our new minister is just wonderful," said Mrs. Brown. "He brings home to you things that you never saw before."

"That's nothing; we have a laundryman that does the same thing," replied Mrs. Jones.

"Who is there," cried the impassioned speaker, "who will lift a voice against the truth of my statement?"

Just then a donkey on the outskirts of the crowd gave vent to a piercing hee-haw.

The speaker assuming an air of triumph, lifted his voice above the din to say—

"I knew nobody but a jackass would try it!"

OUR MUSIC CORNER

CONDUCTED BY WILLIAM LESTER

MY EXPERIENCES WITH HYMNS

I am neither a poet nor a musician, and yet I am a great devotee of the hymn-book. Entirely lacking as I am in the ability to write a hymn, and entirely lacking as I am in the ability to write a tune, I still am an ardent student of all hymns, and in a certain way an ardent student of all tunes. My theory is that, next to acquaintance with his Bible, should be the minister's acquaintance with his hymn-book. Accordingly, I examine hymn by hymn, from cover to cover, in the hymn-book, and I examine, so far as I am able to judge, the tunes, tune by tune, in the entire book.

I have found this to be a fact, that every church hymn-book with which it has been my part to deal in the course of my ministry has been worthy of close investigation and of careful use. Such hymn-books are usually constructed according to some definite plan, and if the minister can enter into the spirit of those who constructed the hymn-book, he soon sees that an immense amount of labor has been employed in compiling and arranging the hymns and tunes and he soon sees how much usable and uplifting material has thus been put together. It is quite a mental and quite a spiritual discipline for a minister to take the hymn-book which he finds in use in the church of which he becomes the pastor, and so select his hymns and tunes that it becomes to his people a very treasure-house of helpfulness.

Any one who has been in the ministry for some years has amusing experiences with hymns, particularly in the line of inappropriate selections as made in the churches which he has been called upon to visit. Evening hymns are often sung in the morning, and morning hymns are just as often sung in the evening. A minister may be conducting evangelistic services when he is speaking on the words "Launch out into the deep," suggesting the necessity of venture in the decision for the Christian life, whereupon the chorus choir, with the thought of the safe landing of the soul on firm ground, may immediately respond with "Pull for the Shore."

A few years ago there was a young Japanese, a theological student, who intimated his purpose to return to Japan and compose a hymn-book. He said that he intended to have it a book which had no third stanza in it. Questioned as to his reason for this statement, he replied that wherever he went in the United States he heard the minister announce the hymn to be sung with the additional intimation, "omitting the third stanza." He did not see the necessity of printing the third stanza if it was always to be omitted.

In my own case the helpful experiences with hymns are multitudinous. As a boy I endeavored to learn several hymns, such as "Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken," "My Faith Looks up to Thee," "Come, Thou Almighty King," "Sun of My Soul," "Father, Whate'er of Earthly Bliss," "The Lord's My Shepherd, I'll Not Want." These hymns have always remained in memory and have been a background for Christian aspiration and expression. Later, as a minister, I have asked the congregations that I have served to name to me the hymns that they most liked. "Rock of Ages" and "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," have received the largest votes, especially if the persons who did the voting were persons of maturity. I find as I go about addressing colleges and universities that the professors in charge of services love to give out Whittier's "Dear Lord and Father of Mankind," and I find also when I am asked to address ministers' meetings that the person who announces the hymns is always glad to have sung Gladden's "Oh Master, Let Me Walk with Thee." It may seem strange, but in boys' preparatory schools there is a disposition with the boys to call for "The Sands of Time Are Sinking," as it is set to the tune "Rutherford."

In my life as a pastor there have always been a few hymns that I have reserved for special occasions, never giving them out excepting upon such occasions, as for instance, "Just as I Am," to be sung preceding the administration of the cup in the communion, and "Forth in Thy Name, Oh Lord, I Go," to be sung as the communion season closes, and those who are assembled now go forth to their duties and responsibilities.

In the theological seminary where I am we close the year with a very impressive communion season, it being the last occasion when the graduating class is present, and we reserve for the conclusion of that service the hymn, "Unto the Hills Around Do I Lift Up My Longing Eyes," set to the tune "Lux Beata," which ends:

"From every evil he will keep thy soul,
From every sin:
Jehovah shall preserve thy going out,
Thy coming in.
Before thee watching, he whom we adore,
Shall keep thee, henceforth, Yea, for ever more."

Personally, I am a great believer in the public reading of hymns by the pastor. The tendency today, with our enlarged order of service, is to omit such reading. But in the ordinary church of comparatively limited size, effective reading of a good hymn is a means of grace. Doctor Kirk, who so influenced Dwight L. Moody, was known so to impress hearers by his manner of reading "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," as to soften their hearts and make their whole being responsive to the words later to be spoken. I have heard Ira D. Sankey sing in the Hippodrome, New York, hymns that brought the service to its climacteric, and did more to seal to all eternity the purpose of the gathering than anything else that had part in the service.

If I could have my way I would have fathers and mothers and children in all Christian homes so familiar with at least one hundred hymns and tunes that the words of those hymns would constantly summon the heart to abiding faith in God and to steady purpose to yield the whole being to His will.

between our organizations and those of the Baptists of Sweden. Moreover, we would record our indebtedness for the contribution made by these spiritual kinsmen to American life in sending between thirty and forty thousand of their own members, who have joined us in our tasks in America. Nor are we unmindful of the fact that very many of the best missionaries, home and foreign, under appointment by American Baptist societies, as well as numerous pastors and laymen, are the direct product of Baptist work in Sweden.

May God greatly bless the Baptists of Sweden and enable them in the future to serve still more largely in the extension of Christ's kingdom.

Mr. Chas. R. Brock was chairman of the committee.

One Hundred Years Less One

The ninety-ninth annual report of the American Baptist Publication Society was presented by its board, and Rev. W. Quay Roselle spoke upon "Ninety and Nine." In this address he pointed out the high spots in the accomplishments of the society during the past year. The report covers seventy-six pages exclusive of the treasurer's report.

The convention showed its appreciation of the service rendered by Dr. Gilbert N. Brink who, in addition to the heavy task in connection with the society, gave unstintedly of his time and strength to the general interests of the denomination until he broke under the load. He has now regained a reasonable measure of his former strength and was present throughout the convention.

The society has been the source of supply for trained workers for other fields of service. Rev. T. B. Frizelle who directed the work of the institutes and summer assemblies is now pastor of the First Church, Fresno, Cal. Milton M. McGorrill resigned his position as director of young people's work to accept the position of director of religious education in the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn. Dr. William J. Sly has accepted the chair of religious education at Linfield College. Dr. H. E. Tralle has taken up private work in the field of religious education with headquarters in New York, and Dr. Frank O. Erb has accepted the chair of religious education at Rochester Theological Seminary. The society has indeed made a large contribution in men to the common cause.

Mr. H. E. Cressman, business manager, reports that in spite of the reduction in the price of periodicals and Sunday-school supplies, that they have increased the amount of the sinking fund for the retirement of the mortgage on the Roger Williams building which covers money borrowed to carry on the business through the reconstruction period following the war.

The work of any one of our general societies is so many-sided and far-reaching that a whole issue of the paper given to one organization would furnish opportunity for the barest outline.

The Publication Society received 125 manuscripts in its book publishing department of which thirty-seven were accepted for publication.

In the department of Sunday-school publications, W. E. Raffety is editor-in-chief.

It is well worth the time of any individual to study the detailed report of this department and to consider the millions of lesson helps and papers and other publications which are issued monthly.

In the Bible and field department, S. G. Neil, secretary, a new auto chapel car with a special transcontinental home touring body has been purchased and placed in service in missionary work among the Mexicans in California and Arizona. Rev. Pablo Villanueva, a Mexican, is in charge.

What shall we say of the department of social education, or religious education, church, vacation and week-day schools division, teacher-training and children's work?

It is useless to summarize this work and we commend the ninety-ninth report of the society as worthy of careful study upon the part of every Baptist.

The Request of the University of Chicago

The question of the relation of the University of Chicago to the Board of Education came before the board in Denver in 1919. At that time the convention appointed a committee to consider all the elements involved. This committee received from the trustees of the university certain requests and supplementary documents. This committee recommended that the convention grant the requests which in brief were the privilege of increasing the number of trustees of the university from twenty-one to twenty-five; and second, the limitation which required that the president should be a member of a Baptist church was removed. Under the revision of the articles of incorporation "At all times three-fifths of the trustees shall be members of Baptist churches." The report of the committee was adopted with a minimum of opposition. There were those present who favored the removal of all restrictions so far as Baptists are concerned. The university was not seeking to sever its ties to the denomination and the convention could see no reason for taking such a step.

The Department of Missionary Education

This department submitted its fourth annual report. It has found a growing demand for its service. The cultivation within local churches of an adequate program of missionary education, the study of stewardship literature and the building of a stewardship library, cooperation in the promotional work of the Board of Promotion, the development of summer-conference groups, the preparation of special missionary material for the daily vacation Bible schools, the growing interest in missionary plays and pageants, are lines along which the department has been called upon to serve. Miss Helen E. Hobart is the joint field secretary of the W. W. G. and the C. W. C. Both organizations are making splendid progress. The Children's World Crusade, which is responsible for the missionary education of children under twelve years of age is under the direction of Miss Mary L. Noble. The number of organizations has increased from 1,600 to 2,500 during the year.

A noteworthy development in missionary-education interest is seen in the increasing number of courses in religious and missionary education in our institutions of learning. Crozer Theological Seminary may be cited as an instance of an institution giving special attention to missionary training for prospective pastors. Prof. James B. Webster, of Shanghai College, and now teaching on the Crozer faculty, has built a course for students which compasses the entire denominational program and utilizes all of its educational materials. The students are greatly interested, and we believe that this is a far step in the direction of a ministry better trained for missionary leadership.

Dr. Warren P. Behan, of Ottawa University, has also introduced a new program of missionary education based upon the mission-study class. A normal class for the training of teachers was taught by himself, resulting in five student classes with an enrolment of ninety-eight.

Mention must also be made of the church school of missions, which continues to be the best known method of interesting the entire church in the missionary program.

New Officers

The nominating committee made its report early in the convention and when on Saturday the election of officers became the order of the day without a dissenting voice the secretary was instructed to cast the ballot for all of the officers of the convention as named by the committee. These are Corwin S. Shank, Washington, president; Carl E. Milliken, Maine, first vice president; Wm. C. Coleman, Kansas, second vice president; Wm. C. Bitting, Missouri, corresponding secretary; M. A. Levy, Massachusetts, recording secretary; Chas. A. Walker, Delaware, statistical secretary and Frank L. Miner, Iowa, treasurer. Members of the executive committee for three years: D. H. Anderson, Washington; J. W. Baker, Rhode Island; D. Y. Booker, Wyoming; D. J. Evans, Missouri; C. A. Fulton, Colorado; Mrs. C. E. Johnson, North Dakota; A. B. Newell, Nebraska; Mrs. D. Rough, New Jersey; John Snape, California and Ambrose Swasey, Ohio.

Milwaukee 1924

Ten cities invited the convention for 1924. The committee wisely chose a central city. Seattle renewed its invitation for 1925 and no doubt we will go away westward two years hence. We will meet you in Milwaukee in 1924.

Blessedness of Eternal Service

HOW much we have to thank our Savior for, in what he told us about our future life! We often wonder that he did not say more. But the words, "If it were not so, I would have told you," are a sufficient answer to any feeling of insufficiency.—However lonely and obscure and seemingly unimportant our life-work may be, let us remember that it is only our novitiate, our apprenticeship, and that to be good and faithful in a few things, even in that which is least,—is to make as good a beginning as God asks of any one, and will be as certain of recognition in the day of account as though we were kings or princes.

Fresh from the Field

The Temple Church, Detroit, Mich., observed the twenty-fifth anniversary of the beginning of the ministry of its pastor, Rev. Llewellyn Brown. He has been in Detroit for a number of years.

Rev. Charles H. Sears, with his wife and daughter will take an extended vacation, the first in many years. They will go abroad for six months and will make a study of the chief centers from which come the immigration to our cities. They will attend the Baptist World Alliance in Stockholm.

Rev. A. C. Dixon of the University Church, Baltimore, has sailed for Europe where he will preach for two months, returning in time to fill his engagement at Tremont Temple before resuming his work in Baltimore.

The following list of preachers is announced by the summer service committee for the months of July and August at Park Ave. Church, New York: July 1, Rev. C. Wallace Petty; July 8 and 15, Rev. Eugene C. Carder; July 22 and 29, Rev. Charles Gilkey; Aug., 5, Rev. Shailer Mathews; Aug. 12, Rev. C. Wallace Petty; Aug. 19, Rev. Lynn Harold Hough; Aug. 26, Rev. James Gordon Gilkey.

Over fifty of the most prominent leaders in public life will address the consultation conference on Christian citizenship to be held at Winona Lake, Ind., July 1-8, under the auspices of the National Reform Association. This is the fourth conference of a similar character held by the association, the last being held in Pittsburgh in 1919 which was attended by representatives from forty-one different countries and which had an attendance of 50,000 during the week's meetings.

The American Sunday-school Union recently celebrated its one hundred and sixth annual meeting. During that time 138,000 Sunday schools have been organized. The society serves in communities where no Christian work was being done for children and as soon as the way opened for church organization, the choice of a denomination was left to the people themselves.

For three summers the American Home Bible Institute has issued home or vacation reading courses consisting of repeated readings of a selected book of the Bible, each time from a different viewpoint for about two months. The institute is incorporated for the purpose of encouraging the systematic reading and study of the Bible with a view to better fitness for Christian service in our churches. Its address is 837 Allison St., Washington, D. C.

Friends of Rev. George E. Lockhart were shocked to hear of his sudden death death last month. He was a graduate of Kalamazoo College and of the University of Chicago. He served as pastor of the First Church Traverse City, Mich., the First Church, Beloit, Wis. and of the Temple Church at Wheeling, W. Va. A year ago he suffered a severe attack of diphtheria from the effects of which he never fully recovered. He was forty-four years old and leaves a wife and two daughters. His father, Rev. George Lockhart, is living in Wheeling.

Dr. Charles F. Wishart, who defeated Mr. Bryan for the moderatorship of the Presbyterian General Assembly by a small margin of twenty-four votes, construed the victory as one for toleration, not modernism.

Evangelist James W. Kramer recently closed a series of meetings with the First Church, Jacksonville, Fla., as a result of which there were 137 additions; and with the First Church, Covington, Ky., as a result of which there were 110 additions.

Rev. William H. Main, associate-general secretary of the Publication Society, recently returned from a trip to the Pacific Coast. Doctor Main held many conferences in the middle and far West and gave particular attention to the interests of the society in Los Angeles and Seattle. In addresses and conferences Doctor Main is doing efficient service for the Publication Society in all parts of the country. His optimism is a tonic wherever he goes.

By the action on May 26 of the Northern Baptist Convention in session at Atlantic City, the request of the trustees of the University of Chicago was granted, with the result that hereafter the presidency of the university will not be limited to members of the Baptist denomination, and three-fifths instead of two-thirds of the University board of trustees are to be members of a Baptist church. The present membership of the board will be increased from twenty-one to twenty-five. Much gratification over the action of the convention has been expressed by alumni and friends of the university, as it brings to realization the desire which the trustees have had for a number of years to broaden the field of choice for president and trustees. The changes are regarded as of great significance for the future of the university.

ONE of the biggest and shortest sermons ever preached was that preached by Dean Swift on an occasion when a special appeal was being made for funds. The Bishop of London had been invited to give the sermon of the occasion, but when he failed to appear, Dean Swift was called upon. He mounted the pulpit and said:

"My text is 'He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.' Those who believe in the security, down with the cash!"

The predominant question at the meeting of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches which met in Zurich, April 13-16, was the Ruhr situation. After much discussion the committee engaged upon it drafted a resolution insisting that the most urgent step is to put reparations on a sound economic basis. To this end it called upon the League of Nations to convene an international conference to constitute a body to adjudicate on the issue. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Howard B. Jefferson, a graduate of Denison University, has been engaged as head of the department of athletics at Hillsdale College for the coming year. Mr. Jefferson is also a Phi Beta Kappa.

Mrs. Harriet A. Wright, for fifty years a member of the First Church, Zanesville, Ohio, died recently at the home of her sister. A son, Rev. George C. Wright, is pastor of the Atherton Church, Los Angeles.

"I am seventy-five minutes. I am too small to wash an automobile; I am too small to go to a movie; I am not large enough to last through a baseball game; I am not big enough to go fishing alone; in fact on week days I am considered very small indeed. But on Sundays, especially at church worship, I am thought to be very big, and some say I am too long to be interesting."—Calendar First Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

Rev. William Remington, for many years an active Baptist, died recently at Ceres, Cal., at the age of ninety-one. He was born in New York in 1832. After graduating from Rochester Seminary in 1861, he became pastor of the Weedsport Church where he was ordained to the ministry. He held pastorates in New York, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. In 1891 he went to Montana where he worked under the Home Mission Society. In 1910 he went to California. He was forced to retire from active service in 1919 because of an accident. Mr. Remington leaves a sister and five sons. Funeral services were conducted by Rev. W. M. McCart, pastor of the Ceres Church.

A great expansion in the work of religious education and sociology at Bucknell University is provided for in the new appointments to the faculty. The deanship, made vacant by the death of Llewellyn Phillips in January, will be filled by Romeyn H. Rivenburg, a graduate of the class of '97, and for the past twenty-five years a member of the faculty of Peddie Institute. A new chair in religious education, made possible by the generosity of the First Church of Troy, N. Y., of which Rev. F. K. Singiser, a Bucknell alumnus, is pastor, will be occupied by Leland Foster Wood. The chair in sociology, made vacant by the death of Dr. William E. Martin, has been accepted by Stanley P. Davies, a graduate of the class of 1912.

The Bank of Manhattan Company is publishing a series of advertisements in New York dailies with a view to acquainting New Yorkers with the fact that there is something doing most of the time in sections of the country which the average New Yorker hardly knows exist: "Keen observers of our national life have commented time and time again on the intense pride of the average American in his own state and his own city. Some have gone so far as to say that we carry it to the point of a sectionalism that hinders the development of the country as a whole. Certainly many of us are so interested in the place where we live and work that we are in danger of forgetting that there is anything at all beyond its limits. It has been said—and perhaps with good reason—that this is more true of New Yorkers than of men in any other city. At any rate, the Bank of the Manhattan Company believes that the more New York knows and appreciates what is going on in other parts of the country, the better it will be for all of us."

What Shall We Do With THE BAPTIST?

This question was not asked this year on the floor of the convention. In this particular Atlantic City also differs from recent meetings. We could see no good reason for asking the question at all. Dame Rumor, however, was there. She always meets with both saints and sinners. She whispered about the wisdom of consolidating the present journals, just as if they were not already "consolidated" enough. Dame Rumor indicated that as a missionary act our New York contemporary would consider taking over our list. We do not blame him for casting envious eyes our way. May we suggest that when any such answer to the question, "What shall we do with THE BAPTIST?" is even considered, that the editor stands ready to relieve the denomination of any responsibility for its editorial utterances or financial obligations. And he will not consider that he is doing missionary work either.

Killam's Kollum

The Editor's Wail

One, Robert P. Edwards, says: "Getting up a publication is no picnic. If we print jokes, folks say we are silly; if we don't they say we lack variety; if we publish things from other papers they say we are too lazy to write. If we don't go to church, we are heathens; if we go, we are hypocrites. If we stay in the office, we ought to be out hustling for news; if we hustle for news, we are not attending to business in the office. If we wear old clothes, we are slovens. If we wear new clothes, they are not paid for. What in thunder is a poor editor to do, anyhow? Like as not, some one will say we swiped this from an exchange. So we did."

Wanted—A Vacation

The brethren seem to think that the editor needs a vacation. It is more than likely that the readers need one more than he does. At any rate we want your answer to this question, "What was your best vacation and why?" Tell us in not to exceed 250 words. We are asking of you this favor. Sit right down and do a little thinking for at least a minute. It will do no permanent damage. Then take your pencil in hand and tell us and the readers about the most enjoyable vacation you ever experienced. It may keep some of us from seeking recreation in a fool's paradise. We want the answer by return mail. We shall soon be "vacating." We want your counsel for ourselves and for those who need it more than we do.

We Disclaim Responsibility

In the printed report of the Board of Promotion there is a paragraph which has caused us some anxiety. We fear that readers of that report may think that we are responsible for it. We hasten to disclaim any responsibility either for the form of the statement or for the truthfulness thereof. It reads: "During the past year Editor Edgar L. Killam has carried with a remarkable degree of efficiency the entire responsibility for the editorial and business management of THE BAPTIST. This has been a heavier load than any one man ought to carry. The grateful appreciation of the denomination for this service is due Mr. Killam." We have already collected in full. There is nothing due. When we first read the paragraph we pinched ourselves for fear that we were dead. Kind reader, please do not worry about our health. Work does not kill. Worry kills. An editor of a denominational paper has no worries. It is mere recreation to run a Baptist paper.

Report of the Committee on Future Denominational Program

Adopted at Atlantic City, May, 1923

To the Northern Baptist Convention:

He who would forecast the future must review the past. They cannot be divorced, for one is so largely the product of the other. Yesterday reports itself in today, and today holds portent and promise of tomorrow. Nowhere is this more true than in the life and progress of a great denomination. Accordingly any worthy consideration of future denominational program must take full account of present and past plans and policies. To review these is to discover that there is a continuity in our life and that there are trends of thought and action which operate with cumulative power. A survey of recent denominational history makes clear that the New World Movement was not of sudden birth, but that it was the product and indeed the inevitable outcome of denominational tendencies that were moving along converging lines.

The opening years of the present century witnessed a remarkable drawing together of our various denominational interests. In 1907 the Northern Baptist Convention was organized, growing out of the associated gatherings of the national missionary societies known as the May Anniversaries. Since that event each year has seen an increasing degree of cooperation. At the Los Angeles Convention in 1915 the first comprehensive plan of advance in all branches of denominational service was projected in the five-year program. This met an immediate response among our churches, and some of its goals were passed before the period was half over. Following the five-year program came the Baptist laymen's movement which during the years 1917-1919 carried to a successful conclusion a united effort to raise the budgets of the national missionary organizations. Of the laymen's movement was born the impulse to make a comprehensive survey of all that Northern Baptists are doing to further the kingdom of Christ both in missionary and educational endeavor. The survey not only reviewed past achievements but also outlined a program of development for a period of five years. This program was enthusiastically adopted at the Denver Convention in 1919, and subsequently given the title of the New World Movement. The General Board of Promotion was elected to secure the financial resources needed to carry out the program adopted.

The period covered by that movement comes to a close a year hence. What is to follow it? What objectives shall we propose, and how shall we attempt to achieve them? These are the questions which the Northern Baptist Convention has asked its committee on future denominational program to consider and report concerning.

The New World Movement Appraised

Before attempting to answer them it seems fitting to undertake an appraisal of the New World Movement, and a review of its achievements. It must be admitted at the outset that though the enterprise was launched enthusiastically at Denver it did not commend itself to all our churches and leaders. The churches as a whole, however, responded to its challenge, with results which inspire gratitude and courage. During 1921-1922 more than 85 per cent of the churches in the territory of the Northern Baptist Convention, excepting those that are affiliated with groups of their own, contributed to the New World Movement, and more than 95 per cent of Northern Baptists, excepting such groups, are members of churches thus contributing. Hundreds of these churches became genuinely sacrificial in their spirit and action. Their giving reached heights not gained before, with the result that up to April 30, 1922, there had been collected and distributed in connection with the New World Movement an average annually, for the period included, of $7.16 per member. This consecration of means was matched by a consecration of life which under the blessing of God has carried the denomination far beyond any previous attainment.

To be sure the financial objectives proposed in the New World Movement have not yet been gained. Perhaps they were set too high, but "a man's reach should exceed his grasp," and it was good surely for the denomination to attempt great things. The failure to accomplish all at which we aimed should not blind us to the fact that we have compassed achievements such as we had never before reached.

The years of the New World Movement have been marked by great blessings on every field. In our own land state and city mission societies report new churches organized, new edifices erected, new fields entered, new workers enlisted, and thousands brought to Christ. Christian centers have been established for negroes and new Americans, an International Baptist Seminary has been inaugurated, vacation Bible schools have grown in number and activity, religious education has been developed, our young people in thousands have gathered in summer assemblies, the Bible has been issued in new tongues, university pastors have come close to the life of Baptist students in the great universities. In our denominational schools and colleges the power of Christ grips the lives of young men and women who are preparing themselves for leadership. The denomination begins to take seriously its task of caring for the old soldiers of the cross.

In Europe millions await our gospel ministrations, and thousands are being brought to Christ. In Africa a new Pentecost visits the Congo. In China and Japan the native church springs to self-consciousness and becomes articulate. In India the responsibility for whole sections of the work is assumed by Indian Christians. Where Burma and China meet men seek Christ by the thousand.

A logical result of this wonderful outpouring of God's Spirit upon the work committed to us is that needs have multiplied in every direction and opportunities present themselves upon every hand. There are clamant calls beyond those of other days. This was to be

Homer F. Yale, principal of the Hartwick high school, Hartwick, N. Y., is planning to close his work there at the end of the present school year. Mr. Yale will enter the ministry.

Rev. E. L. Pierce, pastor of the church at Cumberland Court House, Va., recently preached a rather pointed sermon according to his parishioners. He is dead and a member of his congregation in the hospital.

American Baptists will grieve to hear of the death of Mrs. John Dussman on April 26, at Glenside, Pa. Mrs. Dussman was a missionary in South India since 1897. The Christians of South India will also miss this tireless and devoted missionary.

The calendar of the Prospect Ave. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., each week has some concise statement bearing on some phase of the Christian life. These are signed by the pastor, Rev. G. A. Leichliter. In the current calendar we find the following and pass it on to a wider constituency: "The way of the Lord Jesus is a way of faith. The way of faith is a way of sacrifice. The way of sacrifice is a way of increase. The way of increase is a way of joy. The way of joy is a way of fellowship. The way of fellowship is the way of perennial blessing."

On May 24 Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick resigned as preacher of the First Presbyterian Church, New York. The action of the General Assembly at its recent meeting in Indianapolis led him to take this step. The church through its clerk, Henry N. Tifft, announced the refusal of the body to accept the resignation. He declared that the church was solidly back of Doctor Fosdick. It is now up to the New York presbytery to carry out, or to attempt to carry out, the directions of the Indianapolis body. It will probably get at least as far as the bishop did in the Rector Grant case.

Johanna Langhorst, who for a number of years was superintendent of the German Baptist Deaconess' Home in Chicago, passed away on May 11. She was born and reared in Germany but came to this country in the early nineties settling in New York City. Under the earnest and searching preaching of the late Rev. Walter Rauschenbusch, she was baptized in the Second German Baptist Church of New York City. She entered the Deaconess Hospital at Dayton and after graduating, came to Chicago in 1914 and took charge of the German Baptist Deaconess Home. Under her wise management this soon exerted a far-reaching influence. Funeral services were held May 14 at the Humboldt Park German Baptist Church, her pastor, Rev. E. G. Kliese, officiating. Girls who are entertaining the thought of becoming deaconesses or missionaries should address Rev. C. A. Daniel, 3264 Cortland St., Chicago.

Dr. William James Sly, professor of sacred literature and religious education in Linfield College, has enjoyed a successful year not only in teaching and preaching but also delivering addresses in various religious educational conventions. He is spending his summer vacation in a trip to the Holy Land and Europe in connection with the Baptist World Alliance in Stockholm. The

Does the Church Take Itself Seriously?

THE bulletin of a prominent Congregational church recently announced as the subject of discussion both by the pastor in his Sunday sermon and by the church at its mid-week meeting, the question whether admission were easier into a church or a lodge.

The bulletin itself indicated certain reasons for this discussion, arising from the comparison some layman had been making of the church's attitude toward a prospective candidate and that of the lodge in similar case. He saw in the lodge a dignity and reserve toward the candidate and a deliberate purpose to make him feel, not that he was conferring a favor upon the lodge and incurring slight responsibilities upon himself in joining it, but that the favor was distinctly on the other side, that he must consider himself fortunate if admitted and be held rigidly responsible for meeting all the obligations of membership, such as loyalty, regular attendance upon all appointments and prompt payment of all dues. It seemed to him that the church tended to fawn upon and coax people to enter it, often minimizing or dispensing altogether with conditions of entrance, and making little or no insistence upon any obligations connected with the church-member's life thereafter. This layman seemed to think that the church was at once belittling itself and doing an injustice to the candidate by tacitly acceptly low and unworthy ideals of what is involved in membership in a Christian church.

It should perhaps be said that the apparent aloofness of lodges, college fraternities and similar organizations is often more apparent than real; and that, for a person desirable socially, financially or otherwise, while overtures and solicitations public and official may be avoided the same object may be secured personally and informally by individual members. Any one who has had two or three college fraternities "rushing" him simultaneously will not be strongly impressed by their diffidence and reserve. And on the other hand it should be pointed out that a church is quite a different thing from a lodge. It is charged to deliver the invitation of the gospel to all men, desirable and undesirable, with the most urgent and compelling entreaty. The apostle Paul declares that he will go to any length in trouble and personal adaptation in order to win men. "I am become all things to all men, that by all means I may save some."

But when these things have been said, is there not still a challenging amount of truth in the criticism of the Congregational layman? Have we not swung from the extreme of rigidity to that of laxness in the course of a few generations? It does not seem to be a tendency peculiar to liberalism, for some churches conservative in doctrine are making entrance into membership startlingly easy, with little effort to satisfy themselves that a candidate has experienced that change which is called, and properly, regeneration—a rebirth of the soul. Yet it has always been held that the great mark of our denomination is its insistence upon credible evidence of regeneration before church membership.

Moreover, it should be remembered that the gospel entreaty in the New Testament never lapsed into mere coaxing. Christ bade his disciples after the earnest entreaty had been rejected to shake off the dust of their feet, not in petulance but in solemn testimony against those who had despised it. Paul gave his message with all the fire of a loving heart to his brethren the Jews, but when they rejected or ignored it, solemnly warned them of their fate. Peter at Pentecost told his hearers that they were guilty of the murder of the Son of God; and Stephen's last message had a courageous indictment of his hearers which led to his murder. When Jonathan Edwards two centuries ago led in the movement which aroused the American colonies from religious lethargy and changed the course of American history, he dared to preach such a sermon as his "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God." It is not necessary to advocate precisely that type of evangelism to insist, notwithstanding, that too easy a gospel and too facile an admission to membership are a besetting danger of our churches today.

THERE are two other suggestions from the comparison with other organizations. One is that it would be wholly an admirable thing if the lay members of the church would take upon themselves a main responsibility for inviting others to join in their fellowship. That unofficial invitation and nonprofessional recommendation would be the most effective thing in the world. It is being tried out with splendid results by laymen's organizations, and it blesses a church as almost nothing else can do.

Then there is something alluring in the thought of having a man feel at least as greatly gratified at being thought worthy of membership in the church of Jesus Christ as in a fraternal organization. Why, in the name of all human and divine values, should not a man feel as proud of "making" a good church, as he is of "making" a good fraternity?

Activities for the Year

AS time passes the impact of the recent convention at Atlantic City seems to grow apace. We hear of changed views and fresh enlistments in our large tasks, and the future seems more full of hope than for several years. Every local church and every church member must be enlisted to help forward the new and promising spirit of progress, and the program adopted at the convention is well designed to help produce the membership as active participants in future production.

As we sense the situation it now has three phases to it. One phase concerns the plans of the denomination for the year that follows the close of the New World Movement. That program has been sent to every state convention, and other bodies concerned, for careful consideration and definite action, but the present administrative committee has been empowered to carry on until the new program has been adopted by a two-thirds vote of all cooperating organizations. A second phase of the program for the year concerns the work of the stewardship committee which is under the general direction of the Board of Promotion. That program is concerned with the teaching of Christian stewardship, so that sooner or later all production shall be based upon a sense of accountability possessing every member of the church, and time, energy, talents and money shall be set aside for local and world service. This section of the year's work will constitute part of the process of preparing the soil for a future harvest, but at the same time, it will help present production in connection with the close of the New World Movement. The last phase of the year's activities concerns the closing up of the special five-year campaign called the New World Movement. This is of prime, because of immediate, importance.

General Director Aitchison has made great plans, and all the forces of the denomination have rallied to his program with the determination adequately to support the operations of this year and at the same time wipe out every debt of every denominational agency connected with the Movement.

A series of great Bible and missionary conferences have been planned for October and November. These will be held in a score or more of the great centers of population. The conferences will be preceded by sixty or more Loyalty Luncheons held under the auspices of the Women's Continuation Campaign committee and followed by about the same number of Bible and missionary rallies. The expectation is that the information and inspiration of all these gatherings will revive the love and vision of the members of every local church, and enable every church to collect all pledges in full and produce much new money from the unpledged members.

The task confronting us all is a great one, but there is a finer sense of team play and denominational unity than for a long time and if we will all keep our eyes on Christ and our hearts free from guile and work together as brethren, the future promises us a great victory.

We hope you will begin now to do your part of this year's activities and secure within your own life the real spirit of victory. If you have victory, you can help others to get it under the leading of the Holy Spirit.

Now for the Meeting at Stockholm!

DURING the last few weeks, when the attention of the churches needed to be given largely to other matters of great importance to the work of our missionary and educational organizations, THE BAPTIST has refrained from giving very much publicity to the plans for promoting attendance at Stockholm. Now that the fiscal year of the societies has closed, we are glad to urge again that Northern Baptists send a large delegation to Stockholm.

It would mean much to our denominational life if several hundred of our pastors could go to Stockholm. It would mean much, too, if several hundred of our laymen and good women could make the journey. In Europe the impression would be most favorable if outstanding laymen were known to be actively identified with church work in America.

There will be a limited representation of the mission fields and native churches in the meeting at Stockholm, which will constitute an inspiring feature of the gathering, and practically every country in Europe is expected to send delegates. It is not yet certain that delegates from Russia can secure permission to leave their country for the meeting at Stockholm.

It is a pity that the mission fields cannot be more largely represented at Stockholm. Dr. E. Y. Mullins, president of the Southern Baptist Convention, has been urging that the churches in the South not only send their pastors as a means of promoting missionary interest, but that they consider lending assistance also to missionaries who are at home on furlough, and who cannot at their own charges make the trip to Stockholm. The suggestion is admirable. And why not make provision for some of the home missionaries as well? Let the churches take seriously such a suggestion. We are sure the missionary organizations, home and foreign, would welcome the cooperation of the churches in this matter.

Of course it will cost money to go to Stockholm. So does it cost money to go any year to any religious or political convention. But who can measure the value of our great gatherings? Probably no large cooperative plans would be made by the denomination if such meetings were not held. Other denominations began immediately at the close of the war to prepare for ecumenical gatherings, and some were held in 1920 and 1921. It is high time to hold another meeting of the Baptist World Alliance. It will cost money to hold it. It might cost much to the usefulness of the denomination in the world at large if it were not held. And it will prove highly profitable to all who can attend it. One of America's greatest Christian leaders has said: "There will be no way discovered that will prevent the expensive process of having to cross oceans and continents in order to promote and preserve right understanding between nations." THE BAPTIST agrees that the congress at Stockholm may be made to promote international justice and good-will, as well as to strengthen our denomination everywhere for its own specific tasks

A Page of Opinion

The Matter Does Not Rest Here

"IF ANY one supposes that the action taken by so narrow a margin of votes in the late General Assembly respecting the Philadelphia-New York matter is a final disposition of the issues thus raised, he will speedily by the course of events be undeceived. New York Presbytery in thoughtful and patient wisdom will know how to answer on its own part the mandate which the General Assembly has transmitted to it. But the rest of the church has a broader concern to be mindful of, which it cannot call settled until a settlement has been reached in accord with the spirit of the gospel.

"It is unthinkable that Presbyterianism shall permanently stand before the American people bearing the onus of trying to suppress such marvelously powerful preaching of Christ Jesus as has distinguished the pulpit of First Church, New York, while Harry Emerson Fosdick has been ministering there. The people know what the message of that pulpit is, and they know it is not what the Philadelphia overture represented it to be. They may not be able to pass judgment on its conformity to the Westminster theological standards, but whoever reads his Bible knows, if he has listened to Doctor Fosdick's voice or followed his pen without prejudice, that this man preaches the Bible. To discuss the status of Doctor Fosdick on the ministerial staff of First Church is reasonable; even Doctor Alexander admitted on the floor of Assembly that his relation there is, ecclesiastically speaking, anomalous. But repudiating his preaching in that place is a quite different matter; it is banning by church fiat what the Spirit of God has openly acknowledged and blessed. And that is a shame from which the Presbyterian church must be effectually delivered before those can rest to whom biblical (and Presbyterian) liberty of prophesying is precious.

"Moreover, it is necessary to attend to that other serious matter of distorted interpretation of 'the word of God and our standards.' The formula of 'five points' reiterated by the Indianapolis Assembly must be put in true balance. A doctrinal statement which lays a more strenuous emphasis on the virgin birth than on the incarnation certainly does not represent Presbyterian thinking. The Westminster Confession is entirely sensible on this point, and any reaffirmation should be conformed to its language and tone."—The Continent.

As Others See Us

"FUNDAMENTALISTS seem to derive their name from lack of interest in the fundamentals of Christianity and their passionate addiction to odds and ends of dogma borrowed from other religions. This is particularly true in the Baptist church, of which the history has been little more than variations on the theme of liberty of the individual conscience and the individual congregation. Like other religious bodies, the Baptists have sometimes been more concerned for the rights of minorities when they were in the minority than when they got on top; yet the beginnings of Baptist history in the United States are also the beginnings of that complete religious tolerance which eventually was universally accepted in principle, though it is not even yet obtrusively evident in practice.

"All that needs to be said of the action of the Northern Baptist Convention in its meetings this year and last is that it is living up to the tradition of Roger Williams. In gratifying contrast with the two other great denominations whose recent assemblies have shown that the struggle between liberty and obscurantism in their membership is still undecided, the Baptists seem to be determined to set their faces forward, at least north of Mason and Dixon's Line. The reiterated attempt to impose a creed failed disastrously.

"It ought to be plain, though evidently it is not, even to all Baptists, that this 'victory of the liberals' imposes not the slightest restraint upon the belief or practice of the adherents of old-time orthodoxy. If there is any principle that is fundamental in Baptist polity, it is the autonomy of the individual congregation. Other churches may refuse fellowship, if they like; but they can do no more, and in practice they hardly ever do even that. Congregations inclined to so-called fundamentalist doctrine are free to go in for it. The 'liberals' will not stand in their way; all that the liberals ask is that the road be left open for those who want to go ahead."—Editorial in New York Times.

It is evident that the writer of this editorial is not a Baptist, nor was he in attendance at Atlantic City. —EDITOR.

National Church Attendance Movement

THE publicity of an organization of the above name has recently appeared soliciting financial support for a movement that is described as "non-sectarian, non-profiting," but which aims particularly at interesting business men in promoting church attendance. It is declared that "a national asset of known value to American industry may be increased by inspiring church attendance." A circular letter contains the statement that "A survey shows that people who go to church seldom commit crimes against society or engage in bolshevik activities. Furthermore, conscientious workers help stabilize industry and commerce." The church is, among other things, declared to be the "basis of law and its observance" and "protectorate for American industrial enterprises." All of which is doubtless true, but we confess we do not wax enthusiastic over the motives urged.

The Call of the Hour

"Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness—II Peter 3:13

A CONVENTION ADDRESS

By Harold C. Phillips

THIS is indeed a unique audience. There are gathered here representatives from, I suppose, every Northern State and from churches of varied outlook. And if it were possible for each delegate present to address this convention, I have no doubt that we should hear very different reports and very different emphases.

But in spite of the geographical and constitutional differences which may exist among us, we all, as Christian believers, have one great common objective, which is to change the world in which we live; to make it a Christian world; and it is about this common tie that binds us all that I desire to speak. Was not this the thought that the Apostle Peter had in mind when in the third chapter and the thirteenth verse of his second epistle he wrote: "Nevertheless, we according to his promise look for new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness"?

Not Permanent Legacies

The human heart has from time immemorial always found one of its greatest sources of inspiration and power in the hope of something new and better to come. The burdens of the present have been made lighter, its sorrows have been sweetened, its hardships and disappointments have been made endurable by the thought that somehow the future, like the breaking of the dawn upon a night of darkness, would bring in a new and better day—a day in which song would follow sighing, in which peace would follow strife, in which the things for which we have longed and hoped and toiled would become a reality. Indeed, as one thinks of the progress which humanity has made, he questions whether humanity could have endured what it has endured had it not been for this power—psychological is it? Call it what you will; it is nonetheless a real power that comes from the thought that somehow the catastrophies or calamities or hardships of the immediate present are not in themselves permanent legacies which we shall carry all through life, but are the darkest hour which precedes the dawn.

A very striking example of this, I think, is the great war through which we have so recently passed. There can be little doubt that one of the greatest powers which nerved the Allies, even in their darkest moments, was the hope that as a result of victory a new and better earth would be born. The events which have transpired since the signing of the armistice may be tending to disillusion us somewhat; but as to the fact that we believed that Germany and the Central Powers stood between us and a better day—as to the power that came from this thought, there can be little doubt.

"According to the Promise"

It seems quite natural, therefore, that we should hear Peter speaking the way he does. Perhaps this was one of the things that inspired him, as it did so many of the other writers of the New Testament, as they were brought face to face with the un-Christian conditions of their age, to look those conditions square in the face and to say, "We know the times are bad, we know the times are un-Christian, nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." Such was the hope of the early Christians and such is our hope. We may differ with these saintly men radically as to how this new earth is going to come, but the fact of its coming should be just as real to us as it was to them; for as we think of the condition of the world today, we are not satisfied with it. Our hearts are inspired and our hope is kindled as we, too, look for the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

So much in a general way for the fact that the hope of a brighter future has always been and is today one of the chief sources from which we, as Christians, derive our power to press on. But now, more specifically, who is going to bring in this new earth? By what agencies is it to be effected? I suppose that one of the reasons for the courage and the optimism with which so many of the writers of the New Testament faced the future, was due to the fact that they thought that the coming of the new earth was something which was totally and entirely in the hands of God—that it was going to come in spite of human efforts rather than because of human effort. Sheltered beneath this protecting thought, they could look out upon the un-Christian conditions of their age and as they saw the sky overcast by the clouds of sin, they could say, "Let the clouds gather; the time will come when God of his own self will break the clouds; the sun will shine again; the air will be purer; lo, a new earth will be born!" Today, while we do not underestimate one iota the tremendous part that God is playing in the bringing about of the new earth, we are, nevertheless, coming to see that human actions and human behavior bear a much more strategic and eternal relationship to the coming of the new earth than of the passing clouds which but temporarily veil the sun. We are coming to see that if the new earth ever comes, it is going to come when we help God to bring it and not before, for God can move no faster than we are willing to move with him. Now, if this is so, and I say it with all reverence, it is going to take more courage, and more faith for us to believe firmly in the coming of the new earth than it did for these saintly men, because from the vantage point of nineteen hundred years we see some things that they did not see, we know some things that they could not possibly have known. For one thing, we see that in addition to that implicit faith in God which they had and which they handed down to us we must add faith in man, and that is harder.

Life's New Meaning

Now what does this mean for us? It means first, that all human life—your life and mine—assumes a new significance and takes on new meaning. I was reading the other day from the writings of that great Christian soul, John Wesley, and he was telling of an experience he once had. He said that once he went out into the fields and saw a group of Indians sitting by the bank of a river. They spent their time in looking at each other, looking at the bubbles in the water and looking at the sky. Except in time of war that was their occupation. What a life to live! But then, he suggested, how do they differ from us? How do we live? We eat and sleep; we work and play. Some of us think we should like to become rich and get the mania for collecting money. Others of us want to become professional men and go to college and get an education. And then what? Is that all? Are these things the ultimate ends of life? If they are, then we are at best but poor mortals following blind alleys which lead us nowhere.

Nothing Is Lost

Christ says no, life means more than that. We are laborers together with God, working with God, helping him to bring in the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness. We cannot possibly understand life apart from that great objective. Apart from that great objective our lives are at best but beautiful soapbubbles which are blown up, display their colors to the sunlight and just break and are gone. But with that great objective we may feel that, like the thousands and thousands of little streams which are this morning flowing from every continent, our lives are not isolated units wandering aimlessly, but that they are all destined to find a larger and a fuller and a common life in the profundity of the ocean, so that everything that we do, whether it be the singing of an inspiring song, the speaking of a kindly word, the doing of some generous act, the electing of clean and capable men to official positions — whatever it is, is not lost, for it is all contributing towards the bringing of the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

So much for the fact that we are going to help God bring in the new earth and that this adds new meaning to our life.

But there is another thought, and it is this—how is the new earth to come? There is a difference of opinion here. I am one of those who believe that it is going to come slowly, very slowly. There are many Christian people whose devotion and Christian enthusiasm we all admire, but who think that the new earth is going to come just as suddenly as light is ushered into a dark room when one presses an electric button. And there are others of us who think that it is going to come rather like the breaking of the dawn, at first but dimly seen upon the horizon and yet gradually but irresistibly throwing itself across the canopy of the sky. You and I shall not live to see the new earth in its entirety, but we are so sowing that others shall reap just as it is that we are reaping what others have sown. I have sometimes thought of the pioneer missionaries—Robert Morrison, who went to China; David Livingston, who died in the dark heart of Central Africa—the men who broke the virgin soil of the foreign field with their life blood. How discouraged they must have been! Think of Morrison as he met the stolid conservatism of that great nation which traditionally has harbored a spirit of fear, if not of antagonism towards the foreigner. He must have died feeling that he had accomplished little. And yet today China of all nations is the most eager for the best that the West can give her and her young men are literally crowding our western universities. The pioneer missionaries did not live to see the new earth wherein dwelleth missionary activity, but they laid the foundations on which we have built, they sowed the seed which we are reaping. Others will reap what we are sowing. The writer to the Hebrews expresses the thought when, after having recounted the great Christian martyrs, he added pathetically, These all died in faith, not having obtained the promises. God having provided some better things for us, that they without us should not be made perfect.

Prayer

ETERNAL God, our heavenly Father, who made of one blood all men to dwell upon the face of the earth, and hast called us all to be laborers together with thee, grant that the bigness of our task may so enlarge our hearts, that we shall know no creed but right and no obligation but truth through Jesus Christ, our Lord—the Way, the Truth and the Light.

We are going to help God bring the new earth, and the new earth which is the kingdom of God on earth, is going to come slowly. All good things come slowly, but I believe it will come, and my reason for believing it will come is that other new earths have already come.

As a matter of fact, the significant word in this text is not the word "new" it is rather the word "righteousness." We have already had many new earths. Let me mention some of the new earths that have already come. Commercial intercourse has given to us a new earth. There was a time when each nation, perhaps, better, each tribe, used to think that it was the earth and lived in blissful isolation and ignorance of every other nation. Today the cords of commercial intercourse have tied up all the nations of the world in one big bundle, and we are either going all to swim or all to sink. Kipling somewhere compares the plying of merchant vessels between the western and the eastern hemispheres to flying shuttles weaving the warp and the woof together into a world-wide industrial brotherhood. There are still many patriotic Americans who are reuttering the words of our ancestors to avoid entangling alliances. We cannot do it, we are a hundred years behind the times. I shall never forget one of my old professors in college when the war started. As he would take up the papers and read of the tragedies in Europe, with a smile on his face he would say, "Boys, I never was so thankful for the Atlantic Ocean as I am now." But it did not take him very long to find out that the Atlantic Ocean has been bridged, and please God, it will remain bridged. I grant you, that we as a nation may disclaim all theoretical interest in European affairs. We may refuse to commit ourselves by treaty or other written document regarding our responsibility for or interest in the affairs of Europe. But as a matter of fact, we can no more avoid being shaken, and shaken violently by European affairs than can the peaceful harbor avoid the angry urge of the boisterous ocean. Commercial intercourse has given to us a new earth wherein dwelleth mutual international dependence.

Not Enough

But a new earth wherein dwelleth commerce is not enough, for commerce has no soul. It has no predominating humanitarian interest. It is interested not primarily in people but in things. Its chief object is to make money. Hence, see England sending to the shores of the Orient the opium traffic—even when China was trying to free herself from it. And see the brewers of America trying to establish in China the saloon which our country is trying to drive out. No, a new earth wherein dwelleth commerce will not save us.

Democracy has given to us a new earth. No longer do we bow our heads to kings or follow blindly the dictates of those above us. Today every one of us, to a degree, has something to say as to how he shall be governed. Democracy has given to us a new earth wherein dwelleth, if even to a small degree, liberty, equality, fraternity. But a new earth wherein dwelleth democracy—in spite of the fact that we gave billions of dollars and millions of lives to make the world safe for democracy—will not save us; for you know, as well as I do, that democracy is capable of being used in the hands of unprincipled men to perpetrate crimes which are just as horrible as were ever possible under the most autocratic system of government. A new earth wherein dwelleth democracy is not enough.

Science has given to us a new earth. Science has completely changed the face of the earth on which we live. No longer do eclipses scare us as they did our ancestors. We can read the heavens now as we read a book. We can tell of all the movements of the stars and planets with just as much accuracy and precision as we can the movements of checkers on a checker board. No longer do plagues wipe out, as they once did, vast civilizations; for science has taught us the secret of germ warfare. Science has given us a new earth wherein dwelleth knowledge. But a new earth wherein dwelleth science is not enough, for science is capable of most damnable things. Think of what it does in time of war! Listen to the words of a military scientist of the English-speaking race when he writes, "German warfare was tried on a small scale during the late war, and its results have been promising. The method of its use was in poisoning water supplies with cholera and typhus germs, and the loosing of dogs innoculated with rabies into enemy country. Here, at least, is a promising beginning from which vast developments are to be hoped for." That's science without God! If science has taught us anything, it has taught us the failure of mere intellectual acumen to save the world. Indeed, one of the problems with which all thoughtful men who are concerned about the future of humanity are wrestling is this—that our moral development is not keeping pace with our intellectual progress. We are discovering the secrets of science faster than we have the moral stamina to use them. . . .

My friends, the new earth that we need, and without which we perish, is the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, justice, integrity, love. Would to God that some one, at some time, preaching on this text will say, "Christianity has given us a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." When will it come? It will come when ministers scrap and scrap forever, the pleasing platitudes, which are absolutely safe and harmless, and become even as Noah, "preachers of righteousness," and when the world of laymen get deadly in earnest about it. Ships did not jump from lumber piles and launch themselves upon the ocean. Men made commercial intercourse possible. Democracy did not thrust itself upon us like sunshine after a night of darkness. Men thought enough of democracy, and think enough of democracy, to fight for it, to die for it, to live for it. Science did not just suddenly dawn upon us—hundreds of thousands of scientists have worked and are at this moment working with almost superhuman effort in dark and dingy laboratories to make scientific progress possible. Why, then, should we think that righteousness is going to fall from the skies by some divine fiat? It just won't. God does not work that way. It will come when we think enough of it, to take it out of our pulpits and out of our churches, and to make it a part of all our human relationships, and if we do not do that, it will never come.

Personal Righteousness

What kind of righteousness do we need? May I say first, personal righteousness? For the individual who has not proved the supremacy of righteousness as a method of conducting his own life, will not want it for society or for the world.

But personal righteousness, as important as it is, is not enough. We need to work also for social righteousness, because there is such a thing as social wrong. How shall we ever get social righteousness? For one thing, we shall have to be free men. This will mean that we cannot be democrats all the time; nor republicans all the time. It will mean that we shall not be forever condemning labor as being radical and bolsheviki in its attempt to better its conditions; nor shall we be forever accusing capital of being the source of all the world's social ills. It will mean that we shall have to see the truth of what Abraham Lincoln had in mind when he said in substance that he would go with a man and stand with a man as long as he was right, but part from him when he was wrong. It will mean that we shall have and know but one obligation, and that shall be to follow the right, as God gives us to see the right, wherever it may lead us, and whatever the cost, and if we cannot do that we are not Christian.

Further, we need and must strive for international righteousness. Such mottoes as, "Our country may she always be in the right, but right or wrong, our country!" will have to go! Such mottoes as "America first" must go from our vocabulary and from our thinking. They must go because they are unChristian. I am wondering how much of the suffering, the tragedy and the misery which there is in the world today—particularly in the Near East—is due to that motto! I will no more subscribe to the motto "America first" than I would to the motto "England first" or "Canada first" or any nation "first." It was that nationalism that brought hell to the earth a few years ago, and it is to be no more admired in our own nation than it was in Germany.

This, then, my friends, is the task to which God calls. The building of a new earth of righteousness in ourselves, in society and internationally. Are we big enough for the task? It is our task to help men and women to see that just as it is that a large building is doomed to fall unless underneath it all and through it all and above it all are those unseen but real bars of steel reenforcement which hold it up, so are all these great superstructures of man's imagination and of sound commerce, democracy, science and others that we might mention, doomed to destruction unless they are permeated by the spirit of righteousness.

To conserve these great human values is our task for God and with God.

The Year in Foreign Missions

A new day is dawning on our war-weary world. The clouds are still here, but they are lighter now. Men cry for something positive and constructive.

By Frederick L. Anderson

AGAIN we praise God for his wonderful blessings upon our work in foreign fields, and upon our labors at the home base. It has been a far better year than the one which preceded it. We have had perplexities, difficulties and obstacles to tax our faith, patience and courage, but God has brought us through. At Indianapolis we raised the cry, "Not one inch more!" of retreat in the face of the enemy. Today we can report that the retreat has been stopped, that our lines have been consolidated, and that debts are diminishing rather than increasing.

In the meantime the Pentecost of blessing on the Congo continues. Forty-five hundred have been baptized within eighteen months and backsliders by the hundred have returned to their Father's house. The Russian revival, too, goes right on.

Largest Number of Baptisms

Reaping time has come on many of our other fields and in some of them unprecedented harvests are being gathered in. Last year the Lord gave us 32,000 newly baptized converts in heathen lands, the most in sixteen years. Today we thankfully record that the number of baptisms in the same fields is 17,000, without exception the largest number ever reported in the history of our society. May God grant an equal or even greater advance next year! Our insistent emphasis on evangelism begins to bear fruit, and it is an evangelism which fills our schools with future leaders and is largely the result of the labors of men and women trained in our schools. We must never put the gospel and education over against each other. They are twin sisters, who normally play with each other's hands—as in America, the church and the schoolhouse go together.

Even on fields where the sower yet talks larger than the reaper, there is reported a new openness of mind toward our preaching, a weakening of opposition, and a disappearance of prejudice, which is most hopeful. The long process of sapping and running, so patiently pursued by our missionaries and our native Christian leaders, and so little appreciated by either their cities or their friends, appears now to be honeycombing the foundations of heathenism. As heathenism crumbles, we must see to it that Christianity, rather than some form of unbelief, reaps the advantage. Agnosticism might be a more stubborn foe than heathenism.

He lacks insight who cannot perceive that a new day is dawning on our war-weary world. The clouds are still here, but they are lighter now. Thunder clouds occasionally appear, but they vanish again after a little growling. The wind is shifting to a more favorable quarter and it looks as though we should soon see the blue sky here and there. Politics and commerce are slowly being stabilized. The forces of rebellion against morality and Christ are finding their new negative attitudes vain and unsatisfactory. Men cry for something positive and constructive, and are beginning to see that after all only on Christ may society—or the individual—base life and hope. Once more he and he alone looms as the Redeemer of the world. The nobler aspirations roused by the war, and seemingly overwhelmed by the subsequent wave of reaction which threatened to engulf all our hopes, again raise their heads and bid fair to win all that they can reasonably expect. Not just as we imagined, but in some truer, broader and more profound way are our ideals likely to be attained.

With such a view of the future and relying on God, who makes the light to shine out of darkness, and continually creates new situations and opportunities, your board faces the world's renaissance with highest hopes, while we can only dimly see the outlines of the age to be. There are some things here and now which belong to the new order and demand our interest and the service of our love. The first is the great Protestant revolution now taking place in Central and Western Europe. Roumania, Hungary, the Balkans, are all affected by it, but it is especially apparent in Czecho-Slovakia, the Baltic states and Russia. However much we may deplore certain tragic events in the process, it cannot be denied that the old Greek Catholic Church, which boasted the czar as its head, is in the throes of dissolution, and that out of its ruins is bound to spring a church, or churches, less formal, more vital, more democratic and more evangelical. It is well that the old shell is broken even by a hostile force, and that there is a chance for new thinking, new aspiration and new groupings in the religious life of the Muscovite race. In this, we as Baptists, who were among the original Protestants and have ever been Protestants of the most radical variety, are deeply involved, as our Baptist brethren in Russia are now multiplying as never before, and can offer Russia just what she needs for her religious life—a spiritual, democratic, evangelical free church. This Protestant revolution in Europe furnishes Baptists one of the greatest opportunities for service to the kingdom of God ever presented in our long history.

Meeting an Opportunity

Last year we met this opportunity by sending three of the leading members of our board—Brothers Taylor, Jones and Abernethy, accompanied by Brother Shepard at his own charges—on a friendly and evangelistic mission to these lands. You know how wonderfully the Lord blessed their work, how many of our Baptist churches were cheered and strengthened and helped to rise above their poverty and persecutions; how many hundreds were brought to Christ; how our European leaders welcomed the American brethren with joyful and thankful hearts, and how the whole cause of evangelical Christianity was placed in a new light, and given a new dignity and opportunity in every one of these countries. Some of us had our visions, but none of us dreamed of the accomplishment of such great good and at such little cost! So we are asking another board member, Brother Cummings, and Brother Gravett, our vice-president, to do a similar service and open an even wider door of opportunity in sections hitherto unvisited.

And as far as Russia is concerned, Brother Rushbrooke has been repeatedly talking frankly with the authorities in Moscow on questions of relief and incidentally persuading our Baptist brethren to unite in a single body, while our representative, Brother Lewis in Southern Russia, has distributed to the Russian Baptists and others in the famine region, the large supply of clothing furnished by our churches.

The Daughter Hostess

Last of all, we have done all we can to make the third meeting of the Baptist World Alliance a success. Sweden, once a mission land, now a full-grown daughter in our Baptist house, will act as hostess at Stockholm. Here we hope that the smaller groups of heroic Baptists from the continent of Europe will meet the older and larger groups from America, Great Britain, Sweden and Germany, and gain courage and hope when they see that they are not alone in their often desperate struggles for freedom and spirituality; that millions in the land stand with them, pray for them and are brothers indeed. We expect, too, that the meeting will be so large, so representative, so filled with the Spirit that the people and governments of Europe will take note of it and that henceforth those who have hitherto oppressed them will give our Baptist brethren that place, opportunity and hearing which they so richly deserve. And it is our ardent prayer that the Baptists of the world will be able to make a deliverance at Stockholm to all peoples, which will give wings to our distinctive principles to fly the whole world around.

The second patent fact which indicates the dawning of a new day is the awakening of China, India, and even Africa, to a new national feeling. With this goes a desire to manage their own affairs and a growing sense of ability to do so. Acknowledging their indebtedness to a master civilization, they wish in the light of our science to construct their own edifice of philosophy, government and economics free from the dictation of Europe or America. And what more nearly concerns us, they would be equally self-reliant and independent in the sphere of ethics and religion. Many would even make loyalty to the old national faiths an integral part of the new patriotism, and regard Christianity askance as a foreign religion, an importation from the west, acceptance of which would be an acknowledgment of inferiority.

The Christians of these lands share this spirit in large measure and are not only desiring but demanding a larger portion in responsibility for the work and its management.

The most notable organized expression of this new feeling among native Christians was the National Christian Conference at Shanghai, May 2-11 of last year. Note its name, the National Christian Conference. It was essentially and truly a Chinese conference. It was "the largest and most representative conference of the Christian churches of China ever held." The whole meeting was really managed by the Chinese, and Chinese Christians embraced the opportunity of presenting to their Chinese fellow Christians and to the nation at large a noble Christian message, a great historic Christian deliverance, entirely from the Chinese point of view. This was something new in the history of our religion, a most significant and cheering token of real progress. Though the missionaries were present in large numbers and were treated with all honor and courtesy, yes, even with gratitude and Christian affection, the meeting marked the epoch when the 400,000 Christians of China took steps in the direction of assuming the leadership of the Christian movement in that great republic, with the intention of inaugurating a Chinese Christianity, which should develop along its own lines according to the genius of the Chinese people, and should adapt itself to the needs and longings of China. Thus and thus only, can Christianity become native to the Chinese soul.

An Indian Christianity

The movement for self-government in India, not only tolerated but even wisely ordered by the British government, will have permanent results. The Ghandi propaganda had many Christian elements in it and powerfully impressed the people of India. The imprisonment of the leader checked the campaign, but the sentiments aroused were real and profound, and are cherished in the depths of millions of hearts. In India, as well as in China, this new spirit has affected the Christians and has resulted in their taking a new attitude of responsibility and ownership in the cause of Christ in India. There must, and there will be an Indian Christianity, not a transplanted American and British product. When the crown of India is placed on the brow of Christ, the crown will be of Indian workmanship and reverently set upon the Saviour's head by the hands of Indians, not missionaries, however much they rejoice in the fruition of their labors and sacrifices, that great day.

For the last few years your board has watched the awakening of the spirit of China and India and has adapted its policy to meet it, as long since in Japan. First of all we welcome it right heartily. It is just in line with our policy of self-sustaining, self-directing and self-propagating churches. What we have for years tried to get the native churches to see and assume, many of them now demand. It is a notable step forward in the right direction, but fraught with consequences which we cannot yet clearly foresee.

We agree with the presuppositions on which the demand is based. Christianity is not the religion of the West or of the East. In fact it originated midway between them. But it is the universal religion, exactly fitted to meet the needs and longings of the Chinese, the Indian and African, just as it is exactly fitted to the American and the European. The stigma of "foreignism" must be removed from it in the minds of all Orientals just as soon as possible, and the only way to do it is for Christianity to wear the dress and speak the language and take the guise of the Oriental. It must be reinterpreted Chinese and Indians in Chinese and Indian terms to the Chinese and Indian mind and heart, and in like manner to every nation on this round earth.

The Baptist doctrine of the independence of the local church is a godsend to us in this crisis. With Luther we believe that when two or three are gathered together in his name, there Christ is in all the fullness of his power and grace, and if that be so, what man can be added to them and who shall dare to arrogate to himself authority on them? Two small groups can have no more spiritual authority than one, for the same Christ is in their midst, and the same spirit guides each of them. So the spirituality of Christianity demands not only the democracy, but the freedom of the local church.

Just as soon as the local church in China, India, Japan or Africa attains the self-support and in some cases before that, it becomes independent of us, and with reference to it, we are like the mother, who must concede a new and growing liberty to her boy, who has reached man's estate. It is a critical and anxious time in the life of both the mother and the boy, and a great deal depends on a timely and wise renunciation of authority, and a large and sympathetic love on the mother's part.

LEADERS! Leaders! Leaders! We ask the Lord for native leaders, to stand beside the missionary as his equals and colleagues, and finally to replace him in the management and control of native Christianity. All our work is being reorganized with this new situation in mind.

When that crisis comes, we cannot surely guard against the possibility that these churches in foreign lands, may grow away from us. We cannot hold them by force or law, the power of money or any device of organization, but if we have not antagonized them by trying to hold them too long against their will, we may still hold them by the cord of love, gratitude, respect and unity of faith and purpose. In that hour, the test will come whether the things we have taught have entered into the warp and woof of their minds and hearts or not, whether they have merely acquiesced in our Baptist principles or have thoroughly and enthusiastically made them their own.

These coming years will also test Northern Baptists as to whether they shall believe in the independency of the local church on the other side of the Pacific. We believe in it in America, but do we believe in it in India? The temptation will be very great to try to hold on when we ought to let go, to plead too much all we have done for them and thus make claims on their gratitude which will embarrass their growing feeling of independence and to indulge in various expedients to neutralize the logical results of our historic doctrine. If the hen has hatched chickens, though there may be much anxiety, all will be well, but if the hen has hatched ducks, what will happen?

Your board has already taken its position in a resolution passed at the November meeting in Northfield which reads; "The board recognizes the independency of indigenous Baptist churches, and records it as its judgment that neither the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society nor its missionaries have a right to legislate for such churches."

But with the growing independence of these churches, and the assumption by them of larger duties and responsibilities, the need for competent spiritual leaders becomes more imperative. It takes no prophet to see that without such leaders, the new freedom will end in disaster. We are therefore compelled by the circumstances of the time to stress the Christian education which will give us leaders, independent and self-reliant in spirit, loyal to Christ, rooted in the scripture with broad and true vision and an overflowing spiritual life.

Your board rejoices that its schools are turning out just such men in considerable numbers, and will insist on an ever increasing production of them.

Leaders! Leaders! Leaders! We ask the Lord for native leaders, to stand beside the missionary as his equals and colleagues, and finally to replace him in the management and control of native Christianity.

All our work is being reorganized with this new situation in mind. The native leaders are continually assuming more of the management; more and more they are being recognized as equals by our missionaries, are taking positions of power and responsibility, and are going forth with the missionary passion into the regions beyond. Our educational institutions are increasingly electing them to places on the boards of trustees and on the faculties. Many of them are proving themselves most inspiring to others. Someway they are often able to instill Christian ideas, methods and viewpoints into the native mind and heart in a way impossible to one who belongs to another race and speaks something beside his mother tongue. So the transfer of your educational institutions to the native churches has already begun. With our view of the future, we must make sure therefore that we do not build them so large that the expense will forever prohibit their being carried by the native constituency.

Self-Support a Joy

This policy of gradually devolving our work upon our spiritual children in foreign lands creates in them a new enthusiasm and zeal. A report from South India reads: "It is a joy to know how the churches are taking up this work of self-support. There is a universal feeling of ownership on the part of every Telugu, a new responsibility, a new life. In the Kandukuru field, entirely given over to the Telugus, there are no less than twenty voluntary workers. In every village the headman has taken special interest in the Christians and has helped them."

Turning to the financial situation, we remind you that in the first year after Denver which ended in the great drive of May 1920, when we went in the New World Movement period and yet not in it either, we rolled up a deficit of $808,000 because no adequate effort could be made to raise our funds. That was the foundation of all financial troubles. The next year which was in the true sense the first year of the New World Movement, we paid $119,000 on our deficit reducing it to $689,000. But this was more than canceled the year following by an increasing $225,000 so that we went forward to report last year at Indianapolis a deficit of $914,-000.

That was a tremendous deficit, a staggering, dangerous deficit of nearly a million dollars. But your board faced it, and by the grace of God and by dint of careful planning and wise saving, we have the great joy of telling you today that your deficit has been reduced by $253,000 and that it now stands at $661,-000, the least you have been behind at the close of any year since May, 1919.

We announced at Indianapolis, that we had determined to deal in earnest with our deficit, that we had reduced the current budget by 25 per cent, and had placed in it $100,000 for a first payment on what we owed. This we increased a little later to $150,000 and then adopted a plan by which the deficit could all be wiped out in five years, if the churches would hold steady in the contributions for foreign missions. We now hope to get it all paid in less than five years without further reduction in our work, if you will be faithful to this great task, so dear to our Lord's heart.

A Menace

In the meantime we maintain the 25 per cent cut in our budget, and are taking steps to stabilize our finances to meet the variations and uncertainties of the future. This huge deficit of $661,000 is still a menace. Its hugeness we do not wish in any way to minimize and it must still be the first object of attack in our financial planning. The sooner it is liquidated, the sooner we can make a solid and permanent advance and we do not propose to spend more on the work until we are practically rid of it.

The crippling deficit of the Woman's Foreign Society still threatens our future, for our relations are very close. They can close the year with no such happy results as ours, not because of any lack of wisdom or foresight, but because they do not enjoy some of the advantages which have made our reductions possible. Until their deficit is also on the way to extinction, we cannot be safe.

How did this considerable reduction in our deficit come about in spite of our failure to receive from the churches $7,000,000 of distributable funds? Well, it was due to favorable circumstances, to wise planning and real saving—to tell the whole story, our deficit very early in the year rose to $950,000 due to an adjustment of accounts with the General Board of Promotion, therefore paid actually $289,000 on that figure, bringing it down to $661,000 as already announced. How did we manage it? We shall try to answer that question plainly and in the large, so that everybody can understand it, and in so doing we must disregard smaller items and talk only in round figures. The three outstanding facts are these. First, we reduced our expenses 25 per cent, as did all the other societies. Second, we placed in our budget $150,000 for our deficit. Third, we did not touch our usual contingent fund, which this year amounted to $50,000 and a little more. These two items make up $200,000, the great bulk of the reduction on the deficit.

But how did that affect the work? Where did we make the great cuts, which such savings demand? In the first place, with the greatest regret, we cut out $166,000 for European relief, asking the churches to make their contributions to that cause over and above their pledges and therefore outside our budget. This they did. Next, we sent out decidedly fewer missionaries, kept a few others at home and thereby saved another $70,000. Then we reduced home expenses about $20,000 and the work on the field $32,000. This makes a total of $288,000 with a minimum of loss to the field work.

This result would have been impossible however if the income had not been practically the same as the year before, the contributions to the regular budget being only $71,000 less than our expectancy. Therefore all optimism for the future depends on the gifts from our constituency. They must not decrease, or we shall again be in extreme peril. they must increase if we are to advance.

BAPTISTS have every reason to thank God for so wide a service and such matchless opportunities. We have done well, but not so well as some other brigades in our Lord's army, not so well as we might. God is luring us on to greater efforts by blessing us beyond all our hopes and opening to us doors of opportunity which we had not dared to expect. God has prepared the way. The natives wait for his salvation. Shall we not go forward with a fresh hope and a new zeal?

We have thus begun fairly with the payment of your deficit. That was the first duty of the denomination and the board. All deficits are bad, a million dollars deficit is dreadfully dangerous, imperiling our whole enterprise. $661,-000 with an indirect and yet very real responsibility for the large deficit of the Woman's Foreign Society is dangerous only in less degree, especially when we contemplate the exigencies of the future. We believe deficits are to be paid, that "owe no man anything" is good scripture, good morals, good finance and good sense. We must advance, and advance in faith, but our first advance must be in the matter of this deficit, and then we can advance honestly, sanely, soundly and in such a way that we shall not soon need to retreat.

So we must heartily thank God, and this is a day of joy and gladness. But we rejoice with trembling, knowing well that we are not out of the woods, and that two quite critical years lie before us—the last year of the New World Movement and the year following, in which we resume the method of annual pledges. But we trust God and our brethren. We believe that our denomination will honestly pay the pledges made in 1920, and that in the true love of the missionary enterprises we have reason to hope that we shall see a general revival of interest and a general desire to close the New World Movement with all debts paid. But before we meet again in convention, we must take the pledges for a new year, the first of a series of annual pledges. Will the denomination rise to this new test of faith and love and devotion? Are the pessimistic prophesies we hear to be fulfilled? Will there be a reaction from the high lines we reached in 1920? We do not and will not believe it. When the disciples of Jesus Christ who bear the Baptist name really face the crisis and their duty, their real love for God and man and their real surrender of themselves to the Lordship of Jesus will assert themselves. We did not pledge too much in 1920, but far less than we ought to have done in view of our great wealth, the world's needs and the purposes of Christ. Very few have gone without even the comforts and the luxuries of life for the dear sake of their Lord, who, though he was rich, for their sakes became poor. There are very few who cannot give more than they have given. Thousands have found new spiritual life and zest in their standard of giving and would not forsake it, for in it they have found a rich reward. Some are weary of giving, weary of sacrifice, weary of self-denial, weary of the cross—if indeed we can use that same word where there has been no real suffering. They are in a dangerous spiritual state; having put their hands to the plow, they are looking back. Pastors should not encourage this moral lassitude, which is a victory of the flesh over the spirit, but should kindly and firmly show such souls their danger, and the spiritual significance of their attitude. A few of course, afflicted and buffeted by misfortune, cannot give as they did. They have our deepest sympathy and our prayers. We have not been speaking of them, but even they will find that giving out of their poverty even in lesser measure, will bring them joy in their sorrows and light in their darkness.

Work Will Go On

Our people should understand that our foreign work will go right on after May 1, 1924. The missionaries will need to be clothed, fed and sheltered, we shall have to pay the passage of wounded veterans home and of new recruits for the front. Evangelists will still require support as they tour the villages and the jungle. Schools and hospitals must still bring light and healing to future leaders and those in pain. It is a gigantic enterprise. We need so much money because we do so much work. Very few appreciate how vast is our far-flung battle line, reaching from Japan and China, down to South India and the Congo and up into Europe, what a regiment of missionaries we support, and what further regiments of native workers, besides thousands of schools, and scores of hospitals. Last year 1921-22 we spent $626,000 for missionary salaries alone, $307,000 for their work and $220,000 for passage and new appointees. And all this at an expense of about 9 per cent.

Baptists have every reason to thank God for so wide a service and such matchless opportunities. We have done well, but not so well as some other brigades in our Lord's army, not so well as we might. God is luring us on to greater efforts by blessing us beyond all our hopes and opening to us doors of opportunity which we had not dared to expect. God has prepared the way. The natives wait for his salvation. Shall we not go forward with a fresh hope and a new zeal?

Keys and Key Holes

Sunday Evening Address at the Northern Baptist Convention, Atlantic City

By J. Whitcomb Brougher

LUKE tells us that a discussion had arisen among the apostles as to which one of them should be considered the greatest. As they entered the room where they were to enjoy the last supper they should ever have with their Master, no one offered to perform the customary service of washing the feet. This was usually done by a servant. But the discussion had led the apostles to feel that they would not stoop to such menial service for fear they would resign their claim to the title of being great.

Jesus performed this act of hospitality and courtesy and declared that no difference what may be a man's condition or position, the only road to true greatness is in the use of all one's powers and talents for the good of mankind.

Marcus Dods calls attention to the fact that Jesus brought to bear the greatest motives upon the humblest services. Let us note the motive for this act, and then study the meaning of it and the method by which we may imitate it.

The Motives for the Act

John gives to us six wonderful motives that controlled the Christ in the service that he rendered.

The motive set forth gives to us a revelation of the marvelous greatness and duty of the character of Jesus Christ. His deity and his final enthronement are declared. The words of John have more or less been a puzzle to expositors, but they are not so difficult to understand when we consider them as an introduction and a contrast to the simple, kindly, thoughtful, humble services that Jesus is about to perform. Here are the motives.

1. He Acted in View of His Coming Death. Jesus knew "that his hour had come." With the cross just in sight, and death at hand, he took time to teach the disciples that to serve one another was the pathway to greatness.

We are not surprised at his forgiving his enemies and providing for his mother before he died, but we are surprised that one so great and marvelous as the Christ could take time just before his coming crucifixion to adjust the unworthy differences of his weak disciples. What would you have done under the circumstances, if you knew that tomorrow you were to die? What would you want to do to be remembered? Would you seek some selfish, sensational performance or would you seek to render some beautiful, unselfish, unostentatious, unsensational service?

Sam Jones, with his family on the train going home from Oklahoma, at the close of a great meeting, found a woman who was sick. She had three children with her. She had no money to get a berth. He furnished the money, had the woman and children cared for. After they had been made comfortable for the night he went to his own berth and went to sleep. The next morning his wife opened the curtains and found that he had gone home to be with the Lord. Sam Jones within twelve hours of death did what he had always been doing, "helping somebody."

DR. J. Whitcomb Brougher, pastor of the Temple Baptist Church, Los Angeles, gave the closing address Sunday night on the theme, "Keys and Keyholes." He took for his text the words of Christ in Matthew 20:26-28. "Whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister and whosoever shall be first among you shall be your servant; even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many."

He also read the account of Jesus washing the feet of the disciples. Among other things he said, Jesus reveals to us here the fundamental principles of greatness. He gives to us the secret of success. I frequently hear of some man who claims that he has the key to success but when I have studied his life I discover that he has never found the keyhole. I have read a book entitled, "The Key to the Scriptures" but it never unlocked anything for me, in fact I never could find the keyhole. There is no special value in having a key unless there is a keyhole that it fits.

Jesus gives to us an example of humble service and then announces the principle that "He who would be first among you shall be your servant." Upon the authority of Jesus Christ I state without fear of disappointment that any one who will develop all the powers that God has given him and devote them all to the service of mankind is bound to gain real success and genuine happiness.

2. He Was Prompted by an Everlasting Love. "He loved them unto the end." Love overcomes all difficulties and ignores many a fault in order to serve the person loved. In spite of their narrowness, and littleness, their selfishness and sinfulness, their jealousy and envy, he loved them with a constant devotion that led him to serve them continually.

If they had not been sinners they had not needed his services. It was sin that brought Christ into the world. He saw in the sins and sorrows and mistakes of those about him not a chance to criticize but a chance to serve. It is love that makes a mother forever gentle and kind and earnest in order to win the children away from their sinful follies and their ungrateful disobedience. Yes, "He loved them to the end." If they were lost to that which was highest and holiest in manhood; if they were lost finally to the enjoyment of that which was highest and holiest and best it would be in spite of the fact that he never deserted them but loved them down to the very brink of hell.

3. He Acted in View of Treachery. Judas was there. A soul with a fine sense of honor is intensely aroused by the discovery of treachery. Who can forgive the treachery of a friend who uses his intimate knowledge of you to betray you to your enemies. Jesus could do it. He did not unmask Judas before the rest, but knelt by his couch and gently washed and dried his feet. If Judas cannot be won by loving service he will never be won at all. Jesus had taught, "love your enemies, pray for them, do good unto them." He was now practicing what he had preached. Most of us might be willing to wash our enemies' feet if we could use boiling water. Jesus was too great to allow any man to reduce his soul to the littleness of hatred and revenge. He never would "get even" with one who had wilfully wronged him.

We are told that during the Revolutionary War a preacher walked 50 miles to beg General Washington to spare the life of a certain man who had been sentenced to death for neglect of duty; "I am sorry I cannot accede to the request for your friend." The preacher replied, "He is not my friend. I suppose I do not have a worse enemy living." General Washington looked surprised and said, "You are asking a pardon for your enemy?" "Yes," said the preacher. "Then!" said General Washington; "I will grant it." The forgiving spirit of the minister so affected the man that he was transformed from an enemy to a friend.

If Judas cannot be saved by the loving, forgiving spirit of the Christ, he will never be saved.

4. Jesus Acted in the Full Consciousness of His Power. "The Father had given all things into his hands." The consciousness of great power usually asserts itself in a domineering spirit. But Jesus brought his mighty power to the humblest service he could give to man.

Few women conscious of beauty or men conscious of great physical or mental strength are humble. We feel people may discount our ability if we are willing to serve.

Jesus could say, "All authority in Heaven and on earth belongs to me." The knowledge of that fact did not make him autocratic but he brought his unlimited power into the service of mankind. What a joy it must have been for him to be able to do anything he felt ought to be done for the good of mankind!

To have power—to be conscious of ability and then to be humble enough to use it in all the little ministries in life where service can be rendered is a grace greatly to be desired.

General Grant helped his men to lift logs and build a fort. The corporal stood around giving orders. The general said to him, "When you need help again send for me."

5. He Acted in the Full Consciousness of His Dignity. He knew "that he was come from God." But there was no pride of ancestry mixed up in his life. He was born "a gentleman," and lived the life of service.

The pride of ancestry is as difficult to overcome many times as the pride of wealth. To be able to trace one's lineage back to some noble and famous person has been a great source of conceit and supercilious pride. Jesus rebuked this pride when he told the Jews that their relation to Abraham did not necessarily make them true sons of Abraham. He could raise up more worthy sons from the stones, if need be. There are times when it is not well to say too much about the family tree. We have discovered a lot of them out in California that need to be sprayed. We have found others that do not bear anything but nuts.

Booker Washington once asked a white cab-driver to take him to the depot. The white man refused. Mr. Washington said, "If you will get inside and ride I will drive the horse." The white man agreed and Booker Washington drove the horse and cab to the depot. He paid his money and went his way.

Jesus, conscious that he was the Son of God, made himself of no reputation and took upon himself the form of a servant and did the work of a slave.

6. He Acted in Full Consciousness of His Destiny. He knew that he would "go unto God." His high and exalted position did not make him arrogant or indifferent to the service he could render his fellowmen. These are some of the motives which Jesus brought to bear upon the act of "washing the disciples' feet." It is the spirit in which the service is rendered that marks its value. This is true of all labor. It is the "lacky" spirit that makes the "lacky" and not the kind of service he renders. The motive dignifies the work we do, while the want of a noble motive makes it menial.

A story is related that Queen Victoria in her girlhood was spending a day with an aunt who entertained the child for a while and then said, "Victoria, have you anything you would like to do? Choose something and you shall do it if it is possible." The little girl thought a moment and said: "I want to wash windows." The aunt secured the pail and chamois skin, and the future queen of Great Britain and empress of India then scrubbed away to her heart's content. It would be a great thing for most of our cities and our nation if the men and women who are to be elected to offices could have a preliminary course in cleaning up things; we might have a cleaner, healthier and more beautiful nation in which to live.

What is the Meaning of This Act?

Under the spur of the combination of motives mentioned, we might expect some transcendent and wonderful act to be performed. We would have expected a miracle that would have startled the world. Instead, however, we have this act of humble service. What does it mean?

1. It Showed the Courtesy of Jesus. To offer an opportunity to have the feet washed in that age was just as much an act of courtesy as to give your guest an opportunity to remove his overcoat and hat when he comes to your house today. Jesus on one occasion reproached a Pharisee who had invited him to dinner, with a breach of courtesy because he had omitted to have this service performed. Jesus was teaching the disciples that one of the graces of the Christian life was the kind of thoughtfulness which expressed itself in a courtesy that would bring comfort to others.

Said a father to his son: "Treat everybody with consideration, even those who are rude to you; for you show courtesy to others not because they are gentlemen but because you are one." Courtesy does not cost much, but it yields the biggest returns. It is the very essence of service.

I went into a shoe store and asked for a certain kind of golf shoe. The young man said: "We do not keep them." He did not keep anything else, so I went to another store and I told my same story. The clerk said, "We do not keep them." I said I was sorry. He was not, at least he never said so. I went to another store and the clerk suggested a good substitute but added: "If you really want those shoes I will do my best to get them for you." He took my name and address, proposed telephoning to other stores and wholesale houses and said if he could get the shoes he would send them to my office C. O. D. I told him my title was D. D. He further said; "If I can't find them in town I will get them for you if they are manufactured in the United States." I let him get them and they came in three weeks C. O. D. He was a salesman; the other young men were clerks. Courtesy is the very essence of helpful service.

2. It Showed the Humanity of Jesus. True greatness is always humble. The lack of humility on the part of any one displays a sense of weakness somewhere. Self-assertion is always an attempt to overcome conscious weakness. True greatness can be humble without loss of power or dignity. Jesus stooped to conquest; the extreme simplicity of Christ's acts is as difficult to follow, as is the greatness of his character. How simply, how beautifully, how grandly does the character of Jesus shine out in all the splendor of his service to mankind.

3. It Showed the Greatness of Jesus. Jesus Christ was big enough to do a little thing. His life is summed up in the words: "He went about doing good." To always be doing good, to see the opportunities, however small, for helpful service is a great gift.

The Boy Scout motto is worthy to be made the motto of every Christian. "Do some kind act of service every day to somebody without the thought of reward." To practice this is to practice the Golden Rule. To live a life of service is to make one's life a blessing to all mankind. It lifts it above the drudgery of daily duty. Some one asked an Irishman why he was digging a ditch. He said he was digging a ditch to get the money to get food to get the strength to dig the ditch. He kept his nose in a ditch. To make the great purpose of life the glad and happy service of your fellowmen is to take out of drudgery its sting.

The Method of Its Imitation

Jesus said, "Ye call me teacher and Lord and ye say well, for so I am. If I then your Lord and teacher have washed your feet ye ought also to wash one another's feet for I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you." These words are explicit and set forth very plainly the import of the act and the manner in which it was to be remembered. The washing of the disciples' feet was an example.

1. To be imitated, not spiritualized. There is, no doubt, a great spiritual meaning in this act. But we are apt to evaporize it into some sort of spiritual fog that will becloud the atmosphere and let us escape the practical duties of every-day life by merely wishing well those whom we ought to help.

2. It is to be imitated not to be ceremonialized. It was never intended to become an ordinance of the church, nor a ceremony with any special efficacy in it. It was intended as an example of humble service. It was not an example of feet washing. Jesus did not pose as the champion feet-washer of the world. We are told that the pope goes through the ceremony once a year of washing the feet of twelve paupers who are picked out and carefully prepared for the purpose. This is like shaking hands with a man who is drowning and wishing him well but doing nothing to actually save him. It is not a ceremony.

3. It is to be imitated not mimicked. For men to take off their shoes and socks to wash one another's feet when they do not need it, might be apeing Christ but it would not be practicing his example. It is ours to take the figures of the example and apply them to the solution of the problems of life. The multiplication table is a good thing but it was intended to be applied to the solving of the problem of everyday life and not merely be committed to memory and repeated.

"If you know these things happy are you if you do them." An old lady, eighty-seven years of age, with no one specially to care for her, came to my study one morning. She was suffering with a bunion that was full of pus. She needed help. I took her in my automobile to the hospital; the surgeon said it would have to be cut. I agreed to hold her hand while the anaesthetic was given and the operation performed. I had the privilege of looking after her for some days after that. I believe I was washing the disciples' feet.

I parked my automobile in an opening beside the street. It was a little too near a fire plug, there was no other place to park. I was in a hurry and decided to leave it, while I was gone for two minutes. It would have been perfectly safe if some one had been sitting at the wheel of my machine. As I started across the street a man sitting in his machine saw my dilemma. After I had gone into the office building he went across the street and sat at the wheel of my machine. I came back in less than two minutes. The man was a stranger to me. I asked his name. I told him he had done one of the finest acts of kindness ever done for me. He smiled and said it was a little thing to do but he thought it might save me from some trouble. I do not know where he lives, I would not know the man if I met him again but he washed the disciples' feet. When I drove away I resolved that in the spirit of Jesus Christ and the inspiration of this kind act I would watch diligently for a chance to serve those who needed me for two minutes.

You may never get a chance to be a great hero and save the life of some one, but every day in many ways there are a thousand opportunities for us to gladly, cheerfully, willingly, helpfully serve our fellowmen.

The Baptists' Second Seminary in Sweden

This is a mission school, founded in 1908 as a part of the work of the Orebro Missionary Society, of Orebro, Sweden

BY J. E. GROLUND

THE Baptists of Sweden owe much to America—in the first place their origin and then, to a great extent, their success. "John Asplund a Swede," who had joined the Baptist church at Ballard's Bridge, about 1780, was the first Baptist preacher to visit Sweden. Capt. Gustavus W. Schroeder of the Baptist Mariners' Church, New York, a Swede, was, according to his own statement, the first one to preach Baptist doctrines in public meetings in Sweden. This he did in the year 1845 in the vicinity of Gothenburg. Baptist leaders in Sweden of the past and to a great extent of the present have received their education in America. Among those of the past we have the well-known founder and president for forty years of the Bethel Seminary, Stockholm, Colonel Broady, who passed to his reward a year ago. Among the present leaders at Stockholm we have such noted men as Doctors Bystrom and Benander.

It is therefore only natural that the founder of the Orebro Bible school and the Orebro mission school, which is the Swedish Baptists' second theological training school, should also be educated in America for God's service in Sweden. Rev. John Ongman emigrated from Sweden in 1868 and studied for the ministry in America, where he was a successful pastor for twenty years before he was called back to Sweden. During his pastorate of the first church of Orebro, he saw the need of getting the young people in Sweden lined up for Christ, and the Bible school was started 1891. It has grown as the years have gone by, and last year the attendance was 230. The most of those were in the school for the first time, but many come back year after year.

The Bible school has only a short term every year, about six weeks in November and part of December. The best gifted in the heart and head are then picked out, and added to the evangelistic workers on the home field. The others go home to their churches and assist in Sunday-school and young people's work at home. Then a part of this group is recommended to come back to the Bible school another year, and thus many attend the school several terms before they are added to the evangelistic workers. There is no institution in Sweden that has been such a great blessing for the Baptist cause and the bringing of souls to Jesus, as the pupils of this Bible school, who, very often go out two and two to parishes of the state church, where Baptists have been entirely unknown, and have revivals. I wish that I could tell you about our sister, Ida Andersson, who has built up several churches in parishes where the people before have been hostile to everything that had any connection with Baptists.

The Mission school was founded in 1908 by the president of the school, John Ongman, who is also president of the Bible school and the Orebro Missionary Society. The Mission school gives what we would call a three-years' seminary course, and is trying to do in three years what ought to take four years to accomplish. But thus it is possible to do some preparatory work. Students have from twenty-five to twenty-eight, fifty-minute recitation hours a week, in the class-room. The teachers have to teach, from twenty to twenty-five hours a week. The number of subjects taught in the school are the following: Greek, Hebrew, church history, the history of missions, general history, Sunday-school pedagogy, Biblical antiquity, Biblical theology, Biblical introduction, Bible studies for every class all the three years, pastoral theology, doctrine, ecclesiology, Swedish, English, French and German languages, geography, mathematics and book-keeping.

The first of last September, the school opened its fifteenth year with sixty-three students; only half of the forty-six applicants for this year could be received on account of our small class-room and poor financial outlook. Sweden has been hard hit by the financial depression. Many of the best supporters of the Baptist cause are bankrupt. But our hopes are in God who has power to raise up new supporters. This school came into existence as an answer to prayers, it has lived its first fourteen years on answered prayers, and may it please God to grant mercy, that the school may continue to live on the fruit of prayer in the years to come.

The Orebro Missionary Society is also a product of John Ongman's activities. The society dates back to 1892. Although the thought of foreign missions was not entirely strange at the time the society was organized, its chief purpose was to send evangelistic workers to dark and neglected places in Sweden. The foreign mission work that the society is carrying on in India, Brazil, Congo, China and Siberia is of a much later date. At present the society has fifty-six foreign missionaries. The Orebro Missionary Society had last winter on the field in Sweden 260 evangelistic workers and many more could be sent out if the society only had more money. A good many of these evangelists are working in connection with Baptist churches.

The One Baptism

BY WAYLAND ZWAYER

DIVINE emotions, virtues, are single. There are not two loves any more than there are two Gods. One man may have only half of love just as he may know only half of God, but love is the same whether expressed by me or by you or by God. Loves do not clash, for there are no "loves," there is only "love." Sometimes we call love that which is really selfish, self-centered. My love for my child does not conflict with your love for your child. But if I get an idea that I want something—wealth, power or position, for my child at the expense of your child, then selfishness enters in and love goes out the same door. So it is with love of country—patriotism. Usually it is a blinded kind of love which does not remember the other people whom God has created. Paul, in some of the most beautiful words ever written, tells us of faith, hope and love. There is only one kind of faith, a belief in God which yields loyal trust and confidence, a faith that "believes unto righteousness." (Rom. 10:10). With Paul there is but "one hope in our calling." (Eph. 4:4).

I believe sometimes that it is well and necessary for the Christian cause that there is denominational division within the church. But denominationalism can be carried too far, just as party loyalty in Congress and blind party loyalty among the voters has been carried too far for the welfare of America. Patriotism has killed millions of innocent men because we have failed as yet to attain the larger patriotism which includes all men, a patriotism which remembers a common Father greater than the father of any country. So in denominationalism, we forget that the "one Lord" is greater than the pope, the bishop, the synod, the presbytery or the congregation. We forget that the "one faith" is greater than all the creeds written or unwritten, for it is more than intellectual conviction. We forget that the "one baptism" is not the water ceremony, but a spiritual seal of the faith we all profess, a baptism in the Holy Spirit. This is the essential thing for Baptists to remember and to preach about baptism. Not baptism by immersion only, but, first, baptism of believers only. When all are ready to admit that there is only one baptism, that is, to admit that all must meet the same conditions before baptism and that all must undertake the same obligations in baptism, then we may hope that the same symbolism will come as a matter of course. There can be but one baptism, whether by physical ceremony or not, and that must be baptism by the Holy Spirit in the name of Jesus Christ. Anything else is the grossest perversion.

In this country, at least, most of our historic Baptist principles have been accepted by other denominations. But there is one thing which we have yet to teach, one thing upon which we stand almost alone.

The issue for Baptists is not centered around "open" or "closed membership" except that membership can be only for those who are members of "his body." The issue for Baptists is not that of the form of baptism except as its form affects its symbolism and its history. The issue is involved in the question "Who shall be baptized?"

"There is one body, and one Spirit, as also ye were called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all." (Eph. 4:4, 5). Upon this unity expressed by Paul, the Christians of the world can unite (whether they actually remove denominational lines or not matters little) when they will admit that there is "one baptism," a baptism which transcends physical forms, but a baptism which can be expressed only by burial and resurrection with him who with the power of God conquered death. And one cannot receive the burial of Christ who is unable or unwilling to consciously decide to go with him to Calvary. And one cannot be raised with Christ who has not already felt within himself the power of God which will ultimately raise him "to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." (Eph. 4:13b).

UNDENOMINATIONAL BIBLE TRAINING SCHOOLS

The article in THE BAPTIST of May 19 by Doctor Ross on the undenominational Bible training schools is so intense, unkind, cruel, unjust and unfair in many of its statements and implications that I must raise a protest to it. Since I taught for eighteen years in one of these schools, or rather an interdenominational training school, and would gladly do so again, I must be one of those whom Doctor Ross would brand as a "real menace." I have a right to say something in defense.

It is a fine exhibition of a human weakness when Doctor Ross objects to criticism of our Baptist schools without specification, saying: "It would have been more just to be particular in the criticisms, naming the schools and even the professors who are guilty," and then goes on and exhibits the same injustice he has condemned in not specifying either the schools or the professors which he means, but landing like a ton of brick on all of them to crush them all. This is made the more invidious by separating out two schools by name that he is pleased with.

In the first place, he says that these schools that he has condemned have been overlooked. Where have been Doctor Ross' eyes and ears if he thinks that they have? Has not the very throwing open again of our seminaries to English courses and the talk—before Doctor Ross' suggestion—of a Baptist Bible training school, grown out of the very controversy which has waged over these same execrated schools? Doctor Ross condemns the schools as "unstandardized"—that is, by his standard, and anti-denominational, though I know the one where I taught was not.

The first outstanding objection which he argues is that these schools are a menace because of their low standards of admission, and cites in proof that "the majority of our young people who attend these schools are not qualified to enter our higher schools of learning." I should like to ask whether the first apostles of Jesus would have been thus qualified. There is some significance in that not all of the cultured ones of Jesus' day were ready to take his Bible teaching; but the point is, these schools were started just because there were a lot of "true Baptists who take to the Bible as hungry sheep to clover," and there were no Baptist Bible schools that would take them and give them a training, and they have a right to it, if they want it, no matter how meager their education has been; and if they go through the school they do not need to be taken as pastors, unless churches want them. In fact, many of them, both men and women, in the school that I know, do not have the ministry in mind, but want to get some systematic Bible work. Doctor Ross' contention that many of these students, while good, are half-baked like Ephraim's cake, leads one to ask, When have our seminaries ceased turning out some of the same type? I know a man graduated from one of our Baptist colleges and from one of our leading Baptist seminaries who could not read the scripture in the Bible and keep the grammar straight. But I believe in colleges and seminaries.

The second great indictment is the incompleteness of their courses of study. Will you please show me a school that has a complete course? These courses are as complete as they are intended to be, and that is all you can say of any school. They do not aim to take the place of other training which one may need and may get, and I can tell you from personal knowledge of many of these young people, taken with immature education, but who prove to have good minds, that got stimulated enough intellectually through a course in the Bible training school so that they have gone on to college or to seminaries and have made good in an outstanding way, and all because some school was willing to take them in their immaturity and give them a start. I want also to state emphatically that every one of the students in the school I am personally in touch with, who is found capable of higher learning, is encouraged to go on and get a college course after this primary Bible training. If there is any disposition to be fair why dodge such outstanding facts as this?

Doctor Ross condemns these schools because they do not give training in Sunday-school work, Christian education, young people's work, Baptist missions and distinctive principles. Please tell me which one of our seminaries is doing this, or has been doing it very long? One of the recent graduates from one of our outstanding eastern seminaries told me at Indianapolis that while he was not a fundamentalist he thought the fundamentalists would have a bigger field of attack on our seminaries if they did get after them because they do not teach distinctive Baptist principles or missions, and that when this is spoken of they are inclined to turn it off with an implication that to do this would be narrow. I pass on his criticism for what it is worth.

I wish to say further that in the school that I know personally, students have gone out into our own Baptist missions and into the missions of other denominations more often than they have gone into undenominational missions, and some eminent missionaries of the denominations have come from this school.

The charge is made in the third place that the schools are anti-denominational and that the students say "anyway it makes no difference what church you belong to." Some of us have been getting exceedingly weary of modern men graduated from our standard seminaries who have been taking the same attitude, and one of such graduates who was general superintendent of missions for the Baptists in one of our states, when I approached him urging that something be done to revive the Baptist work in a town of 1200 where I was greatly interested, refused to do anything because there were two other churches in the town, each, however, of small membership. He was perfectly willing that the other churches swallow up all the Baptists that were there, which they did, though the Baptists had a fine building and at one time the leading work.

If students from these interdenominational and undenominational schools were the only ones that were taking the view that sprinkling was as good as dipping, even for Baptists, they might be thus separately judged, but any one in touch with the trend of the times knows that Baptist college and seminary graduates have been some of our most dangerous leaders in this regard.

In the fourth place, Doctor Ross states categorically that these Bible schools are disloyal and create disloyalty to the denominations from which they draw their students and much of their financial support. Again he would shoot all that he may kill some. I can tell you on the other hand of many churches going rapidly into ruin, or already there, which have been made effective Baptist churches by students of these same condemned schools. Furthermore, I heard Dr. Ozora S. Davis, in speaking a number of years ago on the question of some difficulties of seminary presidents, say: "One thing which I cannot understand is how so many men will go out from my seminary with complete training and make failures of their work, while men will go out from the Moody School with what I consider inadequate training and make great successes." He also said to the amusement of the Baptists in his audience, and to his chagrin when their laughter revealed their presence, "I do not object to immersion but I do not like to have it shoved down my throat, and so when I go out to dedicate a Congregational church it goes against my grain to find that the Moody student who is the pastor has had a baptistry built in the basement." I wish to say that the Moody school is not the one in which I taught, but these remarks of Doctor Davis have often come to my mind.

Topic for July 1

LESSONS FROM THE PSALMS
VII. A History Psalm. Ps. 44: 1-8
(PATRIOTIC CONSECRATION MEETING)

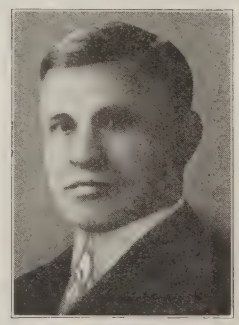
This meeting comes close to July 4, the day on which patriotic services will be held in all parts of the United States. Bunting will stream from public buildings and homes, and the kiddies will joyously wave little flags in celebration of our national birthday.

Doubtless salutes will be fired, uniforms will be in evidence, and a military tone will be given to many of the day's exercises. There will be recited the deeds of valor of our heroes and heroines, and rightly so. We will be speaking of our great heritage and of the contribution we have made to the cause of democracy throughout the world. We have every reason to be proud of ourselves.

We are not so far removed from the great world but that many will gather at the tombs of our boys, while others will take an imaginary trip to Flanders field where lies some of our choicest manhood. I have an idea that many a mother, father, and sweetheart will ask the question, "Was it worth while?"

As we celebrate, all about us are signs of deep unrest; toilers are growing weary from their ever increasing burdens; children by the thousands in America and other countries are hungry and poorly clad; there is constant strife between employer and employee, between capital and labor; peace conferences are turned into bargain counters; nations are suspicious of each other; weaker nations are fighting exploitation by the stronger, and materialism is rampant in the world.



We shall have our happy times—we shall eat, drink, and be merry, and return to our homes in the city, village and countryside at night with the feeling that we have had a glorious day. Well, my opinion is that the day will not be complete unless we, in our inmost souls, attempt to answer the question, "What are we going to do about these big problems?"

What are we going to do to abolish war, greed and intemperance, with the attendant evils of poverty and vice of all sorts? America has a right to be proud of her young people, but unless America's young people begin seriously to wrestle with these questions, the prospect for the future is not very encouraging.

We have a Christ who is waiting to join with us in battle royal against the foes of his people. He is still waiting for his great principles to be applied to all the problems of human living. We need only to take a backward look to realize the place of the heavenly Father in history. God and man have been co-workers in this wonderful development of the human race. Jesus today stands enthroned as the King of our lives. He demands our utmost loyalty in the great onward movement for the redemption of the world.

On this approaching holiday of our beloved nation, I send greetings to the present and future citizenry of the United States of America. Let us strive in every way to be worthy of the finest ideals of our nation! Let us pledge anew our loyalty to the principles of Jesus and go out to make them dominant in the lives of our people!

Boston Convention Entertainment

The Boston committee has arranged to care for the thousands of delegates coming to the convention in a variety of ways.

One large delegation coming from Brooklyn, New York, could not be accommodated in a single hotel, so the dormitories of the Gordon Bible College and the Newton Theological Institution have been secured for a part of the group.

Our best hotels include the Copley Plaza, Parker House, Young's Hotel, Copley Square, Hotel Lenox, Bellevue, Victoria, Westminster Chambers, Touraine, United States and Adams House. There are many excellent second class hotels, including the Commonwealth and Crawford, etc

Arrangements are being made to care for delegates in private homes on the Harvard Plan with a charge of 75 cents for lodging and 50 cents for breakfast where provided.

The rates at the hotels range from $1.50 without bath up. Of course the better class hotels charge from $2.50 for the same accommodations.

There are many fine restaurants in the vicinity of the Temple. Marstons is a famous old restaurant off from Scollay Square. Cottrell's and Cobbs are nearby. Childs' restaurants are on Washington Street. Waldorf Luncheon can be found almost anywhere. The Ginter Company's string of restaurants located on School Street, Washington and Tremont Streets are unusually attractive; they include the Wedgewood, Seville, Ambassador, Regina, DuPont, DeLux, and there are various Band-boxes for quick lunches. There are many other very attractive cafeterias in the vicinity of Copley Square and Boston Common or Tremont and Washington Streets. Very few of the suburbs have restaurants and there are practically no hotels, outside of Boston proper in the Metropolitan area.

It would pay each delegate some time in the course of the convention to visit Durgin & Park, down in the market district near the Quincy building. There are also bizarre little oyster houses and tea grills near North Station and South Station, and at Faneuil Hall Market. If you desire a real shore dinner or Boston baked beans these are the places to find them. For further information write to Rev. F. F. Peterson, Ford Bldg., Boston, Mass.

Conference Special

Rev. H. S. Myers, who was scheduled to conduct the stewardship conferences, has found it necessary to cancel, owing to the fact that he plans to attend the Baptist World Alliance. We are glad to announce that Dr. W. H. Main, associate general secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society, will take his place for these important conferences.

International Sunday School Lesson for July 1

JOHN THE BAPTIST

Lesson Material: Matt. 3: 1-17; 11: 2-15. Mark 6: 14-29; Luke 1: 5-80; John 1: 6-37. Golden Text: Luke 1:68

Introductory

With the beginning of a new quarter's work, we take up the study of great men and women of the New Testament. John the Baptist is the subject of the first lesson. He was the son of Zacharias the priest and his wife Elizabeth, a relative of Mary, the mother of Jesus. He was a few months older than Jesus and was the forerunner of Jesus, preparing the way for him. The last six months of his ministry overlapped into the first six months of Jesus'. John began his preaching in the wilderness of Judea, a place west of the Dead Sea. His work took him northward in the vicinity of the Jordan.

The Lesson

The rugged John preaching in the region round about Jordan—preaching a gospel of repentance unto remission of sins, according to the words of the prophet Isaiah: "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make ye ready the way of the Lord, make his paths straight"—that is the first picture of the day's lesson. The people to whom he preached responded—"multitudes went out to be baptized of him." But so vast a number included those of whose true repentance John doubted, especially the Pharisees and Sadduces. He addressed them as the offspring of vipers, and questioned who warned them to flee from the wrath to come. If they are to meet the conditions no longer can they rest upon the fact that they have Abraham for their father, but they must bring forth fruits worthy of repentance. The second picture in our lesson is that in which Jesus is speaking concerning John. It is just after the messengers of John have departed that he turns to the multitudes and says to them concerning John: "What went ye out into the wilderness to behold? a reed shaken with the wind? a man clothed in soft raiment? a prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet. This is he of whom it is written, Behold I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare the way before thee. And I say unto you, among them that are born of women, there is none greater than John. Yet he that is but little in the kingdom of God is greater than he." Great as was John the Baptist, he that is but a humble member in full fellowship in the kingdom of God has even greater privileges and a greater outlook.

Leading Thoughts

1. It takes a supreme courage to be a single voice crying a new truth in the wilderness. 2. "Bringing forth fruits worthy of repentance," is a sure test that the seed has fallen upon good soil. 3. The great rugged John had a sweet humility: "I have need to be baptized of thee."

Diligens Before Rotary

Here is the outline of the speech which Diligens made at the Rotary Club about the comparative cost of religious education and general education.

He began by saying that he had been challenged to show that we care less for the religious education of our youth than for their cultural and commercial-industrial education. True, if we judge from the apparent facts and figures.

We have an investment of a half billion in public educational equipment. We pay around $40, according to one estimate, per year per child. This is splendid. In many parts of the country we much more than double this.

Figures are harder to get in religious education. Thinking now only in church school terms, not in boarding school, college or university terms, we may take, as a central representative state, the state of Indiana. Here the old interchurch Sunday-school survey was completed by a faithful residuary committee and we have carefully acquired facts. They may be average facts for the whole country, or they may be above or below. But they are representative and they are facts.

In the average Indiana Sunday school the monetary outlay per year per pupil is—no, not $99—ninety-nine cents. On a check you might write it in full "Only ninety-nine cents." Instead of being one-half or one-tenth of the amount used in general education, it is not far from being one-hundredth.

Steady now. This money is brought to the Sunday schools by the pupils.

Steady again. The money which the pupils pay into their church schools is divided: 55.8 cents for the upkeep of the schools (34 cents goes for lesson and other supplies) and 44.2 cents on other religious work, missionary, most of it.

Steady, once more. For every dollar the churches spend out of their treasuries for the support of their church schools, the church schools put eleven dollars back into the church treasuries for the objects of the church.

These figures do not include the immense amount of voluntary and unpaid superintendency and teaching for which the church pays no money. But if this time were paid for at the rate public-school superintendents and teachers are paid, the proportions would still stand something like these: Public-school time, 25 to 28 hours a week, one teacher for each grade; Sunday school, 60 to 90 minutes, one teacher (nearly always present, usually on time) to each class (class period 20 to 40 minutes). The devotion and faithfulness of the officers and teachers of our American Sunday school are beyond all comparison with money. But if the amount of teaching time and attention received by children in public schools and in Sunday schools were to be compared, the proportion would still be not far from 25 to 1.

One other interesting contrast. Forty-seven cents of every American municipal dollar go for the support of American public schools. Two and three-tenths cents of every church dollar go for the support of church schools.

Gentlemen, I leave you to your own conclusions. Our public education in America is the joy and crown of our democracy. Our great church enterprises are a tribute to the foresight of our Christian leadership. But I submit that it is shortsighted and un-business-like not to provide for the Christian education of American childhood and youth in proportion to our outlays for general education, for our pulpits, for our great church auditoriums and music, splendid as every one of these things may be. We here in our town have just had our board of education vote a fine new central school building equipped to the minute. It is our move to give religious education in our church schools an efficiency and an equipment of which we do not need to be ashamed.

The Rotary Club voted to cooperate with the Ministers' Association looking to a week-day religious school and ordered an excerpt of the address sent to the Rotarian.

I don't doubt the truth of Doctor Ross' statement that he has had some unpleasant dealings with some of the students from these condemned Bible schools. He does have the grace to say he has known a few that were worthy. But I wish to ask in fairness, since when did our seminaries cease turning out some men that also do disastrous things sometimes?

As to the motive of Doctor Ross in writing the article I will not say, for we are not permitted to judge motives, though I have my own decided opinion. But as to its tone, its temper, its manifest unfairness, I have a right to speak and to protest. Yet I do not know that I am wholly sorry that he wrote as he did, for such violence is bound to react in favor of these schools.

Twenty Miles from Sunday

By Margaret T. Applegarth

This department is conducted by Miss Margaret T. Applegarth. Communications to her may be addressed in care of The Baptist.

IT seemed astonishing that nobody in town had heard a single word about Sunday, when all the time Sunday was only twenty miles away in the Village of Dry Wells. Weren't there seven days in a week? So didn't you sit in the market place selling your wares on all seven of those days, one exactly like another? Of course. Yet all the time Sunday was twenty miles away in the Village of Dry Wells, where Devasahayam found it.

Devasahayam was a merchant, and early one morning he rode away in his bullock cart toward this Village of Dry Wells to do business with another merchant. But he might just as well have stayed home, for it was Sunday in that village twenty miles away, so the merchant was not in his stall.

"Is he sick?" Devasahayam inquired of another merchant in a stall nearby.

"No-o, not exactly sick," said this other man, shrugging his shoulders, "but it's Sunday."

"Sunday?" repeated Devasahayam, "but what has this thing-called-Sunday to do with keeping a man from selling goods?"

"Well, I don't know much about it, for it's only struck him suddenly. I do know, however, that it's part of a new religion in town, a religion which makes a man rest one day in seven. It also makes him go and sing hymns indoors and pray to the God of Sunday to bless him all the rest of the week."

"Did you ever!" exclaimed Devasahayam. "I should think it would simply ruin his trade, missing this one good day of business."

"Um'm," chuckled the other merchant, smiling, "but why should I worry about his trade, when his customers just step over to my stall and fill their needs? As for me, I wouldn't care if Sunday came every day in the week, it's so profitable for me! See? Anything I can do for you in his absence?"

So Devasahayam did business with this wily business man who did such fine trading on Sundays because his rival was off somewhere singing hymns. Devasahayam did not know what hymns were, so after purchasing the goods he needed, he sauntered over in the direction where singing could be heard. The place was a poor enough affair, with matting walls that only went part way up to meet the roof. He had been expecting to see some gorgeous temple with carved columns, a monstrous gold idol, rare incense in the air; yet here was just the cheapest kind of a building and plain every-day worshippers sitting on the ground, singing. That was all.

"Where is their God?" asked he, peering indoors.

"Sh! Sh!" warned a man beside him. "Don't talk out loud, my good fellow; I want to hear what they say in there. Their God is inside the church, but nobody has ever seen him. He's invisible, but the speaker in there is just explaining how he's Everybody's God and is loving us all, and lives inside each of us. Pretty strange news, isn't it?"

"Perhaps!" said Devasahayam, and strolled away. He thought that he was not much interested in a God-Who-Could-Not-Be-Seen and yet who made men stop working one day in seven. But when he had traveled all those twenty miles home, somehow he could not get the memory of it out of his mind: a man must fear this unseen God very desperately indeed in order to worship him one whole day in seven, a day when he did not dare to do business! What a strong and powerful God he must be; what a lot he required of his followers. Devasahayam was glad that he had left Sunday twenty miles behind him! Then certain phrases began to come to his memory: "Everybody's God"—"invisible"—"everywhere"—"in each of us."

"Dear me! Dear me!" trembled Devasahayam. "How do I know but that he is here with me this very minute? I may have carried him away from the Village of Dry Wells without knowing it." And the longer he thought about it, the more uncomfortable he grew: for suppose it was expected of him to begin resting one day in seven? To go and sit in a church with matting walls? To sing those songs?

It takes all day and all night to travel twenty miles in a bullock cart, so by the time he reached his own village he tried to forget the whole affair. "Sunday is twenty miles behind me!" he chuckled; so just as usual he sold his wares in the bazaar, cheating whenever he dared, just as every one cheated. But . . . he . . . could . . . not . . . get . . . Sunday . . . out . . . of . . . his mind; so when seven days had passed since his visit to the Village of Dry Wells, he was so disturbed that he said to his wife: "I am not going to the bazaar today."

"You are possessed of an evil spirit, you are ill!" she cried in a perfect panic.

"Woman, be calm," he ordered. "This is religion."

"But such a strange religion," she sighed, for she could see that he was upset over this day called Sunday.

"How will you observe the day?" she asked.

"That is not for a mere woman to know," he said, loftily. And she meekly left him alone, understanding (as all women in India understand) that not an idol in any temple is ever really flattered by worship from a woman. But she could not help standing outside the doorway and poking her head inside to watch him! He had his two sons with him. They were trying to sing something, but they did not know how to begin. However, the boys were enjoying it thoroughly.

"We like Sunday! We like it!" they chuckled.

"Sh! Sh!" whispered their father. "Everybody's God may hear you! How do I know whether he wants us to enjoy Sunday or not?"

"But you especially told us how happy the worshipers seemed over in the Village of Dry Wells."

"So they did. Well, perhaps we may look happy without acting too happy; that ought to please God both ways."

So they looked as cheerful as three persons could who also were trying to be sober; it was the strangest experience in the world. The son named Precious Jewel said he felt as if he were full of secrets; the son named Gentle Spirit said he felt as if he would have to go out and tell somebody else all about it; but they said all this in whispers, and were soon busy trying to sing a song, making it up as they went along. There was no time to it, and the words did not rhyme at the end, but it was as beautiful a hymn as was sung in all India that Sunday, I think. These were the words:

"We rest one day in seven—
Devasahayam rests,
Precious Jewel rests,
Gentle Spirit rests,
We pray to Everybody's God as best we know how,
As best we know how,
On Sunday; on Sunday.
Oh, Everybody's God, hear us!
Hear us; Hear our worship."

"I like Sunday much better than going to the temple to worship the big stone idols, don't you?" Precious Jewel asked.

"Indeed I do," agreed Gentle Spirit. "To tell the truth, I'm rather afraid of those idols. Their stone hands are so big, their stone ears are so long, their stone eyes are so staring. When I kneel down to worship, I always wonder what they will do to me."

His brother laughed: "What can they do? They're only stone, you silly boy."

The silly boy shook his head: "Just the same, I like Everybody's God much better. I like Sunday."

Whereupon their eight-year-old sister said softly: "I wouldn't be afraid to worship on Sunday as you do, myself."

"Oh, mercy on us!" cried her brothers in a shocked duet. "You don't suppose that Sunday is for women, do you? Sunday is just a day for men-folks."

"Oh!" sighed the disappointed eight-year-old sister.

"O-oh!" sighed the nine-year-old sister.

"O-o-oh!" sighed the ten-year-old sister. For every single one of them thought Sunday sounded very lovely; but they might have known that it wouldn't be for girls: nothing in India ever was. But nobody could keep them from listening with all their ears, and on Monday morning they would boast about it to other little girls, and the other little girls would tell their mothers, their mothers would tell their fathers, their fathers would tell their grandfathers, until practically everybody in town knew about the Merchant-That-Kept-Sunday. And nobody liked it!

"If he keeps this up he will get into trouble. His old idols will be provoked, they will send sickness upon him, or famine, or death."

"I hear that he rode back to the Village of Dry Wells last week and made all sorts of inquiries about this new religion, and when he came home he said he would not worship the idols again. He said that Christians made no distinction between high-caste families and low-caste families, so although he is high caste himself he actually invited one of the low-caste weaver families to come and worship Everybody's God with him last Sunday morning!"

"What? Did Devasahayam break caste? Then he must stop doing it! He may bring trouble on our entire village. Our crops may fail. Our cattle may die. We will all fall sick; for didn't the god Brahma make some men high caste and some men low caste? Well, he wants them to stay as he made them. A man who breaks caste is a disgrace. He is dangerous. What shall we do to Devasahayam to show him our disapproval?"

"Let us stone him!"

"Let us burn his house!"

"Let us stop buying anything from him at the bazaar."

So you can see for yourself that terrible things were in store for the family of Devasahayam, for they burned down his little straw house, they threw stones at the brothers and sisters, they refused to buy at his stall in the market place, they poked fingers of scorn at him when they saw him:—

"There goes a Sunday man!"

"There goes a man who breaks caste!"

"Yes, imagine a merchant eating with a weaver! Imagine a merchant worshiping with a weaver! Bah, the man is crazy!"

"There goes a man who wants to burn his old idols, does he? Stone him! Stone him!"

So they stoned him. They burned down his house. And he was bruised, homeless, poverty-stricken. But when Sunday morning came around once more he and his little sons went to the house of the weavers —those low-caste weavers, mind you!—and the news spread through the entire village that they were all singing songs to Everybody's God, and praying together.

"Then burn down the weaver's house!" the village people yelled. "Burn it down! Stone the weavers! Destroy their house! Tear their cotton into shreds! Bah, we have had enough of these Christians. Let us chase them out of town."

So that you could have seen a very dreadful sight that Sunday morning, for a hut was blazing and crackling and smoking, and another family was homeless and hungry and out of work. Dozens of little children looked at the faces of their parents, wondering what it all meant. Ah, it meant that it was hard work to become Christians in India! India did not like it! India had no use for new ways. . . .

But through all the horror of fire and persecution Devasahayam acted like a pillar: "I will not bend the knee to an idol! Everybody's God will care for me! His Bible especially says, 'Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' Well, if they kill us we shall have God's kingdom of heaven to go to! If they let us live, then we will go outside the village walls with the outcastes and worship God there."

"Ah-ha!" roared the villagers. "You wouldn't dare go and live with the outcastes, Devasahayam. Surely a high caste merchant would never live with such scum as the outcastes."

"Watch me!" he said; and on Monday morning they saw him living with the outcastes. To tell the truth, the outcastes did not like it very much, at first. They were afraid! But the thing they dreaded never happened; the merchant never kicked them nor abused them; he never put on airs or bossed them around. He was gentle and kind and poor. Oh, how poor he was! For he had no goods to sell any more, he had no stall in the market place. There were days when not a member of that family ever had enough to eat. . . .

"It is a frightful thing to be a Christian," some of the outcastes said.

"Oh, but see how quiet and gentle and happy he seems. See how sure he is that his new God will make everything right."

Indeed you can see for yourself that never was a man more closely watched than Devasahayam. Morning, noon, and night people spoke about the special look of peace that shone in his eyes and in the eyes of his family. And the first thing any one knew, the outcastes that lived all around him were keeping Sunday just as he kept it—men and women, boys and girls. It was a lovely sight for our missionary on the Sunday morning he rode into that village.

"Do you come from the Sunday Village of Dry Wells, Sahib?" people asked him.

"Yes, that is where I live, and I have heard how you have treated Devasahayam and his family. The great God in heaven wonders at your wickedness; for I ask you —is there any man among you as good as Devasahayam? Is there any other man as gentle? Is there any other man with such peace in his eyes? You would do well to copy Devasahayam, every one of you! For he is very dear to the heart of the One True God."

"Oh!" said the villagers in an awed duet. Then somebody said the one thing that everybody was thinking: "Sahib, if we should get down into this new religion, we would have to rest one day in seven, I suppose. Well, while we were resting some other man would get the better of us! He would earn our wages! He would steal our places."

"Not so," said the missionary quietly, "for if you all rested, then you would all be equals, and no man could outdo another." So that is the way it came to pass that instead of being twenty miles from Sunday, Sunday came to stay in that village forever; for every man, woman and child was touched,—touched by the sight of Devasahayam, the merchant, who for the sake of Everybody's God was willing to lose house and business and possessions.

"We need a religion like that, ourselves."

"What a religion! We want to get down into it. We want to learn all about it. We want to learn soon! We are hungry for it! We are starved for it!"

Grown men hugged each other for sheer joy! Women cried! Little children laughed. It was the thing about which missionaries write home to America, the thing called a mass movement. It means a wonderful wave of joy carrying an entire tribe from heathendom into Christianity. But they all are hungry for facts, they are starved for a fuller understanding—so they turn to us for help.

"Send us teachers and preachers," they beg. So I ask you today—what will your answer be to these people who have just discovered joy and Sunday and God?

The Church That Fell Off a Horse

There are lots of stories that show what a wonderful power the mere reading of the Bible often has, with no human voice or presence to help it on. Here is one of them.

One day a missionary was riding across the pampas of Brazil on horseback. At the back of his saddlebag he had a New Testament. The horse happened to rear, and the New Testament fell out of the saddlebag to the ground, and the missionary rode on.

Several days later a Brazilian happened to be walking by. He lived way up on the edge of the jungle, miles and miles away from there, and was coming along with a caravan that was wending its way across the plains and over the mountains back to his home. In the village where that man lived there is today a church of over thirty members. They have never seen a missionary, they have never seen a minister, but the copy of the New Testament that fell out of a saddlebag, and was picked up by the wandering Brazilian—that was the means of organizing that church.—Rev. J. Mervin Hull, in Everyland.

Rhode Island Convention

By Arthur W. Cleaves

The ninety-eighth annual meeting of the Rhode Island State Convention was held with the Woodlawn Church, Pawtucket, May 15-16. In the eighteen years since the convention last met with this church there have been signal advances. There there were seventy-six churches, with a membership of 15,600. Now there are 110 churches with a membership of about 20,000. Then the convention had one salaried officer, aided twelve churches, conducted missionary work among three foreign-speaking peoples, and spent for all purposes $5,962. During the past year the convention gave financial aid to twenty of the smaller churches, employed eleven missionaries among five foreign nationalities, operated through six departments and eleven promotional committees in the various fields of missions, religious education, church efficiency, woman's and young people's work, and expended approximately $35,000. In 1905 the churches gave to denominational missions the sum of $18,643.83, which represents a per capita gift of $1.25. Last year the contributions of the churches for this purpose were $143,197.70, which represents a per capita gift of $7.10. The gifts of the past year total 86 per cent of the sum asked of the state, and 90 per cent of the sum collected a year ago.

The meetings of the convention taxed the seating capacity of the church, many hundreds of people being turned away on the last evening. During the two days there were notable addresses by such people as Prof. W. N. Donovan, of Newton; Dr. J. J. Ross, of Boston; Rev. W. R. McNutt, of Worcester, Mass., and Mrs. J. H. Baker, of Ongole, India. One of the popular features was a play given by members of the two Providence Italian churches. Another was a pageant, presented on the last evening by members of the Central Church, Providence. The former general secretary, Rev. B. T. Livingstone, who is greatly beloved in the state, gave an address on evangelism. The department of religious education delighted an afternoon audience by presenting a cradle-roll demonstration by members of the Woodlawn Church school. The girls of the intermediate department of this same school took part in a short cantata entitled "The Beautiful City."

Among the reports presented, special mention should be made of that of the committee on survey and program. During the year this committee has made a careful survey of the work of the entire state and presented its findings under six heads, namely, rural churches, foreign-language peoples, church building and extension, Christian education, young people's organizations and general administration. This survey is one of the most careful and thorough pieces of work ever done in the state and will doubtless be the basis for the work of many years. For the rural churches, it recommends the employment of missionary pastors by the convention and the holding of regional conferences looking towards the improvement of work done in such fields. Work for the foreign-language peoples is of particular importance inasmuch as the state is more than 50 per cent foreign. The French number more than 90,000, while there are more than 32,000 Italians, 24,000 Portuguese and 9,000 Slavs. In all fifteen nationalities are represented. The report recommends the speedy completion of the two Italian building enterprises and the placing of field workers at four strategic points. An improved plan for church building, especially on the part of weaker churches, and for the promotion of Christian education in all its phases, is included. A full-time educational director is also urged upon the churches of the state.

Rhode Island Baptists are well organized and remarkably unified in their feelings and purposes. Attendance at their convention is even for one who in other years has attended many conventions in other states, a real delight. They may be counted upon to fulfil to the limit their part in any denominational task. At the same time, there remains more than a modicum of that independence with which Roger Williams and his compeers seem to have been thoroughly infected. Rev. William Reid, who came to the state in September as general director of the convention has, during the year taken a masterful grip on the work which is steadily going forward under his able leadership. He seems to fit perfectly into the situation.

The convention is planning to hold its anniversaries next year in the Plainfield Street Church, Providence, and to celebrate its centennial in 1925 in the historic meeting-house of the First Church, Providence, in which it was organized.

Rev. Robert Stuart MacArthur

Entered the immortal life
Feb. 23, 1923.

A Prince in Israel is fallen this day;
Low and inert he lies.
With sorrowing hearts we say he died—Not so
A great heart never dies.

"The beloved of the Lord shall dwell by him"
God called, so he has gone,
But radiant with immortal life and strength
His soul is marching on.

With tireless feet he climbs the heavenly steep
And over fields of space
He journeys on to share the promise sweet
"And they shall see his face."

God satisfied him with long life, he nobly lived
He served his race and time—
When four-score years lay on him like a crown
He seemed but in his prime.

No sadness then should grieve us, all is well
And neither pain nor strife
Can ever wound his heart. He lives with God
The higher fuller life.

Summer School

The school for rural and small town ministers held last year at Madison was such a success that it is to be repeated again this year. The dates are from June 26 to July 6. The program will be representative of all the interests of rural life. Dr. Ralph A. Felton, of Philadelphia, representing the training committee of the Home Missions Council of Protestant Churches, will be in charge of several of the classes. Last year our convention shared in the expense of those ministers who desired to attend, and it is likely that the same arrangements will be entered into again this year.

Milwaukee in 1924

Wisconsin had about two dozen delegates at Atlantic City. All of them expressed themselves as believing that it was a great convention. Milwaukee Baptists are now giving some attention to the work of taking care of the convention in 1924. We have a splendid auditorium and good hotel accommodations, and these are being enlarged this year. Several hotels are increasing their capacity, and one or two new hotels are being constructed. What is said to have been the best attended young people's convention was held here twenty-eight years ago and we want to make the next convention a notable one.

Vacation Schools

Just now things are shaping themselves for the church vacation schools. In Milwaukee our Baptist churches will hold seven schools. The training institute of all denominations was held June 13-15. On the last day Rev. A. H. Gage, of Chicago, was present to meet the Baptist workers in a separate conference, and at the supper hour addressed the institute on "Worship in the Vacation School."

Other Notes

Pastor R. L. Kelley, of Delavan, has been laid aside for a time with a breakdown. He has been confined at the Mounds Sanitarium near St. Paul. The last reports indicated some improvement.

Pastor E. G. Mintz, of Oshkosh, was the recipient recently of a beautiful coupé, the gift of his church. Pastor Mintz has a large field and a generous people.

The Big Bend church is now busy remodeling its old church property.

Miss Mamie Passolt, of the south side Christian center, is spending ten days in Nebraska, representing the Woman's Home Mission Society, at the Nebraska associations.

The church at Milltown recently dedicated its new building. On the day of dedication Dr. A. LeGrand was present and helped to raise the $1000 needed to pay for it. After this was raised the church voted to pay the pastor's first premium in the ministers and missionaries pension fund.

Pastor H. F. Hoops, who for the past two years has been the efficient pastor of the Grace church at Racine, recently tendered his resignation. Up to the present the resignation has not been accepted by the church. We trust that he can see his way clear to remain with the church.

The Milwaukee Association will meet with the Bay View Baptist Church June 25-26. A good program has been prepared.

French Baptist Convention of New England

By Edouard Revel

The conference took place in the beautiful auditorium of the Cranston Street Baptist Church, Providence, R. I., on May 30, with Rev. Isaac Lafleur as presiding officer.

Over 250 people, coming from different sections of New England, attended this convention. Dr. Edward Holyoke, of Providence, and Rev. W. E. Waterbury, of Boston, greeted the audience on behalf of the American churches. Rev. A. Devos, the receiving pastor, extended a hearty welcome to the visitors. The speakers of the day were Rev. A. Bocquel of Waterville, Maine; Prof. E. R. Massey, of Brown University; Rev. F. A. Perron, of Lowell, Mass.; Rev. E. Revel of Woonsocket, R. I., and G. Rousseau of Newton Theological Seminary. Professor Massey discussed the question of "life and its various manifestations." He made a strong impression on his hearers.

Rev. O. Brouillette, of Salem, Mass., spoke interestingly of the reconstruction work in the devastated regions of Northern France where he was for three years the representative of the A. B. F. M. S. The choir of Woonsocket rendered a French religious hymn "Les martyrs aux arenes" which is a mighty appeal to a courageous testimony of Christ and his truth. All the speakers were themselves full of fervor in the deliverance of their topics and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed during the day. Answering to a plea from the chairman, the audience spontaneously voted $50 to home missions as a token of their gratitude to and of their unity of purpose with the missionary program of our denomination. The collections of the day amounted to $151.30. Several churches have made good progress in the religious and financial lines.

A special committee of five was appointed to study, conjointly with the Home Mission Society, a method to revive the missionary work among the French of New England. The field is large. The French-speaking people—Canadians, French, Belgians and so on—are great in number. In certain cities they outnumber the English-speaking population. The Roman priesthood, mainly French Canadian, is very strong and audacious. It affects to be the sole representative of the Bible. Its activity is a serious menace to the American institutions. If, as Baptists, we want to keep safe the heritage of our fathers we must be on the alert and increase more than ever the work of evangelism among the Catholic-born foreigners.

The ladies held their session at two o'clock in the afternoon. The officers for the ensuing year are: Pres., Mrs. E. Revel; vice-pres., Mrs. F. A. Perron; corr. secy., Miss B. Nicolet; rec. secy., Mrs. C. Lemoine; treas., Mrs. A. Devos.

The next conference will be held at Salem, Mass., with Rev. O. Brouillette, pastor. The officers of the present year are: Pres., F. A. Perron; vice-pres., O. Brouillette; secy., Ed. Revel; treas. C. J. Coutu.

MAINE

Rev. F. S. Bernaur has resigned as pastor at Bangor antl has accepted the call of the United Church at Oakland.

MASSACHUSETTS

Plans have been adopted for the new building of the First Church, Weston. The new building will occupy the site of the old house which was erected in 1825 and which has been dismantled. The cost will be between $50,000 and $60,000. Rev. J. E. Perry is pastor.

The Boston Ministers' Conference closed its meetings for the summer with the meeting on June 4. It was devoted to reports from Atlantic City Convention. Doctor Heath was the chief speaker, and was followed in shorter addresses by Doctor Ross, Doctor Wolfe, and Doctor Massee. The consensus of impressions was welcome and gratifying. While former differences are not wholly overcome, the united desire to work toward our denominational objectives and the manifest spirit of Christian cooperation reported back of the new program, made the Baptist outlook very hopeful.

The annual outing of the ministers and their wives, will come June 25. They go to Post Island, Hough's Neck—one of the delightful retreats "down the harbour." It is expected that the attendance and the social refreshing of last year will be exceeded this summer.

Rev. Dr. Robert S. Webb has closed his work for the year at the School of Religious Education of Boston University. He reports an unusually successful year, and a large graduating class of fine quality. His work on Baptist history and polity awakens marked appreciation from a strong company of Baptist students. The demand for graduates is notable. It points to the decided broadening of specific training in religious education both in schools and churches. Doctor Webb, as pastor of the First Church, Dorchester, is showing surprising efficiency, as a leader and teacher there. The joyful results are appearing in large accessions to the church, especially of young men.

Newton night at the Social Union was a brilliant function. Attendance was the largest ever. The spirit of the assembly was notably warm and friendly to the seminary and its faculty. It was a great night for the Watertown Church. It had a solid delegation on floor and gallery, the sections giving us antiphonal sentiments in concert. The point of it was, that the young pastor elect was the speaker on the program for the graduating class: Mr. C. L. Seasholes. He made a charming spokesman for a class all are proud of.

Rev. Newton C. Fetter is the associate pastor at the First Church, Boston. He is the leader and shepherd particularly of the large student contingent so pleasantly centered there. All recognize that he has the "feel" for them, and he manifests it in a social interest so genuine that they seem like a large and delighted family. They are really a great student club with two congenial firesides—that of the church, and that of Pastor Fetter's house. Of course there is organization with officers, dues, etc., but there is also the livest sort of youthful fellowship. One thousand five hundred different students have been present during the season. The total attendance for all club events for the year would be 13,000. Emphatically is Pastor Fetter the man for such a unique parish extension as this.

RHODE ISLAND

The Harrisville Church has called Rev. A. S. Woodworth to its pastorate and he preached his initial sermon on May 5. Mr. Woodworth came to Rhode Island from the Union Church of St. Johnsbury, Vt.

The church at Pascoag is now enjoying the pastoral services of Rev. P. L. Cosmon, of New Haven. Mr. Cosmon has held pastorates in Connecticut and Massachusetts where he has made a fine record as a minister of Jesus Christ.

The Quidnick church has extended a call to Rev. Harry Parsons and he is already on the field.

After serving the Arlington Church for several months as state supply, Rev. A. E. Kenyon has notified the people of his acceptance of the pastorate. Mr. Kenyon is a friendly man with a warm heart and an enthusism for his work.

Through a fine spirit of cooperation and team-work, money enough has been raised to refinish and paint the interior of the Graniteville Church.

The Fourth Church, Providence, has just celebrated its one hundredth anniversary. The celebration covered an entire week and strong addresses were brought on different evenings by such men as Rev. Charles A. Brooks, secretary of foreign-speaking peoples of the A. B. H. M. Society, and Rev. John H. Strong, of New York, son of the former President Strong of the seminary at Rochester, N. Y. The outstanding feature of the anniversary was a pageant written by one of the young men of the church, based upon some of the historical events of the church. This pageant was given by a group of the church people and directed by the author's sister.

THE CALVARY CHURCH, Providence, borrowed sufficient funds to meet its full annual payment of the New World Movement, preferring to carry the burden of debt rather than put it upon the denomination.

REV. RAYMOND COOPER, WHO was recently called to the Pawtuxet Church, preached his initial sermon on Sunday, June 3. Mr. Cooper comes to Rhode Island from Millinocket, Me.

NEW JERSEY

THE FIRST CHURCH, MONTCLAIR, held, on June 3, a farewell service for its missionary to India, Rev. J. M. Baker. The pastor reports that the addresses by both Mr. and Mrs. Baker were an inspiration and help to the church. Mr. Baker sails June 19 for his field.

RIDGEWOOD, EMMANUEL, Dr. Thomas H. Sprague, pastor. Fifty of the Men's Fellowship Club spent the week-end at Culver's Lake recently. Sunday morning service was held by the lake side, in charge of the pastor. Eleven members of the church attended the Northern Baptist Convention at Atlantic City. Pastor Sprague delivered the annual sermon before North Association, held in the Broadway Church, Paterson, May 12. A vacation Bible school will be held in the church house July 2-30. The principal of one of the local schools will have charge. The church is uniting with five other churches in Sunday evening open air services. The Aida Brass Quartette of New York is engaged to assist in the services. Mr. Sprague is chairman of the committee. In a municipal election held recently two of the three commissioners elected to govern municipal affairs are members of Emmanuel Church. One of these has been selected mayor. Another member of the church has been elected president of the Y. M. C. A. The general secretary is also a member of the church.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH of Lewisburg on June 3 reopened the church auditorium, which had been closed for a year because of remodeling. The new auditorium was completed at a cost of $39,000. With the added gallery, it will be adequate to the needs of the congregation, including the students of the university, who attend in large numbers. At the first service in the new room, the opening prayer was made and the Scripture lesson read by President Emory W. Hunt of the university; prayer was offered and a brief talk on the building operation given by Pastor Emeritus John T. Judd; and the sermon was preached by Pastor Raymond M. West on the topic "The House that Stands for God." The music was under the direction of Director Paul G. Stolz of the University School of Music. In the afternoon a special baptism and communion service was held. The changes include the rebuilding of the organ. The church prides itself on the fact that the project has been so financed that there will be left an interest-bearing debt of but $9,000 on the $39,000 operation, although the church last year increased its original pledge to the New World Movement by $2,000, and has to date a 100 per cent payment of the New World Movement pledge. A further cause for congratulation is the spirit of cooperation shown by all the members of the church. Special gratitude is due Mrs. Katherine B. Larrison, for many years principal of the old Bucknell Institute, who made a generous gift for the purchase of the new seats; Prof. Frank E. Burpee, who superintended the construction; Dr. John T. Judd, who, as treasurer of the building fund, handled the finances with such care that no bill received remained more than five days unpaid; Prof. T. F. Hamblin, as chairman of the building committee; and Pastor R. M. West, for his wise and patient leadership.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

AN ILLUSTRATED MUSICAL SERVICE of unusual interest was held recently at the Wilkinsburg Baptist Church, Wilkinsburg, Pa., Rev. Floyd L. Carr, pastor. The service was prepared by Summer R. Vinton, of Roselle, N. J., and requires the full hour. Solos, hymns and anthems, unfolding the theme "The Glory of God in Nature" are perfectly illustrated by beautiful pictures. The 125 slides have been especially selected by Mr. Vinton. The program was enjoyed by a large audience which gave the closest and most reverent attention to the music and pictures.

ILLINOIS

ON JAN. 31 REV. E. L. BAYLIS closed his work with the Normal Church. Within a few weeks the church requested Rev. E. P. Brand to assume the pastorate of the church until a regular pastor could be secured. He did this and the church has had splendid success during this pastorless period of four months. The Sunday school and junior and senior B. Y. P. U. are perhaps in the best condition in the history of the church. The church unanimously called Rev. George Sneath, pastor at Monmouth for six years. Mr. Sneath has accepted the call and began work June 3. At the prayer meeting of May 30 three persons were received for baptism. Children's Day was observed May 30.

REV. E. P. BRAND supplied the Pisgah Church, near Jacksonville on June 3. For a generation past this has been one of the finest rural churches in Central Illinois, but it has not been doing much during the past few years. There is yet a great possibility for that field.

THE CHURCH AT CLINTON GAVE its pastor, Rev. O. P. Miles, an increase in salary at the beginning of his third year as pastor. Doctor Miles is a daily contributor to the press under the title "Daily Message to the People." These messages are also used in nine other newspapers.

THE TUXEDO PARK BAPTIST CHURCH, Indianapolis, celebrated the fifteenth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. U. S. Clutton on Sunday, June 3. At the morning service Rev. F. A. Hayward, executive secretary of the Baptist work in Indianapolis, on behalf of the church presented Mr. Clutton with a Masonic ring, and Mrs. Clutton with a Masonic pin, and to both of them fifteen American Beauty roses. In the evening Rev. C. M. Dinsmore, superintendent of the Indiana Convention, brought the message. Under the direction of Mr. Clutton, the Tuxedo Church has made steady growth; it has been a pioneer in the city and state in religious education, having held the first daily vacation Bible school in the city and the first continuous school in the state. It was the first church to attempt the week-day Bible-school work in the city, beginning in January, 1921. It has a growing Sunday school which has for several years maintained second place among the Baptist schools of the city. Rev. U. S. Clutton is a member of the executive committee and chairman of the department of religious education of the Indiana Convention. For several years he has been the president of the Indiana Baptist Assembly.

ON JUNE 3 the pastor of First Church, Laporte, Ind., W. F. Bostick preached at the Moose memorial service held at the church in the morning, broadcasted a sermon later, and in the evening preached the baccalaureate sermon for the high-school graduating class. A monthly church paper, called the Baptist Builder, is meeting with approval. The pastor has been using the Tissot pictures of the life of Christ in the evening, afterwards preaching a short sermon from some theme suggested by the pictures. The Scout troop of which the pastor is scoutmaster is active and growing. In July the pastor will preach a series of baseball sermons, the subjects being: "The Sacrifice Hit"; "Striking at High Ones"; "Dying on Third"; "Reaching Home"; "Balling Out the Umpire."

MICHIGAN

AT THE ANNUAL meeting of the First Church of Flint, held May 14, some important reports were recorded. The church showed a membership of 1,083, 128 new members being received during the year, seventy-two of whom were baptized. The financial receipts amounted to $36,000, including $5,671 for benevolences. During the month of January concerted religious efforts were made in cooperation with the Court Street Methodist Church when 986 people consecrated their lives, among whom fifty-five different religious bodies were represented. May 21 the church choir, directed by Mr. John T. Schofield, was awarded the honors in a choral contest among the church choirs, conducted by the Community Music Association. Action has been taken whereby the work of the Third Avenue Branch has been made independent and its supervision transferred to the state board. This new church work was started in January, 1918, and now has a membership of 137 in the church and 472 in the school. Doctor Agar's plan of church organization has been adopted with enthusiasm. The pastor, Rev. Ernest E. Sayles, has been authorized to add a director of religious education to the church staff.

MINNESOTA

MEN WHO HAVE BEEN LIVING in Duluth for years have commented on the living fire that somehow has come within the sacred walls. Easter services were made grand and sublime. Even Good Friday was solemnized. The Baptist churches—First and Central and the Swedish temple, had crowded churches, and solemnized to a degree, all portending to such an outpouring that worshippers' hearts were waiting for the coming of the Spirit's power. Doctor Rogers of Muscatine, Iowa, and H. Robinson McKee and Pastor Erickson of the Swedish Temple had a ten-days' campaign. The Temple was crowded nightly with about 1,000. Central Church had many seeking Christ, realizing the truth, "Ye must be born again." Pastor McKee in one baptismal service baptized his own son. On May 5, twenty-two were received into Central Church.

NORTH DAKOTA

On Wednesday evening, June 23, the church at Jamestown closed a three-weeks campaign of special revival services in which the pastor was assisted by Chaplain E. W. White, of Omaha, Neb. Since coming to this church the pastor has sought to lay a good scriptural foundation. It was Paul who said "Greater foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." The work previous to, and including the special meetings, has resulted in twenty-eight additions and four more await the ordinance of baptism. Of the total number twenty-two came by baptism. All but five are adults, and ten of the number are men. One of these, Noah E. McCoy, has for several years been an officer in the Salvation Army. He was baptized by the pastor the first Sunday evening of the special meetings, and on Monday evening, May 21, was examined with a view to the granting of a license to preach. Mr. White conducted the examination, assisted by the pastor. The church by a unanimous vote of all members present authorized the granting of a license to preach. On Tuesday evening, May 22, the ordinance of the Lord's Supper was observed. Chaplain White, and Rev. W. A. Weyhrauch, pastor of the First church of Valley City assisted in this service, which was preceded by a sermon on the atonement, delivered by Chaplain White.

NEBRASKA

Grand Island College

The number of graduates was the largest in the history of the college. There were sixteen candidates for the B. A. degree, seven in the senior class of the academy, eight candidates for the university state certificate, eight candidates for the first grade state certificate and eight for the second grade state certificate. At different times during the week the chapel was too small for those in attendance, and at the commencement dinner the tables were not large enough for the alumni, guests, faculty and friends.

There were four oratorical contests, with twenty persons taking part. Four first and four second prizes were given from funds presented to the college by Mr. Patterson.

Three gifts were presented to the college during the week. The Amphictyon Literary Society gave the college a flagstaff and a flag; the Athenian Literary Society presented the college with a beautiful brick gateway having two pillars on each side of the entrance. Mr. J. B. Lesher gave the college a seven-foot cement walk leading from the Athenian gateway to the administration building. These last two are now under construction. Prof. Harriet Anderson gave $50 toward the expense of the gateway. Other gifts received during the year are: seven lots adjoining the campus, by Dr. George Sutherland, valued at $1,000; a collection of geological specimens by Mrs. A. M. Wooley; a $10,000 life endowment policy which a hundred responsible men and women of Grand Island and vicinity have promised to maintain for the benefit of the college; thirty people have made subscriptions, amounting to $1,400 toward building a president's house. The graduating class has pledged $160 toward this new house and Prof. Elizabeth Hall has pledged a similar amount. During the year friends of the college have sent special gifts which total a little more than $160. A number of persons have given books and magazines. The largest of these gifts is $100 from the Publication Society for a circulating library for ministers. Among the important gifts are a number of scholarships and loan funds.

President Wells spoke of the tornado which destroyed the college heating plant and gymnasium, regretting that it was not possible to present as yet a definite plan with costs for a new gymnasium.

Mr. B. B. Braden told of the prospects for a continued growth in the student body. In 1919-20 there were 91; in 1920-21 87, in 1921-22 154 and the enrolment for the present year is 238.

Financial Improvement

Mr. A. B. Newell stated that there had been an increase in the permanent fund assets of $10,457.16 making the amount at the present time $144,965.09; the value of the college property up to the time of the tornado had increased $6,822.16, making the value on April 30, $145,996.22; the current assets have increased $4,444.80; the notes payable, usually termed "old debts," have decreased $5,300, making the amount still due $1,000; notes accumulated since the college was reopened called "current" have been decreased $5,100, making the present amount $800. Accounts payable a year ago were $5,282.34 and on April 30 they had been reduced to $3,806.63, a decrease of $1,525.71. During this time the tuitions have increased from $7,197.55 to $9,419.13 and the receipts from room rent from $2,631.22 to $3,654.14. This increase had been due to the growth in the student body. "Counting our total increase over last year and our

FOUR IMPORTANT DATES

At Atlantic City, the General Board of Promotion adopted a Convention calendar of four important dates, which are suggested to every Baptist church in the Northern Baptist Convention.

PRE-PAY-UP-DAY, JUNE 24

Pay in advance the amount due on your pledge for the first quarter ending July 31.

PAY-UP-DAY, OCTOBER 28

This date means the completion of one-half of the new fiscal year, and all the missionary societies will have had to meet one-half of their annual expenditures.

PAY-UP-DAY, JANUARY 27

It is a good time to begin the new calendar year with three-fourths of your pledge to the New World Movement paid.

PAY-UP-DAY, APRIL 27

This is the last Sunday in the fiscal year, which will close three days later. It also marks the end of the period covered by New World Movement pledges.

Our financial Goal for the Year Is $12,161,521.67

While these pay-up-days occur every quarter, it is important that church treasurers should make remittances each month to their state directors of promotion.

"PAY UP" not "CATCH UP"

decrease of indebtedness we have made a gain of $40,340.59. While this cannot be counted as a net gain, since it is the addition of the increase in receipts and the decrease in indebtedness, yet it gives us some idea of the trend of our present finances." It should be stated in this connection however, that these figures were made up previous to the wrecking of the power plant and the college gymnasium. When these items are taken into consideration there will be a difference of approximately $12,000.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

THE FIRST CHURCH AT DINUBA called a council on May 25 to consider the ordination of E. T. Martinez, a Mexican missionary. There were thirty-nine messengers and fourteen visitors present. The council recommended that the church proceed with the ordination of the brother to the full work of the gospel ministry. Dr. George F. Holt was the moderator and Rev. C. A. King the clerk.

IT IS UNUSUAL for a person to hold continuous membership in one church for over fifty years, and when that membership is coupled with invaluable service it deserves more than passing notice. Mrs. Carrie Hackett passed to her reward recently. She will be held in tender and grateful memory by the First Church, San Diego, of which she was a member for fifty-three years.

THE PASTOR ASKED for some old silver spoons and relics, to be melted and made into a trowel to be used in the laying of the cornerstone of the First Church, Selma, which took place June 3. Mrs. H. E. Owen brought a spoon from a set that was given her on her wedding day thirty-four years ago. Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Carter brought parts of three spoons that went through the fire that destroyed their home and all its contents. Mrs. Rose Porter gave a spoon that had been in her family more than sixty years, and Mrs. L. C. Jolley brought a souvenir spoon of the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893. The handle of the trowel was turned out of a part of one arm of a chair given the church by an Indian, named George Beezeley, in 1890. Mr. George S. Higby, superintendent of construction, had this trowel made.

Christian Brotherhood of McMinnville, to whom he taught the "Life of Christ" recently presented him with a fine camera for his use in travel. He will return for the opening of the new college year Sept. 19.

As an expression of its appreciation for his eight years service as pastor, the First Church of Decatur, Ill., has granted Dr. T. Harley Marsh a two months' vacation and a trip to the Stockholm Convention. He will sail on June 20, and will make an extensive tour on the continent, returning about Sept. 1.

Rev. Frederick Allen, after six years as pastor of the First Church, Bay City, Mich., has accepted the call of the church at Troy, N. Y. He began his work there June 1.

In the party from Illinois bound for Stockholm under the direction of Dr. Herbert Hines of Kankakee are Mrs. C. D. Eulette and daughter; Mrs. E. G. McDougall, son and daughter, Miss Ida Freeman, Miss Jessie A. Montague, Mrs. J. B. Thomas, Miss Laura Thomas, T. J. Bolger, Eugene Anderson, Miss Margaret Anderson, Miss Audra Miller.

Plans for the national observance of Children's Week, Oct. 14-21, to emphasize the religious education of children, are being distributed in leaflet form by the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education, 5 South Wabash avenue, Chicago.

The Owego Church, N. Y., has sustained a loss in the death of Brig. Gen. Henry M. Robert who passed away May 11 at the age of eighty-six. General Robert had a deep and intense interest in Christianity, to which his life was fully consecrated and to which he made large contributions of thought, energy, time and money. He retired from the army in 1901 and had lived quietly at Owego where he recently finished a thorough revision and enlargement of his well-known and widely-used "Rules of Order." The royalties on this work were given to the Foreign Mission Society. The funeral services, held at the Owego Church, May 13, were conducted by the pastor, Rev. Henry D. Coe, assisted by Dr. Riley A. Vose.

Rev. R. W. Babcock of Moline, Ill., has accepted a call to the Temple Church, Minneapolis, and began his new ministry there Sunday, June 3. A letter from the Moline Ministerial Association states "his presence in Moline will be missed as he was an active and tireless worker in his church and also in matters relative to the affairs of our city." Temple Church has been without a regular pastor since Rev. R. A. Kenyon resigned in August last year, but was extremely fortunate in securing Rev. Donald D. MacLaurin, to serve as acting pastor from Nov. 1, 1922, to June 1, 1923. The church by vote presented Doctor MacLaurin with a letter of appreciation for the service he has rendered.

The following letter has just been received from Dr. J. H. Shakespeare, dated May 23, 1923: "I am writing to inform you that the Aktiebolaget Malarebanken, Stockholm, will effect payments on letters of credit of Brown Brothers, the National City Bank of New York, and the Irving Bank-Columbia Trust Company of New York. Travelers' checks of the American Express Company will be duly honored and U. S. currency notes will also be exchanged. It occurs to me you might like to make this arrangement known to the ministers and delegates. If you desire any fuller particulars I would suggest that you get into direct communication with Mr. Sven B. Robson, care Aktiebolaget Malarebanken, Stockholm 16."

On May 29th, representatives from all evangelical denominations were asked by Mrs. E. H. Silverthorn, of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, to meet with Mr. Biederwolf, director of the Bible Conference, Winona Lake, Ind., with the thought of inaugurating a definite missionary program to occupy a certain time each day of the conference. The plan, as outlined by Mr. Biederwolf, would call for the cooperation of every board, and those present were asked to take it to their respective boards, with request for action, as soon as possible. It is hoped to be able to institute such a missionary program at the Bible Conference to be held this coming August.

Dr. Henry Edward Tralle of New York City will be one of the lecturers and teachers in the Michigan Baptist Assembly at Kalamazoo and in the Virginia Presbyterian Assembly at Massanetta Springs. He also has been engaged to teach two courses in religious education to high-school teachers in the summer school of the University of South Carolina. Doctor and Mrs. Tralle spoke recently in interdenominational Sunday-school conventions in Rochester, Buffalo and Niagara Falls.

Judge E. H. Gary, before the American Iron and Steel Institute, brought in an unfavorable report in the matter of the elimination of the twelve-hour day. The religious forces of the country are up in arms. The social service commission of the Federal Council of Churches, the social action department of the Catholic Welfare Council and the social justice department of the American rabbis, have joined forces in condemning the report of Judge Gary. They make clear that he has not met the real issue.

The Foreign Mission Society has received a cablegram announcing the death, on May 20, of Rev. Charles S. Keen, principal of the Union Language School at Nanking, China. The cause of his death was typhoid fever. Mr. Keen was on his third term of service in China and because of his unusual knowledge of the Chinese language had been serving for ten years as principal of the language school connected with the University of Nanking, at which missionaries of many denominations are given preparation for their services in China.

Pres. E. Y. Mullins, in the "Western Recorder" gives a convention retrospect. In his estimate he first says, "Southern Baptists have come to a very clear and definite understanding among themselves on the premillennial issue. It is beyond question that we are agreed to disagree on this subject. There are post-millennialists and pre-millennialists among us. All of us believe in the personal return of Christ in his own time." He then states that in his judgment acrimonious discussion of the question of evolution is in the past. He declares that the convention was one of the most cautious and deliberative he has ever attended. The work of the education board has not been clearly defined and this is also true of some phases of the work of the home mission board. He feels that steps taken at Kansas City make the completion of the $75,000,000 campaign "most auspicious."

An idea of the intense activity of the Mormon church during the past year may be gained from the following statistics given out by the church authorities at their spring conference held recently in Salt Lake City. They were published in the Salt Lake papers and have been taken from that source. In the matter of church growth, the record shows 14,449 children baptized and 6,376 converts baptized; 1,775 Mormons on the foreign mission field and 2,252 home missionaries, a total of 4,327 Mormon missionaries at work today; during the past year 43,207 persons were recommended to the Mormon temples, and 768,546 ordinances performed in the temples for the living and the dead, 153,437 meetings have been held; and 6,601,122 Mormon tracts have been distributed. These facts and figures challenge our Baptist missionary forces to renewed effort in stemming the growing tide of Mormon propaganda.

Report on Future Denominational Program

expected and is in large measure the answer to our prayers as well as the seal of God upon the measure of faithfulness yielded by his people. We face a world of bitter need following the war; a world of unstable equilibrium waiting an impulse toward great good or great evil; a world of special opportunity for those entrusted with the message of Christ. We have undertaken great things for him and cannot drop them. We have put our hand to the plow and cannot leave the furrow uncompleted. The relative failure of international diplomacy emphasizes the need of a return to the message of Christ as the only solution for the world's problems. The nations fail because their moral earnestness is insufficient to stand the strain of a distraught world. Righteousness, justice and compassion have not yet gained the victory over self-seeking, injustice, and cruelty. Christ only can meet the need. He chooses to work through his church.

Moreover, there seems to be no question but that God has a special message for Baptists to give to the world at this time. Peoples the world over are coming to self-consciousness. When self-determination in religious matters is permitted in any part of the world the trend is inevitably toward the Baptist position of independence and the competency of the soul before God. Recently freed peoples with the Bible in their hands fall in naturally with the Baptist view. Russia, Czecho-Slovakia, and other European states rapidly augment the number of Baptists today. Baptists are not a diminishing people, and there is a resiliency, youth, and spiritual vigor among them wherever found. Baptists in America have come to a leading place numerically among Protestant denominations, and there is a spiritual power in their churches. They produce men and women for the service of God and carry on an ever-expanding work. In addition they have incalculable material resources. The abounding prosperity, both temporal and spiritual, with which God has blest American Baptists, thrusts upon them great responsibility and glorious opportunity.

The close of a great movement is an hour of peril for the churches lest they should succumb to the temptation to relax their determination, slip into a position of lesser effort, and be satisfied with lower degrees of achievement God has chosen definitely that the progress of his world work should wait upon the liberality of his people. Christ himself joined means and men. Today, throughout all our churches we observe among the young people the impulse to self-giving. We are witnessing a great outpouring of life. Shall we match it by an outpouring of means to release that life for its mission of world-blessing?

It is the conviction of your committee that Christ calls us today to consolidate our gains, to make permanent the new plans of giving both in life and means, to review again the world's needs and opportunity, and to prepare to make the ground gained—the base for a new advance.

This gains all the greater emphasis and urgency from the fact that we are about to share in the most momentous world gathering of Baptists which has ever taken place. Stockholm will bring together those who think with us in Europe, America, Australia and all the world. Even in anticipation it already brings us a new sense of solidarity and world fellowship. This growing realization of power and kinship must be used, not to the ends of complacent self-satisfaction, but in a glorious outpouring of endeavor to make all men see and accept their privilege of joining with us in the rich liberty which is in Jesus Christ. Stockholm should give rise to new and greater efforts in the direction of world evangelization. It is by God's providence that this great world gathering is occurring just as we are closing one great era of service and looking forward to its successor. We must be prepared to accompany Christ to new conquests.

Some General Conclusions

The Committee on Future Denominational Program, keenly appreciative of the possibilities which inhere in the present situation, and deeply sensible of its responsibility, has sought earnestly to secure the needed data for the prosecution of its task and to ascertain the mind of the denomination in respect to the issues involved. It has invited through the denominational press the cooperation of all who are prepared to offer constructive suggestions. It has asked ministers' conferences the country over to discuss these problems and give the committee the benefit of their joint judgment. It has consulted individuals whose experience entitles them to be considered experts in various phases of the work. It has called together representatives of all the organizations participating in our cooperative movement for conference. Above all, it has asked and waited for divine guidance in the sincere desire that the Lord's will might be made so plain that the committee, and in turn the denomination, could not fail to come into unity of thought and action. In the conviction that this desire has been in some measure realized, the committee ventures to submit its report. Before presenting specific proposals it may be well to indicate briefly the general conclusions at which the committee has arrived. They are as follows:

1. The place and function of the local church should be emphasized anew. Promotion of its prosperity should be part of our united endeavor, and its verdict should be sought in determining denominational objectives.

2. A program of cooperation should be continued.

3. The cooperative plan should allow a larger measure of freedom to the participating organizations in the securing of funds.

4. While a comprehensive and far-reaching program of undertakings may be formulated, financial objectives should be determined annually, and pledges regularly be for one year.

5. Budgets should be concreted, and indicate in separate classes askings for regular operating budgets and for specifics. Askings should fall into three groups: The national societies and boards, state and city missions, schools and colleges.

6. Churches and individuals should have entire freedom in the designation of their gifts.

7. Organization essential to effective

On one life the rate of income varies from four to nine per cent. a year, payable semi-annually.

On one or two lives the rate varies from four to eight and three-tenths per cent. a year, payable semi-annually.

The rate always depends upon the age of the person when the gift is made. When the rate is once fixed, it never varies, but remains the same.

A survivorship agreement provides a permanent income for two lives. When you cease to enjoy its benefits the same income is continued throughout the lifetime of the relative or friend whose name follows yours in the agreement.

cooperation ought to be maintained. The present organization should not be discarded, but modified as the experience of the past four years may suggest.

8. Schools and colleges, approved by the state conventions of the territory in which they are located, may be included in the cooperative program in the segregated budget.

I. The Local Church

It is needful, in the judgment of the committee, to emphasize anew the place and function of the local church. We are in danger, in the multiplication of machinery, of overlooking the fact that the Northern Baptist Convention is after all only a voluntary association of independent churches for certain purposes, and that the local church is the very pulse of the machine. In our endeavor to promote large cooperative enterprises we are in peril of neglecting the one supreme piece of promotional work which is always fundamental, viz., the development of the local church. The committee desires to record its conviction that this should hold first place in our program. The prosperity of the local church must be promoted, its undertakings fostered, and its voice heard in regard to denominational program and objectives.

Accordingly the committee would propose, as the first undertaking in our future denominational program, a concerted and sustained effort to raise the efficiency of the local church. This will concern itself first with the spiritual life of the churches, seeking so to relate each member to Jesus Christ that there shall be full recognition of and response to his leadership, and that measure of devotion to him secured which will bring a full tide of spiritual power flowing through our churches.

If that be attained, all else will follow, but to be specific the committee would suggest that every local church make a survey of its own needs in relation, not only to the immediate present, but also to the coming years. That it plan wisely for the development of its work in scope, personnel, equipment, and current support, recognizing that a vigorous local organization may exercise far-reaching influence. That it study the broader scope of denominational activities and prepare for itself a program of participation in missionary service commensurate with the plans made for its own internal development and with present world needs.

Then let the effort be made to have every member an active member, and with sympathetic appreciation of the needs and tasks which challenge the church and the denomination, a faithful and generous steward of life and means.

If that degree of interest and devotion be attained the local church can safely be trusted to assume its share of obligation in the work of the denomination. Your committee believes that the time has come to put that responsibility fairly upon the churches. Instead of our unified budget passing down to the churches in the form of apportionments only, let each church be asked to say for itself what share it will assume in our common task. To that end it will be recommended in another part of this report that the participating organizations be asked to put their budgets into concrete form that the churches may see in terms of things to be done, as well as in terms of money, what, as a denomination, we ought to undertake. Then let the churches be invited and urged to put their responsibility and ability in a worthy way over against the opportunity and the need. In a word, having endeavored to cultivate and stimulate our churches, let us seek their judgment as to denominational undertakings, and let the expression of this judgment be taken into account in determining our financial objective. Your committee is of opinion that if the churches are asked to weigh for themselves their responsibility and their measure of obligation, they will respond nobly and generously.

The committee therefore recommends:

1. That during the last year of the New World Movement there be conducted a vigorous campaign which will seek to promote in every local church a wise stewardship of life and means, and to develop the best methods of giving practical expression to this stewardship. It is the conviction of the committee that such a campaign will do much to stimulate the paying of the pledges already made, and at the same time prepare for high standards of giving in the future.

2. That as a sequel to this campaign there be carried through annually in every church an every-member canvass in which pledges for one year shall be taken. In the canvass both the work of the local church and our cooperative undertakings should be presented, and separate pledges taken toward each. We suggest that the first canvass be made during the first two weeks of May, 1924, and in subsequent years at as early a date as possible in order that its results may be reported before it is necessary to determine finally the financial objectives of the participating organizations for the ensuing year.

II. Cooperation

It is clearly the mind of the denomination that we should continue in some form of cooperative endeavor. Our cooperative effort, however, must leave room for individual initiative, upon the part of local churches and of participating organizations. There is always danger in a cooperative movement, with the limitations upon independent action which it involves, that there shall be sacrifice of enterprise and of energy upon the part of the separate units. A plan of action which will admit of a full measure of cooperation and at the same time allow freedom of action to the various organizations, is not easy to devise, but the committee believes that the attempt should be made. and therefore recommends that we continue our cooperative plan with such modifications as may be deemed necessary.

To this end the committee recommends specifically:

1. That each participating organization be asked to formulate a general constructive program covering a term of five years. The administrative committee shall arrange for the correlation of these in order that the denomination may have before it a comprehensive program of kingdom achievement.

2. That each participating organization be asked to indicate annually, and as definitely and concretely as possible, a year's undertakings. These should fall into two classes: one, the operating budget, embracing all that relates to the normal and progressive conduct of the work of the organizations involved; the other including rather those items which relate to advance and which are in the nature of specifics. For these latter the organizations should have liberty to appeal to individuals.

3. That the general program and the undertakings proposed annually by the participating organizations shall be submitted to the Northern Baptist Convention for consideration and approval.

III. Organization

Cooperation necessitates organization, and since our denomination began to move in the direction of cooperation much time and thought have been given to this matter. Our enlarging program with its increasing measure of cooperation has necessitated more organization. Into the shaping of this, earnest prayer and serious counsel have entered, and it is not to be discarded hastily. There has been opportunity to observe it in actual operation, and experience inevitably suggests some modifications. These should be made, but the committee believes that it is the part of wisdom to retain all that is good in our present organization and capitalize it for the future.

1. Board of Missionary Cooperation.

It is clear that if we are to cooperate there must be some central committee or board in which the Northern Baptist Convention and all the participating organizations shall be represented. For this purpose the Board of Promotion was created and it is the judgment of your committee that some such coordinating group must be maintained. Its functions the committee believes would be better described by a different name and its efficiency increased if it were constituted somewhat differently. The committee therefore recommends:

(1) That the name of the central organization be "The Board of Missionary Cooperation."

(2) That the function of the Board of Missionary Cooperation be to coordinate those activities of our participating organizations which have to do with the stimulating of the interest of our churches in our denominational program, and with the raising of funds for the support of the same.

(3) That the Board of Missionary Cooperation be constituted as follows:

A. Three members from each of our seven national organizations.

B. Three members from the executive committee of the Northern Baptist Convention.

C. One member from each state convention and from each standard city mission society, class A.

D. Nine members at large from the Northern Baptist Convention, all of whom shall be women.

At the first election groups, A. B. and D, shall elect one third of their representatives for one year, one-third for two years and one-third for three years. Subsequent elections shall be for three years.

In groups C the state conventions shall be arranged alphabetically and divided into three groups as follows:

Group 1: Arizona, California (North), California (South), Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa and Kansas.

Group 2: Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota and Ohio.

Group 3: Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, Vermont, Washington (East), Washington (West), Wisconsin and Wyoming.

In similar manner the standard city mission societies class A, shall be divided into three groups as follows:

Group 1: Boston, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Chicago and Cleveland.

Group 2: Detroit, Kansas City, Los Angeles, New York and Philadelphia.

Group 3: Pittsburgh, Rochester, San Francisco and St. Louis.

At the first election group one in each of these classes shall elect its representatives for one year, group two for two years and group three for three years; subsequent elections shall be for three years.

Elections shall be made in advance of the annual meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention and shall be reported to the corresponding secretary of the convention.

Salaried or administrative officers of any of the participating organizations shall not be eligible to membership on this board, but all such officers shall be invited to attend the meetings of the board with the privilege of participating in discussions.

(4) Organization of the Board of Missionary Cooperation.

A. That the chief executive officer of the board shall be designated "Executive Secretary of the Board of Missionary Cooperation" and shall be elected by the convention.

B. That the administrative committee shall be retained with this modification, that in order to secure complete cooperation and coordination one or more executive officers from the group of participating organizations be included in each sub-committee of the administrative committee.

C. That instead of the present advisory committee there shall be a council composed of the executive secretary of the Board of Missionary Cooperation as chairman, together with an executive secretary of each national society and board—one secretary representing the state conventions and one representing the city mission societies. These shall be preferably the secretaries assigned to service on the sub-committees of the administrative committee. The council shall serve as a clearing house for the business of the board in order that there may be a coordination of the activities of the various committees. It shall also prepare the budget of the Board of Missionary Cooperation for submission to the business and administrative committees.

2. Building the Unified Budget.

It is recognized that on the basis of suggestions offered earlier in this report the voice of the churches is to be considered in determining the total budget. At the same time in order that the participating organizations may plan wisely and that the churches may have information for their guidance it will be necessary to formulate what is to be undertaken, and to indicate financial objectives which it will be desirable to attain. As to the method of preparing the unified budget the committee has no radical suggestions to propose, and the following recommendations include in them much that has been in our practice.

(1) The budgets of the participating organizations shall be reviewed by the finance committee of the Northern Baptist Convention, and after such review the finance committee shall convey to each organization its judgment with reference to the equity of the proposed budget. The finance committee before making report to the Northern Baptist Convention shall meet in open conference the administrative officers or representatives of all the participating organizations for the consideration of the unified budget or any of its constituent parts. When the report of the finance committee has been adopted by the convention, with such changes as the convention directs, the total of the budgets thus recommended shall constitute the unified budget for the year.

(2) In order that the finance committee may be prepared to give adequate consideration to the budgets, they should be authorized to employ a special accountant who is familiar with budgets making and to secure such assistance at certain periods of the year as the demands of the work render necessary.

(3) The accountant of the finance committee should make careful study of the budgets prepared by the participating organizations in order to assist the finance committee in passing upon them.

(4) From time to time, as need may arise, a representative of the Board of Missionary Cooperation or of one of the national societies, appointed by the

Our Book Shelf

The Resurrection Body, by Wilbert W. White. New York: Doran Co. $1.

An interesting and well-written brochure on the personal resurrection of Jesus Christ and an assurance of the resurrection of believers. It is mildly polemic, contravening the averments of the Harnack School that the New Testament distinguishes between the Easter message of the "empty grave and the personal appearance of Jesus," on the one side and the Easter faith, on the other, which claims that Jesus Christ is alive although his body did not rise from the sepulcher. The author marshals the records of the Gospels and of the four major Pauline epistles to combat this emasculating view and perversion of Christian evidences, and pleads for their credibility and essentialness. His discussion of the "spiritual body" of the resurrection is supra-reasonable, but not contra-reasonable. A statement on the cover claims the volume offers "fresh biblical evidence of the resurrection and transformation of our mortal bodies." The claim is overworked. We are glad to accord to the author that he has prepared and congested into a comparatively limited work a very lucid, readable and consistent presentation of a great subject and the masses of Christian believers will thank him for putting their cherished and vital faith in the form of this book which is a short scriptural classic on a mysterious problem. Such a task is serviceable but hardly original.

The History of Utopian Thought, by Joyce Oramel Hertzler. New York: MacMillan Co. $3.

The author adapts a term invented by Thomas More to characterize his (More's) dream of a perfected human society, as a title to his book. It is a congested record of great racial movements during two and a half millennials to improve the social, moral, economical, political and religious conditions of human society and life. It begins with the efforts of the great Hebrew prophets from the ninth century B. C. to the exile and reviews the efforts of the Apocalyptists in inter-testaments times. The prophets he names as the forerunners of the Utopians. Then follows "kingdom of heaven" as promulgated by Jesus Christ. The "Republic" of Plato; "City of God" by Augustine; Savanarola's "Theocracy," More's "Utopia," Bacon's "Atlantis" and other dreams of reformers. He discusses the theories and experiments of Fourier, Rosseau, Owen and various communistic groups in different countries. He gives a succinct description and analysis of the philosophies underlying these cults and the methods of the ventures in socialistic experiment; he shows their weaknesses and the causes of their failure. The historic content of the volume can be gathered from cyclopaedias and fugitive magazine articles as well as from cursory popular literature, but a logical historic sequence and relations of the movements, a philosophic criticism of their principles showing their soundness and mistakes, with a survey of the doctrine inculcated and ventures made, we have not seen. The average man has no time or disposition to read Plato's "Republic" or the "City of God" or the "Atlantis," or the "Utopia" though he has heard much about them. He has crude notions of what they are. This book gives all the information he cares to have, with such comments and criticisms as make the principles and movements understandable to the lay reader and helpful to the scholar. By using the term "Utopia" as a characteristic adjective the author possibly intends to imply the improbableness that the Golden Age will approach along the paths those "thoughts" have marked for it. The richest portion of the book to many will be the marked tribute the author gives to Jesus Christ as a reformer or renovator. Among these wise and great of the race the Son of Mary is presented as the "chiefest among ten thousand and one altogether lovely."

The Trend of History, by William Kay Wallace. New York: Macmillan. $3.50.

The somewhat ambitious title of the book is hardly justified in its actual scope. Mr. Wallace, a Yale alumnus, has served his country in our embassies at Tokyo and Rome, and also at Paris during the peace negotiations. He was in the American army in the World War, and prior to that was a newspaper correspondent. The diplomat rather than the reporter seems to have influenced his style, which is rather heavy and involved. Mr. Wallace lays down the thesis that religion, politics, and economics are the three regulative factors of human intercourse subsumed under the term "society." During the Dark Ages "the church intrenched itself firmly and filled the whole life of the individual." This dominance of religion was followed by the Renaissance and the Reformation, which "awakened an unquenchable interest in the theory and practice of political affairs." Society is now on the verge of passing from the stage wherein the state is the dominant factor, to a new period in which the pivotal interest is economics. The author devotes much space to the discussion of Treitschke and Bismarck and their view of "the state as power." He evidently plans a second volume to follow the present work. "The Trend of History" is a book for the scholar rather than for the general reader. Its view of history is naturalistic, and, if the reviewer understands him, anti-theistic. "History . . . admits of no such notion as an efficient or final cause."

"Have I?" the boy answered. "Well most people would have walked off with the money. Just keep it for your honesty."

OUR MUSIC CORNER

IS AMERICA A MUSICAL NATION?

The fact that a great deal of music "goes on" in America is no indication that America is a musical nation is one of the four fallacies exploded by Archibald T. Davison, of Harvard University, in an address recently given under the auspices of community service of Boston, says the New York Times. He gave it as his opinion that four isn't at all the limiting number of the existent fallacies on the subject of music in relation to the American people, but he picked out four of the biggest and juiciest, and proceeded to squash them.

The belief that what is known as "popular" music is the deliberate choice of the people at large is one of them. The idea that music to be "good music" must be "highbrow"—complicated, difficult, hard to understand—is another.

Why should we assume, he argues, that what we call "popular" music is the deliberate choice of the people at large, when the public at large is given such small opportunity for selecting one type of music over another? If you regularly cause a man to be fed chocolate eclairs, he says, you have no right to assume that he will not like roast beef, until you give him a chance to exercise his own judgment in the matter. This is exactly the case as regards popular music, according to Mr. Davison.

It is a mistake, says Mr. Davison, to think that music to be "good" must be "highbrow." The truth is, he says, that the very best music is often the simplest. Take the case of the folk song. Folk songs rank among the best music. They are part of the actual musical language of the people. It is possible, he says, for nearly anybody to enjoy any kind of music and only the "highbrows" wish to do away entirely with ragtime. Unhappily, however, ragtime jazz and the sentimental ballad define practically the entire musical knowledge of this country, and the great majority of the public, unacquainted with the good, unhesitatingly accepts as its musical birthright the cheap, the vulgar and the vapid."

"Most of the experience, too, is second hand," he says, "for in the actual making of music the public has small part. Winding the gramophone or pumping the pianola are first of all types of physical exercise and are slight indications of innate musicalness. Unless you sing, or make music of one kind or another, and do it spontaneously, you are not really musical."

Not until people sing, naturally and wholeheartedly, and really take enjoyment in singing, will they make a musical nation. Mr. Davison lays the blame for the present musical conditions in this country, in large measure, at least, on the mismanagement of the subject in the public schools. Programs suitable for countries like England, France and Italy, he shows, are unsuitable for America, which has no such musical tradition or background as exists in these lands. He suggests that the object of American musical education be made the stimulation of appreciation of good music through the singing of beautiful songs. Americans, he says, without such a basis for musical development, will never achieve a national musical distinction. It is useless to try to teach children the technic of music—sight reading, etc., before they have a speaking knowledge of the musical language. What he characterizes as one of the most potent agencies in insulating American children from contact with beautiful music has been the attitude of many educators in maintaining that foreign folk songs are not adaptable to American school use, on the basis that the music is alien, and that texts translated from foreign languages are unintelligible to American children.

This idea, he says, that text and music are inseparable, is another fallacy. As the thing has worked out, at least 90 per cent of the public and practically all American children are unfamiliar with folk songs.

"Here is a field of beautiful and everliving music," he says, "the natural language of children and of grown-ups, the logical introduction to all musical experience, denied our children either because of an educational theory or because music teachers prefer to use in their places some made-to-order tune which will serve to teach the reading of music at sight, an acquirement used by only one person in ten thousand after graduation from the public school. Let children learn the music of all nationalities just as they learn the geography of all countries. The work of Americanization is a great and necessary one. We must teach the immigrant loyalty to our laws and customs, but in heaven's name let us not undertake to Americanize music! The foreigner can teach us much in the matter of beautiful songs, and he can, moreover, teach us how to sing them!"

And, speaking of singing, what Mr. Davison refers to as a fourth fallacy is the conviction that, to sing at all, one must have a trained voice. Many a good chorus, he says, consists of poor individual voices—paradox as it may be. In summing up he pleads for the singing by everyone of good music. While there are many definitions of good music, he indicates briefly that one factor, at least, is essential in them all, namely, permanence. The situation in America today is like that of a lot of people with passing acquaintances, but no permanent friends. The much heard music of today is gone tomorrow, and other music equally transient takes its place. The permanent and the simple are at best a half closed book.

It is not enough that we provide our children with three meals a day, clothe them well, and at bed time utter a prayer of thanksgiving that at last they are out of the way. As soon as possible, we send them to school, so that they shall be out of the way all day, and, if possible, to a boarding school, so as to further lessen our trouble and responsibility. One vital part of a child's education is consistently neglected—the training of its imagination. The power of imagination in a child is more than the power to make images. It is the kernel of individuality. Under its influence does the mind become impressionable to beauty, to ideals. To efficiently train a child to imagine actively is to prepare the child for humanity's highest destiny—the power to create immortal works in art, literature or science. Music appreciation, as distinct from actual acquiring of a technique, is one of the strongest stimuli to imagination. We should therefore, be determined to do all that we can to help to arouse in our children a real love of and interest in music. Whether a child learns music or not doesn't matter so long as appreciation is cultivated. Appreciation of a subject should certainly precede the technical study of that subject.

finance committee of the Northern Baptist Convention, shall visit each state convention and city mission society to review its proposed budget with the local budget committee. This representative shall present the opportunities, needs and financial situation of the national societies so that the local committee may construct its budget in full sympathy and cooperation with the whole denominational program. By this arrangement, the state boards and city mission boards will gain a sympathetic understanding of the situation of the national enterprises and the representative by his fraternal visit will be prepared to assist in making clear to the finance committee of the Northern Baptist Convention the situation of the states.

(5) The national, state convention and city mission groups should each confer and agree upon the basic principles to be observed in making the budgets in order that all may be made upon an equitable basis.

(6) The state conventions and standard city mission societies, class A, shall include in their askings for their operating budgets, the operating expenses of the local institutions for which they assume responsibility.

(7) The sum of the combined operating budgets of the national organizations shall be allotted to the states, and each state shall add to the amount of its allotment its own budget and the budget of standard city mission societies within its area. The statement of the budget should arrange the askings in three groups: The national societies and boards, state and city missions, schools and colleges. The total shall become the goal to be reached within the state and shall be distributed to the churches by the state convention board.

(8) In addition to budgets for operating expenses each participating organization shall prepare a budget of specifics for which, when approved by the finance committee, appeal may be made to individuals.

(9) All budgets shall be ready for the approval of the finance committee by January 1 at the latest.

(10) Churches and individuals shall have entire freedom in the designation of their gifts.

3. Collection and Distribution of Funds.

(1) There shall be a central accounting department and treasury to which all funds shall be sent by the state offices. In this office shall be kept full information in respect to regular and designated gifts.

In connection with this central treasury the committee would recommend that provision be made for the following:

a. A treasurer who shall be an unsalaried officer.
b. An accountant who would be in charge of the books, reports, etc., and who shall be furnished with a sufficient staff.
c. A committee composed of the treasurers of the national organizations with the executive secretary and treasurer of the board. This committee would be appointed by and report to the administrative committee and would be charged with the work of supervising the accounting department.
d. A business committee composed of members of the administrative committee with the treasurers for consideration of questions of general policy relating to the department.

(2) That state collection agencies be continued, and that the collecting agents be responsible by agreement alike to the national and state organizations.

(3) That all designated funds shall be forwarded each month through the usual channels strictly as designated. All undesignated receipts shall be divided each month according to the proportions in the unified budget, the proportion for the state being retained, and the proportion for the national organizations being forwarded to the central treasury.

(4) That as the normal procedure all funds be sent by churches and individuals to the state collecting office; where desired, however, funds may be sent directly to the central treasury or to the treasuries of the participating organizations, and in the case of the women's societies through their district treasurers.

4. Promotional Work.

We recognize that the primary responsibility for the work of promotion rests upon the state conventions. Since the state secretaries realize their need of more promotional assistance, and because of the difference of conditions in the various states, a uniform method of doing promotional work does not seem practicable.

We therefore recommend:

(1) That each state convention officially recognize its full responsibility for the work of promotion, and in conference with the Board of Missionary Cooperation set up promotional machinery adequate to produce the desired results.

(2) That the expenses of promotion shall be provided by the participating organizations pro rata according to the appproved operating budgets.

(3) That provision be made by the national organizations for a large number of inspirational speakers in the work of promotion.

IV. Schools and Colleges

The place of the schools and colleges in our cooperative movement, and their relation to the unified budget is a question over which a great difference of opinion emerges. There seems to be a general agreement, however, that in some way the denomination should promote education, and, indeed, in view of its vital relation to our life and progress, it seems inconceivable that the denomination could consent to omit provision for Christian education from its program. There are, it is recognized, institutions, which have attained such a degree of strength, and which have such large and sympathetic constituencies supporting them that they have no need to seek aid from the denomination. There are others, however, which must be encouraged and generously aided if they are to grow into strength. Your committee believes that under proper conditions such schools should have denominational support and therefore recommends:

1. That the necessary funds for the current expenses of such schools and colleges as are dependent upon the denomination for support and as are accredited by the board of education, shall be included in the unified budget as a part of the board of education askings, but there shall be included only the askings of such schools as shall have been approved by the state convention or the official boards thereof, within which the schools are located, provided, however, that in case any state convention shall prefer to include within its own state budget the approved askings of the school within its bounds, the amount shall be transferred from the budget of the board of education to the budget of the state convention.

2. That the askings of schools and colleges which desire denominational support, for endowment, and equipment, after approval by the respective state conventions, the board of education and the finance committee of the Northern Baptist Convention, shall be treated as specifics to be raised by the schools themselves as designated gifts in the same method as specific gifts are raised by national societies and boards.

V. Society Anniversaries

In 1924 the American Baptist Publication Society will observe its one hundredth anniversary; in 1927 the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society its fiftieth, and in 1932 the American Baptist Home Mission Society its one hundredth. The committee recommends:

That the Northern Baptist Convention approve of featuring by special publicity, pageantry and anniversary meetings, such outstanding occasions, and extend sympathetic helpfulness to these societies in observance of their anniversaries.

Method of adopting and giving effect to future program. The committee recommends:

1. That if this report be adopted by the convention it be adopted subject to ratification by two-thirds of the participating organizations or their executive bodies.

2. That the secretaries of the participating organizations be asked to submit the report to their respective organizations or executive bodies of the organizations at the earliest opportunity and to report the action taken to the corresponding secretary of the Northern Baptist Convention.

3. That in the event of such ratification being secured the executive committee of the Northern Baptist Convention be requested to prepare for submission at the next meeting of the convention such changes in the constitution and by-laws of the convention as the report may necessitate and that the General Board of Promotion shall continue its functions until the proposed Board of Missionary Cooperation shall have been duly created by the by-laws of the convention, and be requested to make through its administrative committee such preliminary and preparatory arrangements during the current year as will enable the denomination to enter promptly and aggressively upon its future program.

Respectfully submitted,

J. F. Vichert, chairman; C. M. Dinsmore, secretary; Mrs. W. A. Montgomery, Mrs. Andrew Mc Leish, Mrs. Geo. W. Coleman Charles L. White, C. A. Fulton G. N. Brink, J. J. Ross, P. H. J Lerrigo, W. C. Chappell, P. C Wright, F. W. Padelford, C. W Petty.

Fresh from the Field

Rev. Frederick E. Taylor, of Indianapolis, preached the baccalaureate sermon at Denison University this year. The university conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity at commencement.

At the recent commencement of Franklin College, President Goodell announced gifts amounting to more than $100,000 received during the year.

Rev. John MacNeill of the Walmer Road Church, Toronto, completed seventeen years of service June 1. The church observed the anniversary and more than 700 persons were at the communion service the first Sunday of the month. Nearly 2,300 have been added to the membership. The property is now valued at $450,000.

Much has been heard about the religious movement which has been taking place and is still going on in the Czecho-Slovak republic since the revolution. We hope to have an opportunity later on to give fuller information on this point. This time we shall give the strength of the respective churches according to the census of 1921. Roman Catholics, 10,384,860; Greek Catholics, 532,608; Protestants of all denominations, 992,083; Czecho-Slovak church, 525,332; Orthodox, Orientals 72,697; Jews, 353,925; other denominations, 25,339; without church adherence, 724,505. Since the census of two years ago, a movement has been going on toward Protestantism and in particular toward the new Czecho-Slovak church, which is Rome-free, standing upon the fundamental Protestant principle of freedom of conscience. This movement merits attention and sympathy.

In a little paper edited by Prof. F. Zilka, dean of the Hus-Theological Faculty at Prague we find the following: After the news of the bloodless revolution of 1918 was carried abroad and the name of Czecho-Slovak republic was being published—a word came to us from a man in Southern Africa, Figulus by name, a descendant of John Amos Comenius. No one in Czecho-Slovakia up to this time had knowledge of the fact that in far-off Africa there still lives a lineal descendant of one of the greatest men of our nation and of the world. And that in his possession are some of the heirlooms of the great pedagogue bishop, especially his ring. Mr. Figulus, a mining engineer, a descendant of the daughter of Comenius (for he had no sons) came to Czecho-Slovakia in June, 1921, and was in Praha upon the occasion of the three hundredth anniversary of the public execution of the 27 Protestant nobles who had taken part in the revolution and the battle of the White Mountain. He brought with him his daughter Gertrude aged ten, whom, when he returned, he left here in a family of a Czech brethren pastor. But the liberated mother-country is calling and blood has made reply. Mr. Figulus has definitely decided to remove to Czecho-Slovakia. His little daughter meanwhile has learned again the mother tongue of her great ancestor, while of course she keeps her German and English which she learned in South Africa.

Baptist membership in New Orleans has increased over 150 per cent and the contributions from the churches have increased more than 400 per cent since the establishment there, five years ago, of the Baptist Bible Institute, according to the annual report of President B. H. DeMent of that institution.

The Good Samaritan Hospital at Selma, Ala., built and supported by the white Baptists of Alabama for negro patients, which has just completed the first year of its operation, reports a total of 483 patients for the year, with six student nurses in training. Of the patients 310 were Baptists, 56 Methodists, 5 Presbyterians and 112 of other faiths.

The World Swings Into Light

By Howard A. Vernon

THE world swings into light,
Day-dawn is flashing in the east;
The sombre shadows of the night
Flee like some terror-stricken beast.
The morning song of hope is heard,
True prophet of the better times;
In every stirring breeze His word
Rings in the soul like silver chimes.

The world swings into light.
False prophets may not heed the sign,
Nor know the deathless power of right
To triumph over hell's design.
In spite of pessimistic song,
Of proudful boast, and cynic's sneer,
The world, unheeding, swings along
From dark of night to morning clear.

Fall in, my soul, and march with God;
Swing round, and face the crimson morn;
Brood not on shadows deep and broad,
But face the east where hope is born.
For God is Light, and as the sun
Invades the realm of death, and night,
The shadows vanish one by one,
The world is swinging into light.

The hearts and homes of the people of Ocean City were thrown open to the department of religious education of the Publication Society for four days preceding the Northern Baptist Convention. The commissioner's room in City Hall was placed at the disposal of the guests, and most of the directors of religious education throughout the Northern Baptist Convention were present. It is agreed by all that there never has been a more inspiring and beneficial conference than that in Ocean City. Doctor Chalmers presided over the sessions. The services were concluded on Sunday evening with an address by Associate-General Secretary Wm. H. Main, and a brief closing address by General Secretary Gilbert N. Brink.

Northfield, Mass. is celebrating its two hundred and fiftieth anniversary June 22-24. An elaborate pageant depicting the town's history directed by Miss Leila M. Church will require the services of 700 persons.

Rev. John E. Smith of Gary, Ind., is a business man. For years he has been active as a pastor and even during the time he has been engaged in business he has usually served some church. He was pastor of the Indiana Harbor church for five years. He will help some pastor in Chicago or vicinity get a vacation. Write him at Gary.

The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society and the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society have about fifty missionaries under appointment who are of Swedish Baptist descent. While Northern Baptists in other years have made small contributions to the development of the work in Sweden, it is evident that now their foreign mission societies are reaping large results from the sowing of years ago.

Mr. W. B. Lipphard and Dr. T. B. Ray have compiled a Baptist guidebook of Europe for the especial use of delegates to Stockholm. The little booklet gives a brief account of Baptist work in every country in Europe in which Baptists have organized, and it furnishes the addresses of the larger churches in each country, together with the names of pastors. The booklet will be placed in the hands of delegates sailing for Stockholm, or it may be secured by addressing the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, 276 Fifth Ave., New York City, or the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, Richmond, Virginia.

The Southwestern Baptist Theological seminary at Forth Worth, Tex., which was recently tendered the Southern Baptist Convention by the president and the board of trustees, will be accepted by the convention next year, in all probability, as the committee named to consider the proposition has already voted to recommend acceptance. Seminary Hill, the postoffice name of the seminary site, has just been incorporated by the city of Forth Worth, the city guaranteeing the provision of all public utilities at regular city rates.

Appointment of ten delegates to represent the United States at the international congress against alcoholism at Copenhagen in August was announced recently at the White House as follows: Wayne B. Wheeler of Washington, general secretary of the Anti-Saloon League; Dr. Earnest H. Cherrington of Ohio, an official of the Anti-Saloon League; William S. Bennett of Illinois, ex-member of Congress from New York and one time leader of the dry forces in the House; Mrs. E. L. Calkins, president of the Michigan Women's Christian Temperance Union; Albert Sutcliffe of Massachusetts, grand chief templar of the International Order of Good Templars; Evangeline Booth, head of the Salvation Army; the Rev. P. J. O'Callaghan of New York, Dr. C. N. Dinwiddie of Washington, superintendent of the national temperance bureau; ex-Representative Volstead of Minnesota and Cora Frances Stoddard of Massachusetts, secretary of the Scientific Temperance Federation.

Cling to Experiences of Redemption

Dr. John G. Briggs, of St. Paul, since the Atlantic City meetings wrote some commendatory things about THE BAPTIST. The charity of some men passes all understanding. But the best thing that he wrote was this: "We are all conservatives in that we cling tenaciously to our precious experiences of redemption, yet to preserve that deposit we must be ready to accept now and then a new dress—a new form in thought and expression. You are at the keyboard and are sending us clear-cut messages. We are all 'one in the spirit.'" THE BAPTIST does not wink at the differences among Baptists. Difference of opinion among Baptists is inevitable. But we are one in "clinging tenaciously to our precious experiences of redemption." What greater uniformity do we need? Is there anything that could bind us more closely together?

Do Not Leave Your Valuables Lying Around

"I am enclosing stamps herein for a copy of THE BAPTIST. The joke is on me. Your subscriber travels and THE BAPTIST finds a place in his traveling bag. He was waiting for a train in a city in Montana and for a brief space laid down his copy of THE BAPTIST, which he had just begun to read. The depot matron came along on a clean-up walk and picked up the paper in question and asked if it were ours. Being so assured she replied, "I am a Baptist," and thanked us for the paper and said that she would take it home and read it. We hope that this may mean a new subscriber to THE BAPTIST."—Rev. George B. Newcomb, Bismarck, N. D.

No Worse Than Some Others We Know

The following excerpt from a student just finishing the junior year in college needs few comments, "I've been struggling with "Bib Lit" until I'm a bit confused. I can hardly tell whether Revelation has the story of Jonah or Jonah the pictures of Revelation. Of one thing I am almost sure and that is that Abraham accompanied Paul on his first missionary journey and that Luke's preface is to be found in Gen. 1:11." When we consider the knowledge of the Bible possessed by the average freshman who enters college, we marvel that such progress as indicated above is possible. The ignorance of the Bible on the part of the average church member is surpassed only by his ignorance of his own denomination and its world service. We commend the reading of the Bible and THE BAPTIST to every Baptist.

Gnats Annoy But Do Not Destroy

"I am more and more appreciating the character of paper which you are presenting to us from week to week. The spirit is good. The subject matter is of a high order, and it is gratifying to find men big enough to ignore the little things, however annoying they may sometimes be."—Horace W. Cole, Calvary Church, Denver. In times past we spent a considerable portion of our time trying to get folks to see things just as we did. In some cases we succeeded and then regretted our success. Adopting our notions, they became our allies and we found that in a measure we had become responsible for their foibles as well as our own. Annoyances are like gnats. They annoy but do not destroy. The more notice you give to them the more nervous you become and a nervous man will usually make a fool of himself. Shoo gnats!

J. M. Borden, better known as "Black Jack," a member of the Quantrel-Jesse James gang, was received for baptism at the First Church, Fort Worth, Tex., F. M. Norris pastor, recently. He is eighty years old.

The General Education Board at its meeting on May 24 made a conditional pledge of $133,333 toward the sum of $400,000 new endowment to Shurtleff College. The board also continues its gift of $5,000 per year to current expenses. The outlook for the college is encouraging.

The action of Governor Smith of New York in signing the repeal of the Mullan-Gage law enforcing prohibition is subject to more than one interpretation. Its most inevitable result will be the collapse of all systematic effort by state authorities to cooperate with the government in enforcing the Volstead act. On the other hand, putting undivided responsibility upon the federal government and centering attention on New York as the test of the federal government's ability to give effect to the law may so greatly stiffen the effort at enforcement as to curb violations much more effectually than has been hitherto accomplished. It was strongly urged at the hearing by those who favored repeal that if the federal government really meant business with the Volstead act it could enforce it without state aid.

At its recent meeting the board of bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church after listening to reports from the rural field officially went on record as favoring the organization of cooperative associations or corporations for the marketing of farm products and the purchase of farm supplies. Methodist ministers were urged to cooperate with such organizations where possible and it was suggested that in certain types of communities the church might well take the lead in the organization of cooperative enterprises. This is the first time that a purely ecclesiastical body has recognized the relation of the church to the cooperative movement and the economic and spiritual implications in this movement which gives it significance from the religious point of view.

One of the largest life insurance companies reports that the longest-lived class of people in the United States consists of ministers' widows who receive a pension. Next to this class is that of the ministers themselves. It is amazing how many of those on the lists of the board as beneficiaries or pensioners have passed the age of eighty. Among the recent notices we have received of deaths was one of a beneficiary in her ninety-ninth year. She had been receiving a grant from a local board previous to the formation of the ministers and missionaries benefit board and then was transferred to the lists of the latter.

Earl S. Johnson has been appointed manager of the Los Angeles Branch of the Publication Society, and will assume his responsibility August 1. Mr. Johnson was a salesman in the book store of the society's headquarters in Philadelphia, a few years ago, and left to assume a responsible position in the society's branch in St. Louis. After the closing of the St. Louis branch Mr. Johnson was identified with the Presbyterian Board. Dr. George L. White will continue as the western representative of the society, and he will give particular attention to the missionary affairs of the society on the coast.

Rev. John A. Haynes, for more than forty years active in the Baptist ministry, died May 26 at St. Luke's Hospital, Seattle, Wash. Funeral services were held in Seattle, Drs. Philip Graif and Archibald Macintosh officiating. Educated at Georgetown College and graduated at the Louisville Theological Seminary, since 1882 Mr. Haynes spent something like twenty years in Indiana pastorates, and the last twenty years in the state of Washington where he acceptably served Belleview, Manette, Sedro-Wolley, Marysville, Edmonds, Kirkland, Keyport, and Brownsville. Mr. Haynes was born in Kentucky, Dec. 28, 1852.

"By order of the convention," writes Dr. W. C. Bitting, "the report of the committee on future denominational program will be printed for distribution. Also the convention voted that the plan adopted at Minneapolis and recorded in the Annual for 1916, Executive Committee Report, Section 11, pages 31-34, should become a part of the program. A special edition of the report of the committee on future denominational program, also containing the plan suggested at Minneapolis is now being printed. There are in round numbers 10,000 Baptist churches in the Northern Baptist Convention. It will not be necessary to flood these churches with copies for the individual members. This is an expense which the treasury of the convention cannot stand, and for which no provision has been made. Enough copies, however, will be printed to supply each church in the convention with the complete report, and the distribution will be made by the Publication Society, probably through the state convention secretaries, possibly through the General Board of Promotion. Just as soon as this report can be printed it will be distributed. It will be impossible for the convention to supply an unlimited number of copies. Enough, however, will be printed to see that each church gets a copy, and there will be a few extra copies for emergency uses."

> THEN shall the King say unto them upon his right hand, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.
> I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was athirst, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in, naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

Rev. William G. Everson, pastor of the First Church, Muncie, Ind. was commander of the American forces in Italy during the world war. He recently addressed the Marion County Federation of Baptist young people on "Playing the Game." "I wish that we, as Christians, could get a new vision of our tasks and responsibilities, our opportunities and abilities, and could put into our work our united forces and that same spirit that men had in winning the war. We need that same earnestness and devotion that the men had under the stars and stripes, to play the greatest game in the world—the Christian game. To play that game we must have a real team, know the rules laid down and have an opponent worthy of our greatest efforts."

Secretary P. H. J. Lerrigo received a degree of Doctor of Divinity from Franklin College at its recent commencement. Secretary W. C. Chappell of Pittsburgh a like honor from Hillsdale College.

The Stifler family held a reunion at the Crozer seminary campus on May 22, which was commencement day there—twenty years from the commencement day at which a memorial service for their father was held. The names of the children in the order of their ages are, Mrs. Daniel G. Stevens of Lansdowne, Pa.; Mrs. B. P. Hope of Media, Pa.; Rev. J. M. Stifler of Evanston, Ill.; Mrs. W. F. Meyer of Leominster, Mass.; Mrs. Winfield Scott Holland of Roslindale, Mass.; and Rev. Francis C. Stifler of Wilmette, Ill. The interesting fact is that all of the children have gone into Christian work, the two boys entering the ministry and all four of the girls becoming wives of ministers.

The Lincoln Park Church, Cincinnati, has granted Pastor C. W. Atwater a leave of absence of three months and a half in order that he may attend the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm, and tour Europe, Egypt, and Palestine.

And now the New York presbytery adopts by unanimous vote a report of a special committee in the Fosdick matter. The presbytery finds that "hundreds of people are being brought to the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ and led into the Christian life under his (Doctor Fosdick's) ministry," and that "the interests of the cause of Christ in this great Babylon are not being hindered, but furthered by his able and constructive testimony." The Herald and Presbyter commenting on the case says: "The report which was adopted says that the General Assembly 'would direct the Presbytery of New York to take such action as will require the preaching and teaching in the First Presbyterian Church, of New York, to conform to the system of doctrines taught in the Confession of Faith.' The presbytery is directed to report its action to the next General Assembly. This is not a 'criticism.' It 'directs' the presbytery to 'require.' Our Presbyterian Church has a constitutional form of government. No local church is independent, and no presbytery is independent. Each church is directly responsible to its presbytery; and each presbytery is directly responsible to the General Assembly for keeping each church in line with Presbyterian doctrine and government. In this case specific directions to this effect have been issued. The presbytery is expected to conform."

Is Our Organized Young People's Work Effective?

WE DO not know; we only inquire. We inquire because our young people took hold but feebly of a proposition we submitted to them to have two full pages of THE BAPTIST for their very own, provided they would secure a certain number of new subscribers among their constituency. Whether the proposal did not appeal to the rank and file of our young people or whether it did not get before them in such a way as to command their proper consideration, we have yet to learn. But we do know this: When the Methodist young people put on a campaign for subscriptions to the Epworth Herald they secured 23,916 new subscribers in less than a month. We are quite sure the Methodist young people are not any better than Baptist, but somehow their organization is more effective. In the language of a great modern thinker who speaks with eloquent precision: "How come?"

Now, we do not presume to criticize the general secretary, who is working hard and faithfully to lead the organization along the lines its board directs, and who is greatly handicapped by limited support in personnel and finance. It is because we believe in young people's work and have proved our belief by our efforts in their behalf that we want to give the board of managers something to think about when it convenes in Boston next month.

The B. Y. P. U. of A. now seems to be engaged in three lines of activity, not organizational, but promotional: It boosts its big annual gathering or convention, devoting a large amount of its space in THE BAPTIST to keeping it before its constituency; it is energetic in the distribution of tithing literature, sowing the seed of this essential movement among young leaders, which is a good thing; and it is doing another fine service of leadership training in its life service and daily devotions leagues. Beyond these, however, its program is not clearly defined, and at this point we would make bold to express our impressions, just because we are convinced that no organization or individual is giving to the local young people's society a program of activities, and that our young people's work in the local church lacks direction.

We wonder if so much concerted energy for the great convention is a wise expenditure. To be sure, over 10,000 registered delegates at the St. Paul convention sounded pretty big. But then, the actual total was only 9,183, and of these 7,899 were from the Twin Cities and Minnesota, not actual young people in attendance, but many, many supporters who paid a dollar to help the cause. There were 1,284 delegates coming from other states and of these 848 were from the four states of North Dakota, Wisconsin, Iowa and Illinois. Tell us, does it pay?

Could not the B. Y. P. U. of A. spend its time to better advantage in building a careful organization that would link up every last local, and through it build up a feeling of solidarity on the part of our young people? For example, if it could encourage and aid in the organization of state and sectional B. Y. P. U.'s whose officers would be young lay people, and encourage those to keep in touch with associational bodies and the various locals in the state, it could search out and train up a large group of lay leaders for future denominational service as well as stimulate a larger interest in the denominational programs. The great B. Y. P. U. of A. should throw the force of its organization into developing state organizations that could function as such, especially in their summer assemblies and divisional rallies. If the general secretary had the means at hand for calling together the state presidents, he could acquaint them with their task, with each other, and send them back with enthusiasm for their task. He ought also to be able to visit many of them during the year.

Then there ought to be a simple program of work for the local society that each state president could hand on to the locals—a program, in part, of responsibilities to the national organization. An official directory of the societies might be published annually by the secretary's office, having a list of cooperating B. Y. P. U.'s with names and addresses of their officers—meaning by "cooperating" those paying their annual dues and conforming in a few other respects to the national or international standards. This would raise the standard of the local B. Y. P. U.'s, many of which are milling around in aimless circles because of no direction and no idea of what to do. Unless our young people come through their societies with vision and knowledge, ready to go to work with intelligence in the local church and in the denomination, our program fails.

THIS sort of organizational work will not only consume an enormous amount of the general secretary's time, but will, as it grows, necessitate the securing of under-secretaries. The denomination, however, could well afford to pick up some of its promising young men and put them in such positions to train them for other responsibilities. With such a closely knit and functioning organization the general secretary's office could keep the channels to the locals open, and enlist them in such a campaign as THE BAPTIST subscriptions, and would eventually "put over" its tithing campaign more effectively.

We realize that to hold such an organization together some kind of an organ is needed—but the young people's pages of THE BAPTIST are just that! The organization may have from eight to twelve pages a month, which is adequate if properly utilized, and is more than most organizations need monthly for effective service.

These pages, however, must sell themselves to young people of the local societies. Their greatest immediate need is available material on their weekly lesson. A page a week ought to be given to developing the topic in a way that the young people can use it. This is the big need of local young people! The meeting of it will insure THE BAPTIST'S value to them. The other space could be used for news items and personals about B. Y. P. U. locals, officers and events and methods which always make such a page readable and interesting. In this way the pages would have a vital attraction. Given: Appealing pages in THE BAPTIST and an effective group of state organizations that could get to the locals—our young people would show the Methodists a "thing or two" in subscription-getting.

B. Y. P. U. of A.—organize for effective service your great resources of young Baptists! Get to the young people of the locals direct! Make the young people's pages meet the actual needs of young people and you will get results.

Baptist young people, these pages are yours! The paper is yours, for as we seek to lay the foundations of a denominational journal, it is for you who will soon be possessing it. We are building your paper. If only we can get across to you this fact, we feel confident that you, with your "pep" and "go" will Back Your Paper Up!

Chilled

A WYOMING man was the proud owner of a new Ford car, but he knew very little indeed about handling the machine. One winter afternoon, with his wife in the car, he started out on a hundred-mile business trip. Everything went well for the first hour, then the wind began to blow and it began to get rapidly colder. Finally it began to snow. For another hour the machine made headway along the level road in spite of the storm and cold. Then in the gathering darkness the driver saw a long hill ahead. The machine climbed half way up the steep ascent and then it stopped. Backing it down to the bottom of the grade, another attempt was made to go to the top, but that also resulted in failure. So the driver again let the machine back down to the bottom of the hill and there the two people remained for an hour or more with the prospect of freezing to death, for it was growing cold with the passing of time. The machine was in perfect order and there was plenty of gasoline in the tank, but the inexperienced owner could not get it over the hill.

An hour later the lights of another car appeared. To make a long story short—the newcomer was an experienced driver. He asked for a newspaper. When it was produced he put it in front of the radiator and in gallant style the car climbed to the top of the steep hill under the guiding hands of the newcomer. As he jumped out to go back to his own machine he said, "If you'd knowed much you'd oughter know that the thing was just chilled." Chilled! What a simple trouble, and how easily it was cured by one who knew about driving such a machine.

We wonder if the denomination is chilled. Years back it started to climb a steep hill, but has so far been unable to make the climb.

Is it chill that ails many of our local churches, because they also started up the hill, but have in many cases backed down? We fear that many individuals have been chilled, because they too have backed down instead of climbing up to the top.

We suggest the simple remedy that is needed in such a case. We must get fresh hold of God and in the warmth of his presence we shall conquer the chill.

Change the Inside

THE world has a right to expect that the people composing the membership of the church of Jesus Christ should be found exhibiting a type of living and standards of conduct that are above those of any other group of people. The reasons for this are obvious. Church members have voluntarily associated themselves together for the purpose of living unselfishly with and for the Lord Jesus Christ. Why, then, is it that only an inner circle of the members are really seeking and revealing the objectives of Christianity and church membership? The divine institution is not at fault, for its founder and projector was the only wise God, our Father and Lord. The fault, therefore, must be with its human exponents, the men and women in its membership.

Many of our church members are self-deceived because they are unintelligent about what is known as salvation. Salvation is not a single act in life; it is the life itself. The proof that you are saved is revealed by the fruitage produced by your daily life. Salvation is proved more by doing than by saying, by living and not by talking. We shall all make mistakes. We shall all step out of the straight and narrow path at times. But if we are saved, we shall quickly step back where we really belong, to God, and our mistakes will be swallowed up in the sorrow of a heart that knows the power and love of a Saviour's forgiveness. The hope for a better world rests upon the gospel of Jesus Christ. The hope for a conquering Christ-like church membership rests upon the use made of the vital truths of the gospel of Jesus Christ by the whole group. But the whole group will never remove the question mark that the world now has placed against the door of the church until we all more nearly exemplify the teachings of Jesus. The strong in the church must help the weak.

The inner circle must minister to the outer circle of the membership and in consequence must win them to a saved life through the power of the Spirit of God. Let us have a great revival within the church so that we may be better prepared to face our task in the world outside the church.

As Others See Us

"THE readiness with which the Northern Baptist Convention untied the hands of the University of Chicago when it was agreed the university may hereafter choose its president from any denomination was the result of the perception that an institution of that size and character cannot be held down to any particular creed when it chooses its teaching and executive forces.

"Scholarship is not the exclusive possession of any church, and when a university is looking for eminent and learned specialists, it must take them whether they are Christian, Turk or heathen, as the supply is much too small to warrant letting a really good man go. It follows that any great university will have on its faculty representatives of every sort of opinion. It cannot maintain a distinctive character in the religion of its faculty and trying to do so by limiting the choice of president accomplishes nothing.

"But the idea that it was possible to teach Presbyterian chemistry or Baptist biology was a long while dying. Even in the state universities, there was at first a strong tendency to choose clergymen for presidents, and in the early days of the University of Michigan, professorships used to be passed around. If one church grabbed the chair of ancient languages, another claimed history as a matter of right, but the absurdity of that sort of rivalry became apparent at last, and now it is agreed that religion and scholarship come in separate packages."—Editorial Detroit Free Press.

The British Labor Party's Report on the Ruhr

A DELEGATION from the British labor party recently visited Cologne, Dusseldorf, Essen and Bochum to study conditions in the Ruhr. Their conclusions and recommendations are published in the press reports of the International Federation of Trade Unions for May 4 and 11. Their findings, briefly stated, are: Serious as conditions already are, they will become much worse if the French army attempts more drastic measures, such as taking over the railroads or interfering with the liberties of the working-men. In that case there will be either famine or widespread disorder, with a desperate struggle between French soldiers and German civilians. The Versailles treaty does not provide any adequate method of settlement, and a new international instrument should be created with German representatives assisting in its formation. In the meantime the British government should ask both the French and German governments to submit their proposals to an international tribunal.

The British labor party also makes the following suggestions for the solution of the Ruhr problem: 1. A settlement cannot be reached by attempting to dismember Germany or to keep her permanently "in a state of economic vassalage." 2. The total amount of reparations should be fixed at once and international loans secured on German resources floated so that France and Belgium could be paid at once. 3. A special meeting of the League of Nations should be called to admit Germany as a member and to settle questions of national security, debts and indemnities. The British government should be ready to be generous in regard to debts, mandates and forfeited property, both on moral grounds and because present conditions ruin trade, are likely to cause war, and endanger civil liberty and reform. 4. The German proposals offer a basis for negotiation. 5. Troops should be removed from the occupied territory, and, if this is not agreed to, British troops should be withdrawn independently and at once.

A Rocky Road

"FOES of the eighteenth amendment and all other kinds of legislation calculated to abridge 'personal liberty' are finding it hard going these days. Even their few cherished passages from the New Testament are going back on them one by one. With what oily smugness friends of John Barleycorn have been wont to quote First Timothy 5:23: 'Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities.' What further proof was needed that prohibition was un-Christian?

"But now comes along Prof. James Moffatt with his new translation of the New Testament, which an eminent authority has pronounced 'the best translation for the purpose of study and interpretation in the English language today.' In a footnote on page 818, referring to the passage just quoted, Professor Moffatt says: 'The words, "Give up being a total abstainer; take a little water for the sake of your stomach and your frequent attacks of illness," are either a marginal gloss or misplaced.'

"This is terrible! The road back to the good old days of foamy freedom, like the classic thoroughfare to Dublin, gets rockier every minute. The first thing we know booze won't have any religious standing at all. Another argument for abolishing the Higher Critics!"—Universalist Leader.

Was It Daylight Saving Time?

BETWEEN 1650 and 1654, Archbishop Ussher issued his "Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti," in which he published his well known Chronology of the Bible, fixing the date of the creation at 4004 B. C.

This chronology has been added, especially in England, to various editions of the Bible, in which it has no place whatever. It is a man-made intrusion which should be obliterated, and is obliterated from most of our American editions of the Bible.

Dr. John Lightfoot, vice-chancellor of Cambridge, England, was meticulously correct in his chronology, for he said, in 1654: "Heaven and earth, center and circumference, were made in the same instance of time and clouds full of water and man was created by the Trinity on the 26th of October, 4004 B. C., at nine o'clock in the morning."

The Minister as Interpreter

An address delivered at the banquet held in connection with the commencement at Rochester Theological Seminary, May 14.

By Charles N. Arbuckle

LIFE has both its mode and its meaning. There is always a way in which everything comes to pass and there is always a meaning in the fact that it has come to pass. So we say thinking of life's mode, that it needs explanation; and thinking of its meaning, that it needs interpretation. Explanation is a matter of exact knowledge or science; interpretation is a matter of reasonable faith or religion.

Two Separate Disciplines

The processes of explanation and of interpretation are two separate disciplines. They are carried through to their most successful issue only when their difference is clearly recognized and respected. Nevertheless, while they are separate in their processes, they should be one in their sympathy and spirit, for they are both equally concerned in the understanding of the same thing, the life and environment of man. Thus, there should be a scientific spirit in religion and a religious spirit in science—a devotion to truth on the one hand and a passion for the best that can be known on the other. To confuse the disciplines, or to permit the workers in either field to get out of sympathy with the workers in the other field, is to breed misunderstanding, controversy and bitterness, and to obscure the truth which both should seek.

The nineteenth century has often been called the great scientific century. Indeed, it justifies the name, for the most important generalizations in the whole field of science were made in those fruitful years. But it was also, I believe, the great philosophic and religious century, although this may not be so apparent. It was quite natural that the sensational character of the work done in the scientific field should overshadow the more quiet, yet no less important, work done in the field of philosophy. The greatest philosophical achievement of the nineteenth century was the idea of value; that is, that the ultimate test of all philosophical abstractions is their usefulness and significance for man, and that in proportion as they possess these qualities they possess value and reality. This idea discovered by the philosophers had great significance for religion. I have called the nineteenth century a religious century because philosophy then contributed to religion in its doctrine of eternal values a more secure foundation for faith than religion had heretofore possessed. When we thus appraise the achievements of the last century in both of these realms, we begin to discern a fine providence in it all. At the very time when science attempted to explain life in its every aspect—an attempt analytical and of necessity largely destructive—we have springing up at its side another attempt to evaluate life and seek its eternal meaning, a process at once synthetic and constructive. The one would take life apart to see how it was made; the other would put it together to see what it was good for, and in its good discern its value. So we saw value judgments entering into science and scientific explanations entering into religion. Each modified the other.

Analysis and Synthesis

A striking illustration of the constructive and evaluating spirit entering into science is seen in the field of chemistry. Up to the middle of the last century chemists were so absorbed in the destructive or analytical side of their science that they almost completely overlooked the constructive side. Thus they were men of less real vision than their predecessors, the alchemists, who, though lacking in a scientific method, had at least a comprehensive aim, namely, to discern a means for creating an ultimate value. But finally, the French chemist, Berthelot, saw the light and perceived the larger value in what he did and placed a new interpretation upon his work, defining chemistry as "the science of analysis and synthesis," a taking apart and a putting together—taking apart to learn the mode and putting together to discern the value.

In the religious sphere, the critical movement came in and subjected records, forms, ceremonies and human experiences to a terrific analysis and to an inquiry as to how they came to be what they were. Since the critics were dealing with the things that man cherished as essential to his spiritual and immortal well-being, there was at once a loud cry that to deal with these things in this cool and analytical way was to devastate the very temple of God.

World Languishes: We Argue

It was right and well that these records and experiences of the soul's life should be submitted to critical inquiry. The result was to free us from all thraldom to the magical and superstitious, and we could not properly evaluate religious experience until we had been so emancipated. But the sad fact is, in the religious sphere we have been so amazed by the invasion of our realm by the analytical spirit that we have not sustained the synthetic spirit. With the new knowledge that had come, we who represent religion should have made larger appraisals and restated our fundamentals in the terms of eternal values. Instead of doing this, we have been deflected from our real work and confused our disciplines and now are burning up all too much of our creative energy in attacking the new analytic knowledge. In other words, we spend our time upbraiding the scientist instead of preaching the gospel. The result is controversy, confusion, bitterness and a widespread paralysis of creative effort; while the world languishes, we argue.

The minister today must squarely meet this emergency. In a day of analysis he must supply a synthesis. While others "think things apart" to understand how they work and how they came to be what they are, he must "think things together" to show their imperishable value. He must see things in their larger relations and project knowledge upon a wider field of human existence, including not only humanity's past but also humanity's future; he must discover values that analysis can never discount. This is his call. It is for such preaching, affirmative, interpretative and inspiring, that the world is waiting in a controversial age.

Let us look at a few of our major problems for illustration of what I mean. Take first the problem of revelation, a fact which is fundamental to our Christian faith. Revelation is as necessary an idea as that of God himself, for if there be a God at all, he must be able to make himself known. If, possessing the power to reveal himself he refused to do so, he would not be a God of love and an unloving God can never win the devotion that must be at the heart of a true religion. So, when we turn to our scriptures and read, "Thus saith the Lord," we find there just what we are sure must be the fact.

But now arises the insistent question, "How did God speak?" We turn to the man schooled in the discipline of determining causal connections, the analyst, to tell us. We are told that there was nothing magical about it and nothing strange — save as the workings of all great minds are strange to little minds. Men who gave themselves exclusively to reflecting upon the things with which revelation is concerned divined the truth, not all at once, but line upon line, here a little and there a little, interpreting life always from the best they knew into the better toward which their hearts and their needs were driving them. It was a human process, they tell us, the records stained with slips and follies, and yet, marvel of marvels, disclosing to man in ever-increasing measure a God glorious in wisdom and incomparable in love. Speaking of the mode, we call it discovery; speaking of the eternal worth, we call it revelation.

Gloss and Glory

It is true that some have been so eager in their search for the human that they have missed the divine. They have been more devoted to the "gloss" than to the glory, discrepancy hounds," satisfied with inconsistencies and blunders. But there are others who are all the more certain that God has spoken because his children have discerned him and to be really a child, one must recognize one's parent.

The call of our time is for the interpreter more than for the analyst; for one who can "think things together" in their largest meanings. The minister of today must know the findings of the analyst, place the records in the perspective of history and, reading them in the light of the perfect life in Christ, he must interpret their eternal values to the people. He may and ought to see more in these old records than the men who wrote them saw. The centuries of human experience should illumine them. When an enthusiastic teacher of English literature was interpreting a play of Shakespeare to his class and deriving meanings from it that were not apparent on the surface of the text, a student broke in to ask, "Did Shakespeare mean all that?" The teacher wisely replied, "It is not a question of what Shakespeare meant, but of what Shakespeare means." This is the need of our day in interpreting the records of our faith—not alone to tell what the Bible meant in the minds of those who wrote it, but what the Bible means in the horoscope of centuries of human experience. For instance, there is in the eleventh chapter of the Gospel of John an account of the raising to life of a man three days dead and buried in his tomb. We are all aware of the many critical questions that crowd about this narrative, but what the world today is waiting for is not a more erudite discussion of these questions; it looks rather for an interpretation of the spiritual necessity in man that for nineteen hundred years has kept the record there and an interpretation of the hunger of soul for such a Christ as could say, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he die, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." There is real evidence in the nature and needs of man for the necessity of such a revelation, and stricken folk everywhere want to be assured of it.

SO gentle were His ways with us,
That crippled souls had ceased to sigh;
On them He laid His hands, and thus
They gloried at His passing by.

Without reproof or word of blame,
As mothers do in childhood's years,
He kissed our lips in spite of shame,
And stayed the passage of our tears.

So tender was His love to us,
(We had not learned to love before),
That we grew like to Him, and thus
Men sought His grace in us once more.

The words of Jesus have been weighed and sifted and measured and classified, but now we need to proclaim what they mean; to make the larger applications and generalizations that a world like ours demands of Christ and to show that he has a meaning for us today. If we continue to quarrel over subsidiary questions of how the revelation came to be, we shall miss the revelation itself. To determine its mode, is the work of science; to determine its meaning, is the work of religion.

"What Is Man?"

Perhaps there is no question more deeply agitating the church today than "What is man?" If we would propound the question in the fullness with which the psalmist propounded it, and inquire, "What is man that thou art mindful of him?" we should have in the asking of the question the clue to its answer. Standing out under the deep blue skies of a Syrian night with the lights of other worlds twinkling above him, feeling his own smallness in the presence of immensity, yet remembering that God was mindful of him, he found the answer to his question, "What is man?": "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels."

In what contrasting fashion do we seek the answer to this question in the western world today. "What is man?" We do not go out under the stars for our answer, but into the laboratory. We give the inquirer an oyster and a microscope, a dead cat and a scalpel. In the intricacies of biology he finds his answer, "Thou hast made him a little higher than the creatures." The laboratory has made its contribution and it is a worthy one; it has yielded us knowledge that makes it possible to alleviate human pain and to understand the complexity of human life. Where the minister of today frequently goes astray, however, is in forsaking the stars for the scalpel. He follows the scientist into the laboratory to quarrel with him, forgetting that the question asked under the stars is not the same as that asked in the laboratory, though the two may sound alike. "What is man?" asked in the laboratory means, "What is the mode of his being?" "What is man?" asked out under the stars means, "What is the meaning of his being?" Let us remember that the revelation of the stars is in no wise discredited by the findings of the laboratory. We are in controversy over this question today because the minister has in all too many instances forsaken the ministry of the word to serve dissecting tables. He forgets that the meaning of man does not depend upon the mode of his being. We are what we are regardless of how we came to be what we are. A process must always be judged by its issue, not its origin. If it could be proved that my remote ancestors once lived in the branches of the banyan tree, I should not be in the least disturbed; in fact, with all modesty, I should feel inclined to congratulate them on their posterity. But I know that the remote question of origins cannot obscure the fact that there is an immeasurable distance between me and the beasts; a distance that may be indicated by the very fact that I go out and look at the stars and inquire into the meaning of my life, while no beast ever even looks at the stars, much less inquires about the nature of his being. The touch of God is on the soul in its hunger for God and its aspiration for his likeness and its concern for its destiny and nothing can diminish this fact. We are here and we would do better to stop quarreling as to whence we came. About that, we can do nothing, regardless of the eventual findings. Let us rather give ourselves to deep reflection as to whither we are bound, for about this we can do a great deal.

In the great concern of the person of Jesus, there is also a territory where discussion is sterile and unprofitable to the earnest seeker for religious truth. There he stands in all his supernal beauty. His majesty, his divinity, his unsurpassed loveliness, are attested in a thousand ways. Every day he has a fresh value for uncounted thousands of souls. Men want to know with all their hearts what he is and what he can mean to them. These things the interpreter must tell them. To spend our time endeavoring to explain how he came to be what he was in his earthly life, is to confuse our disciplines and to desert the calling of the interpreter for that of the biologist. There he stands, the power of God unto salvation to all who believe on him. The people want to know what he means—they are languishing to hear it and it is good news.

This is a great day for the minister who is an interpreter, who comes bearing testimony to the eternal values. But let him be watchful always that he does not lose his chance by burning up his creative energies in a heat of controversy over things that do not and never possibly can affect the eternal values. If ever he confuses life's mode with life's meaning, his message will blur, great insights will be inhibited and large interpretations impossible. God will lose his man.

I believe with all my heart in the living Christ and that he speaks through his servants to the people of today. It cannot be that he has changed his message since those sunny days when he walked in Galilee. He speaks the same things now. When one came to him and asked for an explanation, saying, "How can these things be?" he showed him that was not the issue. The issue then and now is, "What will you do with your life that is so precious?" So he spake to a sinful woman, saying, "Go and sin no more." To an imperfect world he said, "Be perfect"; to a restless world, "Come unto me and I will give you rest"; to the sorrowing," I will not leave you comfortless." What do these mean? What is all this worth? The minister, Christ's interpreter, must say.

The Bible in Baptist Colleges

By Roy L. VanDeman

NOWHERE does it have a better right to be. But what may we expect of it there? The young people who are in these schools are eighteen to twenty-two years old. What are their religious needs and how well may Bible courses in the curriculum meet these needs?

An Idealist

A youth or maiden of eighteen will never again be at a place where high idealism will create a stronger appeal. Of what age were the bulk of the early volunteers in 1917? From what age does the appeal for a Christian life service decision get the greatest audience? From whom does the kingdom of God as Jesus drew its commanding lines, elicit quickest allegiance? And who more than a college youth needs that elevation of heart which devotion to such a cause can bring that he may be lifted out of petty politics and sordid ambition? There is much truth in saying that the world is decided in the freshman year.

The whole impact of the social drive is being gathered now, much as Arnold von Winkelried with outstretched arms gathered the enemies' steel into his own body to open a way for his comrades. The questions of campus morality are up. The group ideals of class and fraternity are almost superhuman in their power. The problem of a vocation presses. Likely as not some sex standard or choice has to be made before the year is up. The whole social world faces me when I am old enough to be in college. My attitudes to the industrial problem and the race problem and the wealth problem are being taken. I am a citizen in the making—almost made. Haven't you anything authoritative for me in the Gospels?

Religious Bible Study

There he stands. Can we make one of his first college discoveries Jesus? Why start him either with Genesis or Deuteronomy? And why make the Bible get down and go on all fours as history, law, poetry and prophecy when the Bible as history and literature, however accurately or modernly told, is no more than our pedagog's chance to bring him to Christ? To discover in his new Bible that the winsome and appealing comrade is also wise beyond books and regal in his grasp of the principles by which society is to unbound, will be a discovery premier. Can we let him make it? What is the gain if one know all Latin and all mathematics and be able to pass fine semester examinations in geology and the modern languages and miss his own Christ? The argument is all on the side of having the Bible as a primarily religious book at the head of the corner in the curriculum of a Christian college. All the more if the college represents the sowing of Baptist churches long ago and hopes to make a contribution to the democracy of Christ in the present century.

The Fathers

How far does the present program go toward carrying out the original purposes of the founders of our colleges? The fine idealism and far-sighted Christian patriotism of the men who wrought the foundation of these older schools out of their meager means deserves and shall always deserve the respect and admiration of our youth. Who among us would have had higher purposes or sacrificed more to mark out the foundations of these schools? To us of the present and the future has been given the charge of bringing the plan to its maturity.

Instead of the Fathers, Your Children

To our hand are helps and forces of which the fathers did not dream. Alongside the church colleges in the American system of public education are lower schools furnishing a stream of increasing students trained to high educational standards. Above these the higher state schools are not the enemies of the Christian colleges but their challenge and stimulus. We should make the most of it.

There is a wealth of material resource now in the hands of the sons and sons' sons of these Christian colleges which makes possible any program conceived in terms however large. A policy without backward look or fearful anticipation but big, commanding and promising successful contribution to the present crisis of the moral world, will attract the attention and enlist the business respect and Christian judgment of men of resource. It will attack the educational allegiance of the best trained Christian minds of our time. What right have we to permit the best educational scientists to remain outside our Christian departments of religious education? Any program can be executed if it is bold enough and big enough.

A Lofty Ideal Not Yet Realized

The original outline of program was big enough only in principle. And it is being filled in too feebly by our colleges when only one man on the faculty of a one-unit 500-student college represents the interests of Christian education in the primary subject of religion. To carry out the present-day implications of the original objectives of these schools requires a program calling for the time of two instructors to develop the essential courses in religious education, including those in the Bible.

As for the Christian flavor and bias of the thing that is being done, the high purposes of founders are being fulfilled. The men and women who have taught these Bible courses and teach them now, are as much above reproach for Christian sincerity of life as are the instructors in other departments. In the instructors employed this year the colleges betray no failure to sense the present necessity of the forward look in Christian education.

Present-Day Needs

But how far does the present program go to meet present-day needs? Only a part of the way.

There is no more tangible expression of the deepest religious needs of the present day than in the moral disintegration of men and families since the war and in that new self-consciousness which has marked the social organism since the later years of the nineteenth century. This was the time when the colleges began to mobilize for biblical instruction. They might have been forgiven at the hands of their children had they welcomed then, with prophetic eyes, the moral and social interpretations of the gospel of Christ as they first began dimly to be apprehended. As it was and is, only a fraction of that vision has even now been welcomed. We follow instead of lead, and with too faltering steps. Our students and the moral-social claims upon them have been multiplied ten times. How big shall our program be?

Looking Ahead

How far then should our modern Christian college program change from or outrun the original purposes of founders? As far as Christ calls by all the voices of the present. The very investment of pioneer sacrifice and the sacred inheritance of the influence product of generations of devoted teachers now gone, call us not to retread their paths, but to emulate their zeal and faith by making new paths for a new and perplexed generation. The present leadership owes it to its present youth to lead face forward, unafraid of evolution, science, socialism or education, caring for nothing but truth and fearing only God.

If to any institution in the kingdom of Christ, to a Christian college it is given to see accurately the needs of the present world and to visualize those of the generation to come. To no other department of these colleges is accredited such opportunity to review the age-long residua of religious experience and to mediate them to its students as comes to the biblical department. It is the normal function of these schools and courses to lead rather than to follow in the accurate statement and in the Christian liquidation of our social-religious and moral-religious needs. To prophecy it is given to see. The Bible courses in a Christian college are, and of right ought to be, not only cultural, historical and scientific, but essentially prophetic.

> ALL the world is God's own field,
> Fruit unto his praise to yield;
> Wheat and tares together sown,
> Unto joy or sorrow grown:
> First the blade, and then the ear,
> Then the full corn shall appear;
> Lord of harvest, grant that we
> Wholesome grain and pure may be.

Recommendations

What recommendations could be made in view of such facts and principles?

That in our colleges, most of which are, or are likely soon to be, in the one-unit class or above, we maintain a department of religion of religious education or of Christian education in which for each 500 students two professors be at work, one with major preparation in Bible, minor in religious education; the other with major in religious education, minor in Bible; the equipment of these instructors, professional, technical and Christian, to be at least as complete as that of the best prepared professors on the staff; that the standards of efficiency, difficulty and credit in the courses of this department be equal to those of any other department; that there be maintained a well-equipped modern library of reference; that we provide a policy whereby the instructors should be expected to employ each Sabbatic year, salary continued, in research and production, thus capitalizing the gains of experience for the benefit of the entire program of religious education.

Not in Word, But in Power

Abstract of Address at the Northern Baptist Convention, Atlantic City, May 23, 1923

By A. A. Shaw

THE words of the topic assigned to me seem to express a false antithesis. Is there not power in a word? To the ancients there surely was.

Is not the gospel "the good news, the power of God?" How shall the kingdom come by the word? "How shall they hear without a preacher?" Was not Jesus the Eternal Word made flesh?

But words have a way of losing their power. They become like empty shells, now used for lamp stands and doorstones, for decoration or as souvenirs. The name of Jesus comes to be used by men as though he were only a kindly and good man offering casual advice. The word "cross" is used to decorate one's speech very much as the cross itself, wrought in silver or gold or ivory, is used to adorn the persons of those who may have no experience of what the cross signifies.

Greek culture of the first century was all on the surface. It was with this situation in mind that Paul wrote to the Corinthians: "God's reign does not show itself in clever and eloquent talk, but in power." The kingdom is not a new rhetoric, a new philosophy, a new and more clever way of saying words, but a new dynamic. In terms of our day, he would say, the kingdom is not a new map of the world, but a new world spirit; not primarily a new social order, but a new world atmosphere, in which social structures may grow and decay and grow again. And the kingdom comes not by devising new schemes and clever phrases and vivid catalogs, but by the discovery, the release and the control of the power of the Eternal Spirit.

Our Noisy Age

In our noisy age, it is well to remember that power does not lie in the word. We have too often assumed that we could today storm Satan's hold by the blowing of trumpets, that the greatest energy lies with the most energetic. But the power of the babbling brook is slight. It is in the quiet pond that we see the hiding of the stream's power. The brook is but merely the noisy overflow of its silent strength.

In recent years we are brought face to face with yet more prodigious and incredible sources of noiseless energy. In radium, for instance: It is estimated that it will take 20,000 years for a given gram of radium to release its energy and revert to common lead. "If we could find a way to get a gram of radium to discharge in one minute all the energy it will eventually discharge in 20,000 years, there would be sufficient power in one gram to raise out of the water all the dreadnaughts in all the navies of the world."

Even ordinary inert matter is a source of incredible energy. Professor Le Bon shows that the smallest French copper coin "contains energy equal to eighty million horse-power."

Now what is true in the physical is also true in the moral and spiritual world. The kingdom of God is not a big noise: it is the majestic and largely silent movement of divine Omnipotence through the arteries of human life. The kingdom of God is helped on its progress, not by artificial stimulation, not by the creation of machinery adapted to theatrical tornados or electric storms; but by tempering and reshaping and readapting the human mechanism so as to harmonize with and utilize the Divine energy—waiting only for such opportunity.

Let us think of the relation of this thought to some phase of our work.

What will it mean to us who preach? The first Christian preachers preached because they could not help it. "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel," one of the greatest declared for them all. They were prophets, spokesmen for the Divine Spirit. Paul declared to the Corinthians that he went among them not with persuasive human logic, but in demonstration of spiritual power.

The complaint of our Lord made against the scribes and Pharisees was that they had become mere "actors," saying words that meant nothing in their lives. This is a perpetual peril to the preacher. How often do we catch ourselves choosing words because of their effect, using tones—that once indeed voiced deep emotion, but now used again and again, because they "work," simulating an emotion that is not real!

Fluency, glibness, the ability to turn clever phrases, to rise easily to oratorical flights and make an impressive climax—what dangerous gifts these are! It is so easy to allow them to replace diligent toil and genuine emotion! But the kingdom is not in words—however clever, or impressive—but in power. And when we think of our churches, how we need to remind ourselves that power is not in our programs or in our machinery or in our campaigns of evangelism, but in the double contact of its members with the source of eternal power and with sin-sick men around them. Jesus, at his baptism, prayed, "and as He prayed, heaven opened." There lay the secret of his power.

The Vision

And there is our work of education. How profoundly important it is! Man is the only animal that cannot live on things as they are. He is the only animal that can see what is not. He needs an imagination that sees not only material values that are not, but moral and spiritual values. The war came because material and intellectual progress had far out-stripped moral and spiritual progress. To regain balance, to organize and direct human life to beneficent ends requires skilled leaders with a moral sense and moral vision. And that is the task of Christian education. To train and send out into the leadership of democracy young men and women with a kindling vision of an integrated humanity and a consuming passion to help realize it; it is for that we create and maintain our schools. To train young people to remember and to repeat correct forms of words will not suffice. They must see Christ's kingdom, they must share his passion, they must believe in him and in their mission profoundly, or they have failed utterly however glibly they may recite the words of our beliefs.

Paul wrote to these same Corinthians "Ye may have ten thousand teachers but ye have not many fathers." He was their teacher, too, but he was the kind of teacher who brought men to moral and spiritual rebirth.

I have a vivid picture in my memory of two teachers of my boyhood days. From one, a well of accurate information, I drew some scraps of knowledge. From the other, a vivid fountain of inspiration, I learned what life meant and caught a desire to share its secrets and to serve its purposes.

I am sure I do not need to enlarge on the application of this truth to our missionary endeavor. We may find difficult to convince the Orient of the superiority of our modern culture to their ancient culture. In fact, they feel competent to develop a modern culture and modern customs in harmony with their historic genius. But we can take to them what they consciously lack, a living and loving God in Jesus Christ and a moral and spiritual dynamic without which their advancing civilization will only mock their best endeavors. In the new pentecost of the nations, every nation under heaven will hear Christ speak to them in their own language wherein they were born.

Words of Strength

THERE are three lessons I would write,
Three words, as with a burning pen,
In tracings of eternal light,
Upon the hearts of men.

Have hope. Though clouds environ now,
And gladness hides her face in scorn,
Put thou the shadow from thy brow—
No night but has its morn.

Have faith. Where'er thy bark is driven,
The calm's disport, the tempest's mirth—
Know this—God rules the hosts of heaven,
The inhabitants of earth.

Have love. Not love alone for one,
But man as man thy brother call,
And scatter like the circling sun
Thy charities on all.

Thus 'grave these lessons on thy soul,
Hope, Faith and Love, and thou shalt find
Strength when life's surges rudest roll,
Light when thou else wert blind.

—Frederick Schiller.

Perhaps a word should be spoken concerning our hope for social reconstruction. Here perhaps more than in any other field we incline to trust in words. A clever phrase seems to many a door of hope. A biting epithet is trusted to destroy the strongholds of privilege. An alluring prospectus seems already to have created a new heaven and a new earth.

The greatest dreamer of all coined a phrase, baptized it in his own blood and left it as the watchword of his church: "The kingdom of God." But he did more than coin the phrase, more than repeat the phrase. He embodied the kingdom. The kingdom of God became flesh and dwelt among men. And he died to achieve it. And if we hope to see the kingdom of God realized in the social fabric, it will not come by vain repetition of Jesus' word, but by the incarnation of his Spirit.

Some time ago a religious writer coined the stinging phrase: "The public impotence of the Christian religion." It is closely related to the retort attributed to Mr. Chesterton when the remark was made that in the outbreak of the World War Christianity had been tried and found wanting. "No," the retort came, "it has not been tried and found wanting; it has been found difficult and not tried." There is enough truth in these remarks to stab our spirits broad awake to the fact that most of us had believed in the efficacy of the gospel of the kingdom to redeem and show the way for the individual, but had failed to believe in its power to redeem and point the way for humanity.

Professor Glover quotes the words of the dying Alexander when his guards asked what should be done with his empire: "To the strongest." Whose shall be this vast empire of humanity in the surging midst of which you and I live and die? It does not suffice to say, "To the Lamb that sitteth upon the throne—to him be the majesty and the power and the dominion."

He is the strongest. This tragic world of sinning, suffering humanity belongs to him. He has power to redeem it. But let me say it, reverently, but bluntly, he cannot redeem it alone. His omnipotence waits on our impotence. As in the days of his flesh, he could do not mighty work in Nazareth because of their unbelief, so today, he is impotent, until we believe in him! His extremity is our opportunity. The psalmist cried: "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power. . ." That is the need of the hour, a glad, hearty, all surrendering faith, the very contagion of which will help to turn the thoughts of men back to God.

A friend of mine made a trip to the far North last summer, visiting the northern extremity of Spitzbergen, well within the Arctic Circle. He told of the coal mines of the far North land, mines being worked to furnish fuel for Norway. Do you catch the significance of that fact: Great coal deposits under the perpetual snow and ice of the Arctic Circle? It means that once upon a time the Arctic Circle was within the tropics. Instead of snow and ice and occasional moss-covered rocks, with here and there a stunted tree, there once existed forests of palm trees and all the light and warmth and color, all the mystery and wealth of tropical life. And what happened? By slow degrees, through long ages the polar axis shifted steadily, fell away from the sun, and gradually the genial warmth of the sun was withdrawn and frost and icy winds took its place, and for tropical luxuriance there came arctic poverty. But before this took place a giant hand rent the earth asunder and buried deep in its hot depths that rich and abundant vegetation, so that in future years men, in the midst of cold and desolation, might see the glory that once had been. Perhaps in some future age the reverse process may take place and once more the Arctic may become the Tropic. If some majestic power could tilt the earth's polar axis back again toward the sun, this would follow.

It is possible to erect greenhouses, to build fires, and to raise rare and beautiful plants in an alien climate. But this will not suffice.

The kingdom of God, if I read it aright, is nothing short of this: to swing back the polar axis of human life until the whole climate changes, and a new and more genial atmosphere is created in which all the wealth of Christian verdure and fruitage shall be native in human life.

Not in word, but in power? O, but there is word that has power! "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for it is he that shall save. When in the desperation of our conscious need, when in the glad abandon of an heroic common faith, we invoke that name—what power there is in it!

Religious and Moral Training for Soldiers

AT the recent conference on religious and moral training for soldiers at the National Museum, Washington, D. C., General Pershing said, in part, as follows:

"More than eight years ago it was my pleasure to call together the chaplains of the Eighth Brigade, then serving in the vicinity of El Paso, Texas, the purpose being 'To consider ways and means through which the chaplains may cooperate in the entertainment, improvement and moral uplift of the command.' That was the first chaplains' conference of which the war department has record.

"During the world war, the need of the services of chaplains overseas was early recognized and the numbers of chaplains for duty with troops was materially increased. Their usefulness in the maintenance of morale through religious counsel and example has now become a matter of history and can be accepted as having demonstrated, if need be, the wisdom of the religious appeal to the soldier.

"As a consequence the efficiency program of the army has taken the religious element more deeply into account, and the force of spiritual uplift has been given larger consideration. In this endeavor, the army recalls the admonition of its first commander-in-chief, than whom none was ever in better position to give counsel, to 'indulge with caution the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion.'

"While recognizing that all forms of military training have in them certain elements of moral instruction, religion contains the secret of and impetus toward clean living. Therefore a steady effort is made to put the hearts of men into right relation to God.

"Soldiers readily see the difference between that effort which is religion pure and undefiled and that which merely seeks sectarian advantage. They are quick to recognize a positive and practical appeal to those in need of spiritual guidance, and they have little time or sympathy for those who indulge in unbrotherly denunciation of others who seek the same God through different forms of faith, expression and relationship.

"The definite responsibility for matters of a religious and moral nature within a command devolves upon the commanding officers as completely as do strictly military matters. The chaplain is a religious specialist on the staff of the commanding officer and is charged with the details of this work. He must minister, so far as practicable, to the needs of the entire personnel of the command to which he is assigned, either through his own personal services or through the cooperative effort of others. He is enjoined to enlist the active aid and cooperation of such military and civilian assistants, both lay and clerical, as the needs of the command may require.

"The position of a chaplain is unique. He is rightfully a commissioned officer, yet without command. On this score no question of authority brings him into rivalry with any other officer. He may be welcomed alike by general, second lieutenant or private without any seeming inconsistency of association, if only he has the power of making himself personally or socially agreeable or useful. He can be among the enlisted men in a confidential relationship, as one entirely in sympathy with them, without any thought on the part of either that he is stepping out of his sphere. In this a chaplain has a position unlike that of any other person in the army. A position of marvelous possibilities and opportunities. It is his own fault if he does not avail himself of it and improve its advantage.

"On the theory that unsupervised operatives are never effective, chaplains are now under professional supervision through the office of the chief of chaplains. They have a head to whom they may look for suggestion and stimulation in their work.

"In keeping with all other branches of the military service a chaplains' school has been established where training is given in those subjects which are not presented in any curriculum in previous schooling. It is essential to military service and adaptability that chaplains have a thorough knowledge of army customs and courtesies, army regulations, approved methods for practical work in field and garrison, equitation and topography applied to graves registration work.

"Following a well considered plan of the war department the chief of chaplains has made visitations to camps, posts and stations for the purpose of strengthening local programs and has held conferences with line officers, chaplains and civilians with a view to increasing interest in the spiritual life of the commands. Good results have followed."

The Baptist World Alliance and World Education

"Go with mean people and you think life is mean. Then read Plutarch, and the world is a proud place, peopled with men of positive quality."

By W. Scott

I HAVE met while in Europe during the past year and a half leading Baptist representatives, especially in London, Paris and Rome, who referred to the approaching meeting of the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm, Sweden, and I have urged upon them the desirability of giving serious consideration to the subject of the extension of right education to all mankind, universal or world education.

May I respectfully state the grounds for such urgency, also why I think the Baptist denomination has a peculiar opportunity and duty in this connection?

Education broadly interpreted is the child of the religious conviction diffused throughout society. Limiting ourselves for the moment to the United States, the United States education report of a recent year gives 493 colleges and universities supported as follows: Religious denominations, 316; non-sectarian, 84; state, 88; unclassified, 5. It may be shown also that the origin of state and other institutions rests chiefly on a Christian attitude toward education.

Popular Education

The recognition of education as a function of the modern democratic state is an impressive fact, especially in the United States. Leading governments also the world over pursue a policy of popular education. The reasons for such a policy are familiar and need not be named here. The progress of popular education during the past half century and less is a modern miracle. Take two examples: When I prepared for college over fifty years ago there was not, so far as I know, a high school in the United States as we now understand the term. Academies, private schools and tutors were, however, doing a valuable service as they are still doing. The secondary school system has arisen during this period. It is one of the wonders of the world in the magnitude of its work, its expenditure and usefulness. Many universities now among the leading universities of the world have been founded during this period. In 1889, thirty-four years ago, when I left New York City there was no public library in the present sense in the city. The Astor and Lenox libraries were limited in their use, the Tilden foundation came later, Mr. Carnegie had not begun his great career of library philanthropy. Today the New York library system in extent, resources and public service has no superior in the world.

To indicate the course of this vast educational movement in the United States in the recent past is beyond my purpose. The Morrill Act came in 1866. It established a college in every state of the union. The late President E. B. Andrews called it "the greatest single piece of educational legislation in the history of civilization." A remarkable extension of education in Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines has occurred since 1900. Other important educational events are embraced in this same period. Of late years federal legislation to extend education to all nations by international cooperation has been proposed, as Pan-American cooperation, a world congress on education, the Keyes-Gillett bill for the world wide extension of education by international cooperation. When all criticisms on popular education are considered, it remains that the American people are convinced that on the whole the movement is fundamental to the safety, order and progress of the country, and its further extension and improvement are necessary. It is a surprising thing that no theological school, so far as I know, has given adequate place to this modern miracle. Hence clerical criticisms of general education often lack constructive value and a grasp of the situation.

During this same period, as might be expected, philanthropy, vitalized by the Christian spirit, has effected education in the nation and beyond in the world field. There is a long and splendid list of benefactors to this cause in the United States, dating from Peabody's great fund for southern education after the Civil War to the Rockefeller world fund of today. Voluntaryism in one respect has an advantage over national action. The latter with vaster resources is yet confined to national territory; the former with more limited means has a world field. It is a pioneer, a torchbearer in mental and moral progress. In this larger area, extensive as the human race, some philanthropists and religious bodies have entered. This story is profoundly impressive and its supreme value will be better understood as time passes. I heard an agricultural engineer from India under the auspices of an American society who seemed to me to be thinking intelligently of greater things than many other men conspicuous in public view, so of the medical missionary and the missionary teacher. They bring us face to face with One who "went about doing good," whose work is limited to no country or age, a divine Teacher who moves through the centuries.

It should be noted that in 1914 the United States called a world congress on education to meet at The Hague but the world war broke out that year and prevented the meeting. That call has been somewhat forgotten because of the colossal tragedy of war but in due time its importance will be felt. It was the first time in history when a great nation has issued a call to other nations to come together to deliberate upon the proper interpretation and extension of education to all nations. The program proposed and the preliminary discussions are too extensive to be given here. What is to be noted is the effect of the call, indicating that the United States which has done much for the education of the people has the conviction that right education is fundamental for the world, that it should be coterminous with the race and that the issue is a world issue.

Educational World Conference

Every citizen, especially every Christian citizen, should also note that the National Education Association of the United States, the largest educational body in existence, has a world conference on education at Oakland, Cal, on June 28—July 6 of this year. It is to be hoped it may be followed by similar conferences in every great city of the world. Surely while the destructive forces of nations are in evidence and the heart of humanity is broken by deep plowing great events and new departtures, big with promise for all nations, may also come.

A word as to Baptists and world education. John Foster, a Baptist preacher of England—a contemporary of Robert Hall, William Casey, and Andrew Fuller—in 1819 issued a plea to the governing classes of England to give to the masses the rudiments of education. This antedated public elementary education in England. The plea is historic, for Foster wielded a powerful pen and PROFESSOR Johan Albrecht Bengal was a teacher in the seminary at Denkendorf in the eighteenth century. He united profound reverence for the Bible with an acuteness which let nothing escape him. The seminary students used to wonder at the great intellectuality and great humility and Christliness which blended into beauty in him. One night one of them, eager to learn the secret of his holy life, slipped up into his apartment while the professor was out lecturing in the city and hid himself behind the heavy curtains in the deep recesses of the old-fashioned window. Quite a while he waited until he grew weary. At length he heard the steps in the hall and waited breathlessly to learn the coveted secret. The man came in, changed his shoes for slippers, and sitting down at the study table opened the old well-thumbed Bible and began reading leisurely, page by page. A half hour he read, three-quarters of an hour, an hour, and more yet, then leaning down on his hand for a few minutes in silence, he said in the simplest, most familiar way, "Well, Lord Jesus, we are on the same old terms. Good night." If we might live like that! Jesus to him was the revelation of God. As the day goes on its busy round, sometimes put your hand in his and say, "Let us keep on good terms, Lord Jesus," and when eventide comes, go off alone with him for a quiet look into his face in reverence, with a sense of mystery. Such a life will receive new power and be fragrant with the presence of God.—Arthur T. Fowler.

Make Our Schools Safe

An address given at the Pre-Convention Conference on Christian Fundamentals

By Mrs. John H. Chapman

THE limited time allowed for the discussion of the very important topic given to me necessitates the exclusion of argument or demonstration and I shall, therefore, confine myself to a few simple statements and these, I well know, may be rejected by many of you. I am also well aware that the right of one without academic accomplishment to speak at all upon such a topic may well be questioned. My reply is that I claim the right of the possessor of a diamond to question the methods of the diamond cutter.

If you take the precious children we have borne to shape and mould their thinking, you must forgive our earnest interest in the ideals you place before them.

Danger in All Schools

My topic presupposes danger in our schools. Speaking to this thought, I would remind you that danger waits at the entrance to any school of any grade, in every age—from the time our little four-year-olds enter the kindergarten and discover that father and mother are not omniscient as they are taught to sing "Twinkle, twinkle little star—how I wonder what you are," on through the grades to the place where the half-grown boy glibly tells you all about it, in a worldily constructed sentence—and on again to where the aged scientist looking through the telescope at the myriads of whirling planets, finds his powers of comprehension exhausted and bows his head again to whisper the babies' song—"Twinkle, twinkle little star, how I wonder what you are."

What mother who has led forth, as I have done, little ones from the protected walls of home to the democracy of our public schools, has not trembled at the thought of the unpleasant truths that will come to them—the hitherto unheard language of the street that must greet their ears.

How well I remember the egotistical and ungrammatically expressed conclusion of my second little son after a few weeks of experience in school. He and his brother Harry had been told to avoid the companionship of boys who used profane language. After rejecting one and another otherwise attractive child, he came to me in despair and said: "Mother we cannot play with James, he swears; we cannot play with Robert, he swears; there aren't any good boys only just 'cept Harry and me."

It was no light task to bear, as every mother must bear, the presence of outside evil which we may not control and which still has an almost equal chance with your own best teaching to influence your child's life and character.

I stand firmly for the democracy of the public school, for the mingling of high and low, rich and poor, well taught and poorly taught; for I believe the discipline of character that comes to us all in seeing evil and learning to avoid it, in choosing right when wrong is both popular and attractive, is the foundation of the strength of character that makes our republic the greatest nation on the earth.

However, we all believe that the source of evil has much to do with its potency. Whatever we are willing to bear from the school companions of our children, not for one hour would we bear with the same evils existent in the teachers of our children.

The Teacher's Influence

One of the most beautiful things in the school life of our children is the love and reverence the child gives to its teacher. In my own home where there are three little grandchildren, every flower that grows in the garden, every picture that the children love, every toy or garment or new possession of any kind awakens the pleading: "May I take this to my teacher?" "May I show this to teacher?" As the years advance, whatever of repression the youth may acquire, there is still that idealizing of standards presented by the teacher that is an extension of, and means even more than, the childish adoration of early years.

Do not blame us then, if we ask that these who occupy this important place in our children's lives, should in some way represent the ideals we wish our children to emulate.

Academic Freedom

Much has been said of academic freedom. The teacher must not be hampered in the expression of the conclusions which he reaches.

If it were not true that we, a body of people by the world called "Baptists" had reached conclusions different from the views of the world at large, we would not need to support schools of our own. State universities, undenominational colleges, union seminaries, would be all-sufficient to train in secular learning and in Bible knowledge.

It is because we have believed that we were the custodians of truth, important enough to have separated us in church fellowship from our best loved ones, that we exist as a denomination. It is because these truths could be best inculcated during the receptive years of school and college life that we have builded our schools and colleges.

LORD, who am I to teach the way
To little children day by day,
So prone myself to go astray?

I teach them knowledge, but I know
How faint they flicker and how low
The candles of my knowledge glow.

I teach them love for all mankind
And all God's creatures, but I find
My love comes lagging far behind.

Lord, if their guide I still must be,
Oh let the little children see
The teacher leaning hard on thee.

Every dollar we have given to found or to support these schools is a testimony of our recognition of the influence of educational institutions, and we have a right to say that they shall strengthen, not weaken, our Baptist position.

Scholarship is only safe when it walks in the light of faith. I dare not take time to illustrate this point farther than to say Germany was the Mecca of scholars until 1914, and yet she led her people to the awful chaos that prevails today and brought upon the world the most calamitous war that history records.

The Preparation of Moses

The great Creator has recognized both the power and the limitation of the power of scholarship in preparing Moses for his task of leadership. Moses dwelt amid the culture of the palace and his lips were pressed to the fountain of Egypt's learning, but when he had finished his course, he was sent away into the quiet of the desert; there to bow before the burning bush, the symbol of God's presence and by its light, his life work was accomplished.

More than I can express, do I regret the fact that the controversy that has arisen in our denomination has seemed to array faith and scholarship in antagonism. We who stand by the Bible as our only rule of faith and practice are not to blame for this.

Such expressions as the one that I shall quote, written by a professor in one of our Baptist theological schools must bear the responsibility for the unfortunate misunderstanding. I am quoting his words, as printed in his own book: "There is no educated man living who believes the Bible from cover to cover. There is no half-educated man who believes the Bible in this way. No man can make such a profession sincerely unless he has escaped education altogether."

Over against this very careless statement, I will say: "For every educated man who does not believe the Bible, I will bring you one hundred uneducated scoffers, quite as scornful of its sacred pages. And for every ignoramus who loudly proclaims his faith in its jots and tittles, I will name you a cultured scholar who loves and reveres its every teaching."

Let us be fair in our differences. If the colleges founded by men of faith, because of their faith were closed, most of you would be mourning your alma mater.

The carnal heart of the scholarly and the ignorant are alike at enmity with God, and it is our business to see that we place as teachers in our schools only devout men and women who, in addition to education, have received from the Father in heaven the precious gift of faith which Jesus said flesh and blood could not bestow.

Surely unbelief is no new thing. Jesus wept over Jerusalem with its learned Greeks and egotistical Jewish scholars. Not that they knew too much but because with all their learning, they had, in some way, missed the things that belonged unto their peace. And we have reason to weep that we have chosen so many to lead and teach our youth who do not know the beauty of that white-winged faith that opens the pathway into the unseen, where God has said the just shall walk.

I do not want my children taught untruths but I do want them to know that between the end of the pathway of knowledge and the nearest star that shines there, is a great gulf fixed that only faith can compass and Jesus who was with the Father in glory before the world was, the only one who ever crossed that abyss, whispered to the trembling disciples: "Let not your heart be troubled, ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house there are many mansions. If it were not so, I would have told you. Let not your heart be troubled; neither let it be afraid."

Would you take that promise from me or from my children? Oh! lean by faith on the Saviour's love and promise.

How Shall We Make Our Schools Safe?

Shall we ask our teachers to sign on a "dotted line" a statement of beliefs?

I have borrowed that expression from a liberalist friend—it should be speedily returned. It is a precious possession in the camp of our liberal friends. It stands for coercion, tyranny, uncompromising dogmatism.

That a teacher in a Baptist school should be asked to consent to anything is the extreme of tyranny in the minds of some people.

In a Christian Science school, a teacher would be discontinued for teaching what I believe to be true about Mrs. Eddy. Those of us who passed through the stirring period of the World War, in close touch with German friends, realize that to enjoy the advantages of a republic like ours and keep out of prison, it was necessary to agree to some things in writing.

It has been left for Baptists to discover that we may employ a teacher to propagate truth and yet must altogether refrain from inquiring as to what they think or will teach about that truth.

In a school, upon the controlling board of which I have served, we dared to adopt this simple standard. We placed upon our records the statement: "This school will stand for the ideals upon which it was founded and will aid its teachers to refrain from extreme positions. We stand uncompromisingly for the deity of Jesus; the presence and power of the Holy Sprit."

Under this simple ruling, many capable teachers were barred from teaching in the school and many notes of dissatisfaction reached our ears. Yet some of us have felt that our school is safer because of the limitation.

Is there a pastor here who has not groaned at the strain and effort necessary to hold our young people to a life of faith against the drawing power of the world's pleasures and indulgences? Shall we allow the very forces that we have created for their help and uplift to pull against us, as we try to lead them on to faith? Years ago when Chicago was younger than it is today, we wakened one winter morning to find ourselves without water. We poured hot water around the pipes but they were empty, not frozen; we were faced by the awful possibility of a water famine in mid-winter. Out at the crib, five miles away, the ice had clogged the intake and a young Irishman offered to go down in a diver's suit to cut away the ice. Twelve good men held the ropes but as the ice gave way, the brave young fellow was caught in the inrush of water and carried into the tunnel. Fiercely the men at the ropes tugged and pulled. One rope gave way and there was but one between the man and certain death. The trouble was that the engines at the pumping station on the shore were working against the feeble hands of the rope holders. Finally some one thought of the telephone and in a moment more the message went over the wire "Stop those engines." It was done and, after a few more awful moments, the rescuers lifted the hero from the water to life and hope.

Friends, if you would bring your youth out of danger, you must stop the awful pulling of the engines that in your schools are teaching the unbelief that it is your task to combat. It can be done—it must be done, if we would be true to the Master, who said: "Whosoever believeth shall not perish but have everlasting life."

Are Our Missionaries Loyal to Christ?

A LETTER has recently appeared in print, issued by Mrs. Bessie Williford Laraway, in which statements are made in reference to the Christian views and teaching of certain of our missionaries in China. This letter has been printed either in whole or in part by five publications, none of which referred the letter to us for verification of the statements contained in it before thus giving it broad publicity.

The charges made in the letter referred to are not the first criticisms of our missionaries which have come from this source. Both Mrs. Laraway and her husband have been making charges of this nature in public gatherings for a year or more. Some of their early statements have been investigated by us and proved to be without foundation and it is right that our people should know the unreliable character of their testimony as thus revealed. One of the first charges from this source was from Mr. Laraway to the effect that Doctor Torrey, of Los Angeles, had said to him: "The Northern Baptist Mission in Central China is rotten." This was such a drastic criticism that we at once communicated with Doctor Torrey who responded as follows:

> "I do not know what words of mine could have been twisted into the statement 'The Northern Baptist Mission in Central China is rotten.' I have made no statement of any kind regarding the Northern Baptist Mission of Central China that I can recall. In fact, so far as I know, I did not know that the Northern Baptists had a special mission in Central China. I thank you for calling my attention to this. You are, of course, at liberty to print this letter if you so desire."

They also criticized our missionary, Mr. Nasmith, in the following words: "The missionary worker in Huchow laughs at the idea of prayer changing things." Mr. Nasmith's reply is as follows:

> "Since I have never even seen Mr. Laraway nor had a word of correspondence with him it is hard to understand why he should make any such statement. While Mrs. Laraway (then Miss Williford) was here I certainly recall no remark of mine nor any discussion we ever had (I do not think we ever discussed prayer as a topic) that could possibly be construed as having the above meaning. Furthermore, and this is, of course, the essential point, no word of such import could possibly have been uttered by me. It is too contrary to my belief and practice. I do believe in works with prayer even as I noticed in our Union Hospital this week that Doctor Nelson, before the anaesthetic was administered for a critical operation, offered a brief prayer in Chinese, and I explained the two as working together to the two sons of the patient standing anxiously there. In China above all places we meet those conditions in which only our faith in prayer as changing things can relieve us of a sense of helplessness and hopelessness."

Another of the statements of Mr. and Mrs. Laraway was to the effect that Shanghai College was "a stench in the nostrils of the Almighty." We feel that the present evangelistic situation in Shanghai College is a sufficient answer to this charge. The percentage of Christians in the various classes increases rapidly. The senior class sometimes graduates with every member a follower of Jesus Christ. Thus the census in the fall of 1922, in the college itself, revealed the fact that 78 out of 124 freshmen, or 62 per cent; 57 out of 61 sophomores, or 84 per cent; 26 out of 30 juniors, or 87 per cent; and 31 out of 31 seniors, or 100 per cent, were Christians. These figures represent the situation during the present academic year. A year ago President White reported that for the twelve months immediately preceding there had been seventy-five professed conversions among the students and sixty-five baptized.

In the letter as printed Mrs. Laraway makes other charges against missionaries of our two foreign societies. We can well understand the concern and grief which these statements will cause many of the friends who support our foreign mission work by their prayers and generous gifts. The Master laid down a specific method in Matt. 18:15-17 ("Go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone") to be followed by a Christian who has a grievance against his brother. Certainly it would have been the part of Christian courtesy and brotherliness for the authors of these specific criticisms to have followed this scriptural injunction and to have brought them to the missionaries involved or to the societies whom they represent. This they have not seen fit to do, but after circulating them diligently for a year among members of our constituency who were in no position to know the facts and under circumstances in which no defense could be made they have now given their statements the wings of the printed page.

Ordinarily we should have refrained from replying to charges from such an irresponsible source especially as the authors themselves have never brought them to our attention but in view of the broad currency which has been given these charges and the fact that they have been reported to us by several of our friends who are deeply concerned as to whether such statements are true we are corresponding with the missionaries named. In the meantime we feel that our confidence is due rather to the devoted missionaries who are giving their lives to the work of the Master in the difficult places of the world than to these critics whose previous statements have been shown to be without foundation.

A Continent-Wide Visitation

The Religious Work Campaign of the Y. M. C. A.

BY HOWARD B. GROSE

IT is now possible to form some estimate as to the effect of the conferences conducted jointly by the religious work department of the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. and the city general secretaries' commission on religious work. This unique continent-wide evangelistic campaign, something new in the history of the association movement, began in New England last November, covering forty-seven cities in thirty-four states and provinces, extending from Montreal and Vancouver on the north to Daytona, Fla., on the south, and from Portland, Me., and Boston on the east, to Portland, Ore., and Seattle on the west, closing in the Central West.

In all the conferences and meetings of the five months Dr. John R. Mott was the central figure, and his 170 addresses were marked by great power and persuasiveness as he presented for his main theme the living Christ. This is shown by the fact that over 1,200 of the young men and boys gathered in group meetings pledged themselves to make a fresh study of the living Christ, and over 2,000 association members accepted specific service tasks which were presented to them. The state-wide retreats, calling together picked leaders from the various communities, were attended by over 5,000. The evening meetings of volunteer workers attracted 12,000. Meetings of Christian laymen and special groups like college audiences had nearly 6,000 attendants. There were special meetings with pastors and with editors of the religious press. The aggregate attendance at all meetings on the tour exceeded 30,000 all of whom were carefully selected representatives.

These were not public gatherings, but were planned to reach the association leaders with a message that should inspire them to seek with new zeal the original spiritual aim and ideal of the movement—the salvation of young men and boys. And beyond this was the aim to bring Doctor Mott into direct contact with representative boys and young men of the communities visited. This part of the program was to him the most deeply interesting, and the response at every meeting to his stirring appeal was remarkable evidence of the value of such a service.

In speaking of the strenuous tour, which often called upon him for three and four addresses a day, he said that in all the years of his connection with the association he had never before had such a wide exposure to the boyhood and young manhood of the nation. The places had not been large enough to hold those who wanted to come. From first to last he had sounded the summons to men and boys to confront the living Christ and to go out and call on other men and boys to stand before Christ, that he might make his own impression. Wherever this was done the impression was profound, transforming, ineffaceable. Then the note of service was always emphasized with the duty of augmenting the leadership of the Christian forces, this being pressed upon the pastors and leading laymen present. More than 2,000 men had taken upon themselves definite responsibilities of service under this appeal.

> "SO far as I know, this was a unique evangelistic campaign of intensive character, in which Doctor Mott was for the first time in this intimate way brought into direct personal contact with the local Y. M. C. A. secretaries and directors, the leading business men, the pastors, and the boys and young men of the communities visited from one end of the United States and Canada to the other.
> "The results are but mildly suggested in my article, but the associations have received a mighty spiritual impulse and new relations have been established with the churches—a great gain for our Protestant forces."
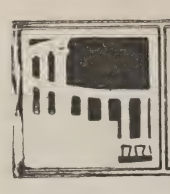
> —Howard B. Grose.

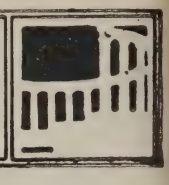
The imperative need to reach the oncoming generation was urged upon the most influential men of the communities visited. He was profoundly impressed with the atmosphere everywhere engendered, the attitude of hope with reference to morals and religion, the large faith in the future of the association. The open meetings for boys and young men between eighteen and twenty-five who were not professing Christians were most impressive, and at each gathering at least 200, often more, decided that they would "head towards Christ."

In these meetings there were many of the Hi-Y members from the high schools. One of them, a boy of seventeen, said at the close of the meeting in Des Moines: "If the Hi-Y boys feel as I do, we could just naturally clean up everything that is wrong and once we get the habit we can keep it up all through life." Not less fruitful were the addresses to business and professional men and to association secretaries. The call and claims of the living Christ were presented with a power felt by all, and a new sense of the spiritual aims and possibilities of the Y. M. C. A. was created. The intimate relation of the associations and the churches was strongly impressed as the vast work to be done by the Protestant forces on this continent was pictured, and international obligations also were recognized.



The results of this continent-wide visitation must prove of inestimable value not only to the associations but to the Christian forces of the communities. Association leaders have received fresh courage and spiritual fires have been rekindled. The chief aim of the association has been made clear and the emphasis has been restored to the religious work in places where it had been weakened. Pastors have seen the work in new relations and light, and closer cooperation will now be possible. They will not forget the earnestness with which the duty of recruiting strong young men for the ministry was urged upon them. In addition to the work of Doctor Mott, there were at each conference demonstrations of Bible discussion groups in action, conducted by a staff member of the religious work department.

This tour discovered a rising tide of interest in the religious work of the associations, expressing itself in the fact that the secretaries and directors are putting a definite emphasis on the religious character of all their work, as well as stressing special religious activities, and that young men and boys are responding as never before to the spiritual appeal.



In this connection it will be of interest to many to learn that the addresses delivered by Doctor Mott on this tour have been put in permanent form, to be issued early in June. The advance proofs, which I have seen, explain the profound impression which the addresses made upon those who heard them. They thrill with intensity of conviction and of faith, and should be in possession of every pastor as well as association worker and lay leader. "Confronting Young Men with the Living Christ" is the title, and the contents include: "The Call to Confront Men with the Living Christ;" "The Present International Situation and the Young Men's Christian Association;" "How to Increase the Spiritual Vitality of the Y. M. C. A.;" "The Conflict of the Christian Worker;" "What has Happened to the Faith of Young Men Throughout the World in the Past Few Years?;" "Why an Increasing Number of Young Men Throughout the World Believe in Jesus Christ as Lord;" "Our Greatest Need—A Fresh Accession of Vital Energy" and "How Augment the Leadership of the Christian Forces."

The auto-wagon colporter-evangelistic work of the Utah Gospel Mission is in special need of more volunteer men, without family responsibilities, who can serve for a year or more. Few of the 500,000 Mormons are reached in any other way; in the last two years we have had 48,000 at meetings and have visited 22,000 homes, using 2,500,000 million pages of free gospel literature. ### A "SUDDEN PESTILENCE"

I saw in a Junior Teacher's Quarterly of our church (the Baptist) the other day a statement saying that the killing of the first-born in the plagues in Egypt was probably a "sudden pestilence." Now is that the right way to lead people to believe and trust the Bible as Christ would have us to? By teaching that a miracle like the killing of the first-born by the angel, as the Bible plainly says, was a sudden pestilence? Would a pestilence take only one out of every family? How much more Christ-like to teach it as the Bible says, and so help the children to believe the Bible and God, instead of teaching them to doubt it all from childhood.

There is enough doubt taught in the world without teaching it in Sunday school. May our leaders live so close to Christ that they will not help the devil to get our children by putting doubts in their minds as to the Bible meaning what it says, is the prayer of one who has studied God's word and never had a doubt for thirty-five years; and Christ and his cause is dearer to me than it ever was.

May we each and all that know him be jealous of the teaching of implicit faith in him.

We do enjoy our paper THE BAPTIST so much.

IGNORAMUS—ES.

Quoting from the article of Frederic J. Gurney, March 17, "What do such men mean?"; "What right have they to pit one set of God's truths against another and make a religious issue out of the alternative?"; "Every discovery, every experiment tends to confirm it"—what is he talking about, "evolution?" Yes.

I confess I am one of those whom he terms "such men." He asks what we mean. We mean that neither every discovery nor every experiment tends to confirm, much less to prove, the theory of evolution—omit the word "theory," if you like. But he assumes that the reason we do not admit his premises is that we are ignorant of the subject. He himself must take Mauro's book to an eminent scientist, to confirm his views. Is there something about the doctrine of evolution, that only an "eminent scientist" is entitled to an opinion? Shall we leave it entirely to them, any more than we leave doctrine entirely to the ministry? Besides, I have somewhere read that some "eminent scientists" do not agree, with the one consulted by Mr. Gurney; but I do not know enough to know what it is that differentiates an "eminent scientist" unless it be one who believes in truth of what is called evolution.

Did you ever hear of eminent scientists being mistaken? How nicely Doctor Cook put it over on them on returning from the icy regions near the pole. Some of us remember the "Giant Stone Man" alleged to have been found in California, and exhibited by scientists as such—until those responsible let out the joke. Very little setting they have of any prehistoric man taken from the bowls of the earth.

I have been more than thirty years an active lawyer. I believe evolution cannot produce a single proof sufficient for a court to pass judgment on the question, unless it be by evidence called "expert testimony"—a branch of evidence almost totally unreliable. In speaking of evolution here, I do not mean change in form, but in specia, as well as accounting for development of organic from inorganic.

Mr. Gurney says also "every experiment" tends to confirm the truth, etc. Tell me, what experiment has ever tended to show that organic life can develop from inorganic. Whoever did that but God? So far as we know, God alone has that power. I might be dogmatic and state that no proof worthy of the name has ever been advanced that would even tend to change the law of "after his kind." It ought to be much easier to make gold out of silver, than a man out of a fish or a monkey. Try either one, Mr. Eminent Scientist, and see. You will say, "God has the power, and did so create man." I admit the former, but deny the latter. There are a few people who can believe in the existence of God and in the doctrine of evolution. To the average mind, to accept evolution is to reject God as a factor—to reject the Bible as inspired (and some will even criticize your views, Mr. Gurney, on this point) to reject the fall of man, the necessity of regeneration, the virgin birth, and each and every other conception of Christianity that is dear to us. Ultimately, Christ becomes merely a man, God a fiction, and sound doctrine a joke.

WALLACE M. PENCE.

OLD-TIME CLOSE COMMUNION

I ran across the following bit of information bearing upon the now outgrown subject of "close communion" which may divide the odium our forebears have been obliged to bear alone. Edward Leage in Vol. II of "King George and the Royal Family," page 119, says:

"There would have been no bar, I think, from the Presbyterian point of view to Queen Victoria's receiving communion. It was the English Church people who objected. . . It is communion which is the bond of church fellowship; and strict Anglicans object to receiving communion from non-Episcopalian hands."

Quoting from the Spectator he says, "The point at issue on which the committee must not avoid giving a plain answer is: Was it illegal for a clergyman of the church of England to give communion to persons not members of that church? If it is, a condition of things utterly disastrous to the church of England would have arisen . . . for Prince Albert and Queen Alexandra were both unconfirmed. If the legal position is to be probed to the bottom it will be found that the bishop and clergy not only may—but must give communion to unconfirmed persons who desire it, and are not notorious evil livers."

And yet the bishop of India sent a letter to Rev. Geo. F. Pentecose, who was visiting in India, saying that he could not give him communion because he lacked confirmation.

DOUBTS THAT PENTECOST WAS OUT-PENTECOSTED

In a recent issue of THE BAPTIST, I saw an article entitled, "Pentecost Outpentecosted." I eagerly read to see what had taken place that so outclassed the great day of Pentecost, and I was only disgusted to find that some Methodist missionaries had sprinkled some soldiers in the Chinese army. I concede that they have a civil right to preach their doctrines and sprinkle their converts, but a Baptist paper has no right to countenance such doings, much less virtually to endorse them, but should use its space to teaching the truth.

Now, if I understand it correctly, you say that they baptized those men. If they actually baptized them, then sprinkling is baptism. If sprinkling is baptism, then immersion is not. If immersion is not baptism, then I am not baptized. I am not baptized, then I am a rebel against God because I am refusing to obey at least one of his commandments. If I continue on in disobedience, what will be my doom? Must I be sprinkled? I am anxious to obey all the commandments that God has given to man.

International Sunday School Lesson for July 8

MARY, THE MOTHER OF JESUS

Lesson: Matt. 1:18 to 2:12; 12:46-50. Luke 1:26-56; 2:1-52. John 2:1-11; 19:25-27.

Golden Text: Matt. 1:21

Introductory

We know Mary through her Son, Jesus. Always she is revealed to us through some event connected with his life. First there is the announcement by the angel that she is to be the mother of the Saviour with the words, "Hail, thou that art highly favored." At Bethlehem Jesus was born, and after forty days he was taken to the temple at Jerusalem to be presented. The sacrifice offered in connection with this event was that of the very poor—two young pigeons. It was at this time that Simeon took Jesus in his arms and offered the Nunc Dimittis. Thence they returned to Bethlehem, later they fled from Herod into Egypt, but returned to Nazareth when safety came with his death. Mary is again seen in Jerusalem, and this visit is made the scripture text of the day's lesson. There follow eighteen years, with Mary in the home with Jesus. Then come the three years of Jesus' public ministry and his death upon the cross.

The Lesson

"His parents went every year to the feast of the passover"—showing that Mary did all and more than was required of her, as women were not obliged to attend this feast. When Jesus was twelve years old, the occasion had a slightly different meaning to them, for the child had come to an age when the obligations of the law were binding upon him and they took him with them. The feast of the passover lasted seven days, but only two days' attendance was obligatory. The journey to and from Jerusalem was made in a large company, so it is not as strange as it might otherwise seem that they were a day's journey from Jerusalem on the way home when Mary discovered that Jesus was not with the company. Upon this discovery Mary and Joseph returned at once to Jerusalem and on the third day they found him in the temple with teachers "hearing and asking them questions; and all that heard him were amazed at his understanding and answers." Probably much was revealed to Mary by what she saw there in the temple, and by Jesus' answer to her gentle questioning: "Knew ye not that I must be in my Father's house?" But he returned with them to Nazareth and for eighteen years was subject unto them. These years of retirement in the humble home were years of growth, he "advanced in wisdom and stature, and favor with God and man."

Leading Thoughts

1. A ponderer of majestic thoughts knows how to meet the issues of life. 2. Though Mary may sometimes have been a puzzled mother, she never asserted personal claims upon her Son. 3. "Honor thy father and thy mother."

The Aim of Week-Day Religious Education

To make God central and not circumferential; to make him focal and not marginal, vital not casual, a living presence and power, not a dead impressive name—this is the supreme aim of week-day religious education.

The supreme aim is not to teach the Bible—that is a means to the end; nor to teach behaviour—that is a fruit not a root; nor good citizenship, nor social service, though they follow as the day follows the sun. The supreme aim is to call God in from the frontiers, and to make him real, neighborly, available, usable, indispensable. The aim, in a word, is to complete our educational system which, without religion, drags like Pharaoh's chariots. There can be no education which leaves out religion. There can be no education which leaves out the supreme fact in the physical universe, the supreme fact in human life, which is God. One cannot pack his suitcase and leave out the suitcase. One cannot study art, science, literature, history, philosophy, and leave out religion which is the warp and woof of all of them. Religion is no mere department of life. It is no mere elective course in the school of life. It is as Browning said

"No mere smile o' contentment
No mere sigh of aspiration, sir,
No quality of the finelier tempered clay,"—

No mere luxury for exquisites, no mere cake and ice-cream at the feast, no mere embroidery for the robe—but rather

"Stuff o' the very stuff Life of life, self of self."

To develop, then, in children their awareness of God by faith, to sharpen their spiritual focus, to train them in the art of prayer, to cultivate in them a robust spirit of loyalty to God and obedience to him, and love for him with all their heart and mind and soul and strength, this is not only the first and great commandment, but the first and greatest aim of our week-day schools.

And the second is like unto this, to train the child to love his neighbor as himself. — George Craig Stewart in "Week-Day Religious Education," Doran.

Rhus Toxicodendron

THE ability of man, at a later time, to laugh over the pains of yesterday preserves him from becoming, as the case may be, a prig, a bore, or a hypochondriac. Today I can smile, actually smile, at the mention of poison ivy; yet but two little months ago, I tossed upon a sleepless couch, one vast, sustantial itch, and, with fingers clenched upon the counterpane, strove not to obey that impulse.

At the time I was living with pastoral friends in New Hampshire. Under what hapless circumstances I took my flier in ivy was never clear to any of us. I know only that, one morning at milking-time, I woke from the first sweet sleep of night, to find my epidermis for all the world like one of Roger Babson's statistical reports of the thickly settled districts, cities of over 50,000 population done in red. So I betook myself to Emma.

"Land!" exclaimed she, peering through her specs at my mottled hide. "You air pizoned!"

Beyond a doubt, but que faire?

"In my fambly," quoth Emma, "we allus stick by the old remedies: a cup of vinegar with a cent in it."

"Must you have a fresh cent every cup?" I innocently asked, considerably amazed at this astounding property in our much neglected unit of currency.

"Take it as a joke and welcome!" With asperity Emma banged shut the oven door.

From the woodshed came Wal'r's voice. "My folks use nitre," he drawled.

"That's for a fever, isn't it?" I remonstrated cautiously.

"Inside or out," he replied. "What do you think pizon ivory is, anyhow?"

I was about to reply, Fire and Brimstone and All Get-Out, when Wal'r continued: "It's a fever, and no mistake. Why man, I've had my legs swelled big as pillers, from ivory that I tread in while hayin.' I slapped nitre on them legs, and took nitre internal three times a day, and it eased down that swellin' jest as sweet as a kiss at a huskin'-bee."

Convinced by such evidence, I trudged off to the general store for pints, quarts, gallons, if need be, of sweet spirits of nitre.

"Poison ivy?" inquired the lady of the counter, who had once lived in Saugus, Mass., and gave the pas to no one. "You don't want nitre! Just run out to the gasoline tank, and let Billy spray you with a couple of quarts."

"My stars, Verena!" remonstrated her aunt; "who ever heerd of such a newfangled notion? Jes' don't listen to the girl. What you need is potash. Here's some soap I've made to wash the kitchen sink with. It's got plenty of lye in it. Now you jest' bile—"

"Lye!" I expostulated. "Kitchen sink! Gracious Powers, Mrs. Smith, have you no heart?"

"Iodine is a tol'ble help, they say, for some folks," spoke up Oramel Jewell from beside the stove.

His brother, Romano, spit reflectively through the door.

"Dirty stuff, thet iodeen. Why don't you try salt and vinegar?"

"That's two for vinegar," I reflected.

Forthwith I purchased a gill of nitre, a pint of vinegar, a quarter's worth of iodine, a little lye, a twist of salt, and left the store, for the present dispensing with the gasoline shower.

On the stoop the pastor met me.

"You look like a drug store," he laughed.

I told my story to the man of God.

"Now throw away all that truck at once!" he interrupted, indicating my sovereign remedies with a fine scorn. "The trouble it with your blood."

That rather irritated me. Though I may not resemble the photograph of Mr. J-ss W-ll-rd after having taken two bottles of Nuxated Iron, I rather fancy my blood. It arrived in Hingham, coursing in a deacon's veins, in 1636.

"Thanks," I said rather stiffly, and walked off.

"Sulphur and molasses," he called cheerfully. "Make you fit as a tick."

At the iron bridge, Sid Hunkins (Phoebus, what a name!) who had learned of my complaint offered his wisdom.

"It's tew late fur this season," said Sid, "but next spring, the fust ivory as ever you see, you ust swaller three little leaves. After that you can go gallivantin' in the stuff, regardless."

But I didn't care twopence for next spring. It was here and now that troubled me.

Before turning down the road to Wal'r's house, I stopped at the telephone pay-station and sent a telegram to a doctor in Boston, who was a friend of mine: "Badly poisoned by ivy. What shall I do about it?"

Then I walked home and set the harvest of the rural pharmacopoeia on the shelf. In the afternoon a reply came back: "Doctor Cutts is on his vacation in the Canadian Rockies."

Despair filled my soul. There ought to be a law preventing medical men from going to such places. With a moan, I rushed to my store of drugs and tossed off a noggin of nitre. Then I painted my chest with iodine, embossed my arms with potash, and submerged my legs in vinegar and pennies.

For six days I was busy—as Wal'r put it—as a hog on a tin roof. Yet there was fascination in the thing. Now I would think the lye was winning; then the vinegar would forge ahead; again, it was the iodine that was downing the fell adversary. And at meal-time—O Volstead, where is thy sting!—my toddy of nitre—92.4 per cent alcohol—cast a pleasant glow upon this struggle between disease and remedy.

On the seventh day there came a letter from my friend the doctor, who had returned from the Rockies. "What have you tried?" he wrote. "The best thing is patience. Poison ivy is like first love; it has to run its course."

It had. The scaly tetter vanished; lo! my skin was white again as snow.—From the Contributor's Club, Atlantic Monthly.

Off for the Big Woods

By Dora Dexter

BEYOND the Derrydale avenue school stretched the long, long road which led to the big woods. As soon as the first tinge of green appeared on the lawns, the children began to talk of these woods, and on May 1 they always started out to find them. They had all the fascination of mystery, for no one in the school seemed to have really seen them. But many and varied were the delightful rumors about them. To Pauline Merrilies they meant a wide stretch of beautiful trees full of fresh young leaves, and beneath them a carpet of deep blue violets, pure white trilliums, feathery maidenhair and wild phlox in a sort of glorified patchwork.

With this vision glowing in her eyes, she tripped lightly along in the front line of the eager cavalcade of children on this May day. Carrying baskets and trowels and string, shod in rubbers and overshoes and a few much envied rubber boots, they started down the long, long road, still oozy with April rains. Behind them at a little distance trotted a few stragglers—first and second graders. Bribes, threats and coaxings, however, sent these trotting homeward—all except Toots, short, fat, determined, little Toots, Pauline's brother.

"Goin' to pick flowers my own self," insisted the stubborn, little fellow. "Got my rubbers and everything."

"Tie him to a tree," suggested Scott Barlow, one of the larger boys. "We can pick him up on our way back."

"Let's all run; he couldn't keep up," cried one of the others.

"Please, Tootsie, go back," begged Pauline. "Maybe mama has some candy. Anyhow sister'll get you some. Yes, tonight; and an ice cream cone, two of 'em."

"Don't want none." Toots' round, blue eyes held visions of the big woods, too. "Wants jack in the pulpits and tiger lilies and—and May apples. Wants a big bunch for mama."

The rest were getting ahead. Even Lois, her best friend, reluctantly left them. Taking a firm hold of her little brother's fat hand, she started desperately to run. Valiantly Toots' short legs tried to keep up. No use; stubbing his toe, he dragged face downward in the mud. By the time Pauline's handkerchief had wiped off the worst spots the other children were far ahead.

But Pauline pushed on—she just couldn't give up. Toots, trudging beside her, lifted one clumsy, little foot after the other steadily, sturdily—but oh, so slowly. In spite of all they could do, those others got farther ahead and farther ahead.

Arriving finally at the pussy willow field, Pauline found a little bunch of the red brown stems with the fluffy gray kitties on them. Lois had left them for her.

"Pretty pussies, Toots going to pick more," cried little brother, sliding immediately down the side of the ditch, splashing through it and pulling himself up on the other side. Unmindful of the red brown cow beyond the barbed wire, he tried to climb through.

"Toots, wait!" screamed Pauline. But too late; the sharp barbs had caught in the thick collar of his reefer and held him fast.

Could she get him loose before the cow got him? That was Pauline's one thought as she leaped recklessly across the ditch to his side. "Hush," she cried, " the cow'll hear you."

The cow had heard him—was staring straight at him. Her big, brown eyes looked gentle, but her horns looked very fierce. With quivering fingers Pauline strove with the twisted points caught in the heavy cloth. Ah, they were loose! But so was Toots—on the wrong side of the fence. Deaf to her calls, he was running farther into the field, looking up eagerly at the bushes. The cow fortunately had returned to her nibbling.

But she must go after him. Through the dreadful barbed wire — with no friendly hand to help her. Into the arena with the cow. Oh, the cow seemed tame enough, but—but those horns, she didn't have them for nothing. Placing one foot carefully between two of the ugly points on the lowest wire, Pauline lifted the upper wire gingerly with her hand. Bending double, cringing from the wire above and below, she tried to squeeze through. At that very instant the red brown cow stretched forth her neck. "Moo-moooo," rent the air.

Even Toots was terrified. Running to a big willow tree, with surprising dexterity he climbered up its knotty trunk. As for Pauline she was hopelessly entangled in the wire. Tam, stockings, hair, the wicked little points seemed to be everywhere. She untangled one only to get balled up in another. Why had the cow made that dreadful sound? What had she done to Toots? She worked feverishly. It seemed an age before she was free.

"Paul—Pauly, here I am."

Where was he? Up in a tree, Toots! The cow must have tossed him there. She must beat her to it. She easily did so; the cow not even attempting to help. She was safe in the tree; they were both safe.

Nothing for it now but to wait in the tree for the return of the others. Perhaps they wouldn't find the big woods this time either, she thought a bit hopefully. Toots, quite content to let his weary little legs rest, snuggled close to her. His eyes were surprisingly heavy; before long he slept. The cow rambled about the field in search of bits of green, then settled down at the base of the very willow in which they were seated.

What a sight for the returning wanderers. They would know beyond a doubt that she was afraid of cows now. She'd never hear the last of it.

The sky beyond the slender willow branches was turning a deep red. They must come soon. She could hear them. Oh, dear! But afterwards home and supper. What a relief!

"Wake up, Toots; they're coming."

They had not found the big woods. Pauline knew that the moment she saw them. Just a few yellow buttercups, a few cowslips and some half withered wild geraniums lay limply in the baskets with the pussy willows. Tired, cold and hungry, the flower hunters had lost all faith in the big woods again. In the most unamiable of moods, they caught sight of the treed boy and girl with the cow underneath. No explanation was necessary; they knew.

"'Fraid of a cow—'fraid of a cow," laughing and hooting the big boys leaped over the ditch, quickly followed by the whole mob. "'Fraid of a cow, wow, wow, wow!"

Lois was the only one who didn't join in. "Don't you care," she cried above the rude refrain, "we'll help you down."

"Not afraid of a cow," above the clamor Toots' voice rang out. "We's just waitin' for—for somebody." Then in a fierce whisper to his sister: "We is waitin' for somebody—for the old cow to go to sleep or somethin.' And he will, too."

Paying no attention, the boys were getting all the fun out of the situation they could. Gathering sticks, they prepared to attack the cow. "We'll save you if it takes every man of us," cried Scott; then: "Forward, march, charge."

The gallant rescuers were scrambling through the fence. Pauline's face burned. "Don't you dare rescue me," she cried. "We are waiting for somebody. And this was the only place, dry—dry enough to sit down on."

With such emphasis did she speak that even Lois believed her. No one surely would refuse help when night was falling if they really needed it. But it was queer, very queer. And they wouldn't explain. In two's and three's the children melted away up the road until only Lois was left.

"You don't want help really? I could call them back," Lois questioned earnestly.

"I don't really," answered Pauline firmly enough; and Lois ran to catch up with the others.

The silence settled like a cold blanket about them. "Now we've gone and done it," muttered Pauline.

"And it's getting dark," whimpered Toots. "And cold. I wish that old cow would go to sleep—'stead of just chewing and chewing. Just see his old tail switch around."

"We'll just have to get down anyhow," declared Pauline. But she made no move to get down. The red gradually faded from the sky. A whistle! Who was that whistling?

Across the field ambled a thin, long-legged man in a big, sunburned hat. Pulling off the sunburned straw, he stared with comical amazement at the brother and sister. Then, glancing reproachfully at the cow, he cried, "Daisy, Daisy, I am surprised."

The kindly, weather-wrinkled face of the man seemed like an angel's to Pauline. "Are you his owner?" she cried eagerly. "Oh, please, please, take him away."

"Poor young-uns. From the town, I reckon—himming Daisy. Some of these here big woods' hunters, maybe? Stopped by Daisy's wicked looking horns. Well, I swan!" The farmer paused a moment, then said: "Come, step your foot down on Uncle Jim's back, and we'll see what can be done."

Half an hour later the brother and sister were riding behind Farmer Jim's fast mare. Eating doughnuts and laughing at Uncle Jim's sallies, they passed the rest of the children just as they were straggling into town. In Pauline's lap rested a huge bunch of deep blue violets, picked by the farmer's boy that day. Waving the bunch at the surprised wayfarers, Pauline cried cheerily: "Beat you home after all."—The Continent.

WHAT DOES CHRISTIAN BROTHERHOOD MEAN?
I John 3:10-24
(A PEACE MEETING)

"Hereby know we love, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren."

The term brotherhood connotes a filial relationship; fraternal dealings between individuals. It is a word we hear a great deal about these days. It is easy to speak, but hard to practice in all of life's relationships.

There never was a day in the world's history when the word should have more meaning than right now. Some one has said that modern inventions, such as the telephone, telegraph, radio, etc., have made the entire world a neighborhood but Christianity has failed to make the world neighborly.

We have had our peace conferences, conferences for the limitation of armaments, and they have measurably succeeded. But, the matter will be settled when the meaning of brotherhood gets right down to where the majority of the human race lives and has its being. Where shall we begin?

1. In my own heart. There are lots of good people in the churches today who will sing with great gusto "Blest be the tie that binds," and yet they have no use whatever for some people of their own faith, especially if they happen to be black, and more especially if they happen to belong to another Christian communion. I quote from a letter received from a state young people's worker: "We stick to denominational program from start to finish. Brethren of other denominations are always welcome to come but we make no effort to have them come." The whole tone of this man's letter would make one to feel that he has never sensed the meaning of brotherhood. Another illustration: I know a deacon of a Baptist church who boasted of the fact that he had never given a "nigger" a kind word. Another: I have been informed that at a young people's meeting where a negro soloist appeared on the program, the wife of a nearby minister left the convention hall because the "nigger" was on the program. There are others who have the same attitude toward a "greaser," a "chink" and a "dago." Measured by New Testament standards, people who hold those opinions lack just that much of being Christian.

2. In my work. First of all, one must look upon his task as a service to be rendered. In the execution of that task, whether he be employee or employer, he touches other lives. In this touch there must be the brotherhood spirit and ideals. My what a transformation would be wrought in the world, if such were the case. Business men would pay as much attention to the development of human personalities as they do to dividends. Men would watch their tasks instead of the clock. Little children would be clothed and fed because adequate wages would be paid. Child labor would be unheard of because the children would be in school or in God's great out-of-doors. Neighborhoods would be neighborly. Environments would be changed and the world would be made a fit place in which to live.

3. In my world. International relationships are just the extension of persons and interests to other lands. Brotherhood! If we had it, there would be no exploitation of the weaker nations by the strong ones; we would cease going to war with each other because we have learned that after all we are brothers.

With all the reactionary tendencies present in the world today, there are thousands who look forward to the day when Christ's principles will be the governing principles in all life's relationships. If you want to know what the students of the various countries are thinking on this subject, get a copy of "The Revolt of Youth," by High. Same can be purchased through the American Baptist Publication Society, 125 N. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill., price $1.75.

W. H. MAIN.

Rev. H. S. Myers, who was scheduled to conduct the stewardship conferences, has found it necessary to cancel, owing to the fact that he plans to attend the Baptist World Alliance. Dr. W. H. Main, associate general secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society, will take his place for these important conferences.

Still They Come

From widely scattered locals in ten states come donations to the extension fund showing that the appeal is reaching our young people and is not falling on deaf ears. The extension fund is one of the most significant developments of the work of the B. Y. P. U. of America, and if it continues at the rate it is going now, we shall not only have success in getting the fund but shall stir up our young people to a sense of our mission to young Baptists across the sea, the opportunities and joys that have come to us in organized young people's work. Meanwhile, we desire other locals and individuals to participate in this fund and we hope there will be no delays in sending in donations as the time is passing rapidly and we want to know by the time of the meeting of the board of managers in Boston just what work we can plan to do in connection with the extension fund. Send donations to Dr. Herbert Hines, 193 N. Harrison Ave., Kankakee, Ill.

Our Own Folks

The New Baptist Temple

Keen interest throughout New York State and vicinity has extended into religious circles throughout the country, due to the plan unanimously adopted by the Baptist Temple of Rochester, N. Y., to erect a combined church and office building, the greatest project of its kind ever launched by a Rochester church. This beautiful nine-story structure will be built on the present site of the church (formerly the Second Baptist Church, later the East Avenue Baptist Church, and now the Baptist Temple), and will contain a large auditorium, club and social rooms, restaurant, library, playground on the roof, modern Bible school accommodations, planned to do a large work among the employees of the department stores, and banks of the neighborhood and those who live in the neighborhood. Seventy thousand people live within a mile radius of the Temple. A reproduction of the architect's perspective of the new building appears on the cover of this issue.

Rev. Clinton Wunder, who came to the church two years ago, had the vision of this building in his mind and found hearty support on the part of leading laymen of the church, especially in William Hartman, chairman of the present building committee, and Herbert S. Weet, superintendent of schools and chairman of the board of trustees of the church. As a result of a thorough study lasting over a year and a half of time, the church recently voted to go ahead with the plans. Under the leadership of Dr. F. H. Divine the campaign closing June 10, netted $250,000 gifts in pledges for the new building, the balance to be raised in the form of second mortgage bond sale of $250,000, and a first mortgage loan of $1,000,000, which provides for the total construction cost of $1,500,000. When the value of the land is included, it means that the new building for the Baptist Temple will be worth $2,000,000. Work on the construction will be started early in 1924: It is proposed to have an auditorium seating in the neighborhood of 1,500 people. It will be well ventilated, thoroughly up to date in lighting and seating arrangements, and will permit the use of a large special chorus choir. The basement and first and second floors will be devoted to dining rooms, gymnasiums, Sunday-school rooms, banquet halls, executive office of the church staff, meeting rooms and parlors. On Sunday this equipment will be specifically used for the purpose of religious worship and religious education. During the week it will perform the service of the social program for the members of the church and an institutional program for social service to the neighborhood of the church.

Since coming to the Baptist Temple Doctor Wunder has had a vision of the task to which every down-town church is called—the service of the neighborhood. The time is coming when one or more social workers must be added to the staff. A free day-nursery, classes in sewing, in health, in domestic science; boys' and girls' clubs meeting throughout the week, parents' clubs, and club rooms for men and boys of the neighborhood will be logical and likely developments with the new and adequate equipment.

"The new Baptist Temple," says Doctor Wunder, "should be in use by people every hour of the day and night. I am sure that is the ideal that our people have in mind, namely that the success of the new church will be in proportion to the amount of its use by the thousands who live and work 'in the heart of Rochester.' The temple must continue to keep its pulpit free in great public questions of righteousness and justice and must provide the type of preaching and religious services where great multitudes must come and find help and happiness as they are introduced to Jesus Christ and come to know him better. The Temple people desire to build the kingdom of God 'in the heart of Rochester.' It is their daily prayer; 'Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven.'

"The temple membership of the future must be composed of a people who believe in the downtown church as the call of God, who love to worship in the great cheerful services of the downtown church, who love to mix with all ranks and conditions of men, who love to support such a great home mission proposition for the kingdom, and who are willing to give of their time as well as their money, for time will be increasingly required. With the new equipment we shall need time given by earnest leaders for teaching in the Sunday-school, for conducting of clubs through the week, for conducting of teaching classes through the week, for playground leadership, and many other activities.

The building committee is: Messrs. William Hartman, chairman; Junius Judson, Arthur Castle, Dr. H. B. Robins, Alvah Stahl, J. M. Walmsley, Herbert S. Weet, Clinton Wunder. The finance committee: Messrs. Glenn Ewell, Chairman; H. M. Webb, William P. Cross, Earl G. Taylor, Charles Irwin, Clarence Campbell.

It is expected that the revenue from the new Temple will pay for the church over a period of about twenty years, and will then operate as an endowment fund for current expenses and such benevolent program as the church may undertake.

Mr. Wunder has been prepared for his task as minister of the Temple by experience as a newspaper reporter, a Y. M. C. A. secretary, a salesman and his army chaplaincy. He is a graduate of the University of Cincinnati and of the Rochester Theological Seminary. The attendance in the Baptist Temule has averaged 2,000 per Sunday for the two years of his pastorate. The Temple is serving downtown Rochester as few churches are able to do, and it holds a tremendous place in the hearts of Rochester people. Its great lack has been proper equipment and this is now to be provided adequately.

Women's Work in Czecho-Slovakia

By Lydia Kolator

The first harvest we have. Four of our orphans in the Peabody-Montgomery Children's Home became converted. What happiness and joy! Lada, the thirteen-year-old boy was the first one who began to think of baptism. He came one day to me asking: "Auntie, dear, what amount of money would it cost if I would get baptized?" I do not know what crossed his mind that he really thought it must be an expensive problem to get baptized. You see, being a Catholic and brought up in a Catholic family, he really knew very little about our Baptist church. He only read in his dear little New Testament and came to the conclusion that he is converted, believes in Jesus Christ, as his Saviour and therefore he is going to be baptized whatever it costs. And so we had one of the happiest quiet hours together talking, explaining, and decided after careful consideration, that Lada is ripe for baptism.

Now I ought to say that my two oldest children, Milton and Daisy, asked before that Mr. Hanus baptize them as they feel they are Jesus' own and believe in him and accept his salvation. But soon others came to me with tears in their eyes. Bohus, said to be "converted long ago!" is twelve years only now. Jaro, one of the oldest, thought of his dear mother who died and wished him to follow Christ. At last our oldest girl, Fanny, came and declared she will be God's child all her life and will obey Jesus in baptism also. So came a rich Sunday, the first in May, when before the members of the church in Roudnice ten young people declared their faith and desire to follow Christ in baptism. I wish truly the whole world could have been present at that gathering when one after the other came and spoke for himself. When Lada told his life's story! What did that child live through. He spoke of his life when toiling without friends and parents, without God—in this rich world of ours! When no one took care of him. When no one had any interest in him. When he simply kept on living somehow—not dying, just living. And when Lada said to Mr. Hanus: "I fall in love with you all, when I came to the Home"—everybody was busy with his own handkerchief.

The baptism will take place in Prague, surely before a big audience—the first Sunday in June. Imagine how we all are looking forward to this great day.

The children all are well, only little Rose is rather weak and pale. Doctor says she ought to spend one or two months at the seaside, south. She is very dear and near to our hearts and the thought of losing her is simply unbearable to us all.

There are many orphans who ought to be placed under our roof, but we do not like to have the Home more crowded than it is already. And we do not like to have an orphanage—we want a home, a happy family. We pray God may help us to be able to give foundation to the second family of orphans. We do believe in his promises and we trust in him that he will give us soon all we need to take in others and have the second happy lot of children with a good mother to take care of them.

We thank God daily for our American dear friends who are in his hand—tools of great work. Whatever you have done to these little ones—you have done unto him. Do not fear death—you have helped orphans, for Jesus surely will ask you to step to the right—because you have served him, serving these children.

We had in May another joy. On the fifteenth Doctor Rushbrooke from London visited our home. He ought to tell you for himself how he was embraced and kissed by children who do not know what it means to embrace a father. I saw in that minute a symbol in it: Czecho-Slovak orphan embraces Anglo-Saxon race. I wish my English were more rich in expression to be able to tell you what I felt when fatherless Czecho-Slovak children gave Doctor Rushbrooke humble flowers from the soil where our fathers toiled, worked hard, preached, baptized, forty years ago here the first sixteen Baptists in Bohemia.

I wish I could have taken you with us at dawn the fifteenth in a small carriage to that beautiful spot on the river Vltava, Moldau, where my father, Mr. Novotny, forty years ago baptized these first members in the whole land. I personally was for that evening perfectly happy and proud as a queen, when my husband said "I was one of those whom Father Novotny baptized in a lake at midnight with stars shining gloriously."

Some members of our committee will be in Stockholm next July. We invite all who are interested in this work to come and see us after the congress. Remember: You will be "in danger" after your visit that eighteen orphans will daily, going to bed pray for you. That is their own habit. God bless you!

District of Columbia

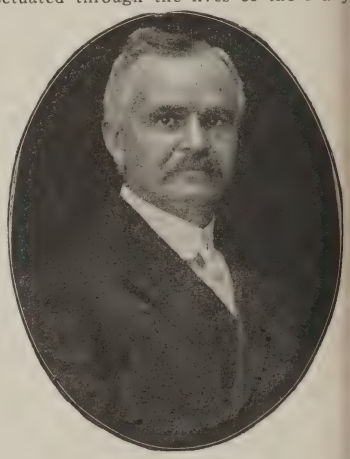
By Henry W. O. Millington

The East Washington Heights Church Sunday school has had an unusual record this year in the matter of attendance. The roll of membership includes 157 names. During the month of May, the average attendance was 132. It was suggested by the pastor, Rev. James W. Many, that it would be a splendid thing if the school could have one "perfect day" and Sunday, June 3, was set apart for such a day. They did not quite reach the goal, but 146 of the pupils enrolled were present and they had eleven visitors, so that all told there were just 157. The superintendent of the school is Mr. M. F. Brothers.

June 3 Rev. John E. Briggs celebrated the fourteenth anniversary of his pastorate at the Fifth Church. There was a large congregation. The platform was decorated with flowers and plants and everything indicated joy of heart on the part of both pastor and people. In many ways this has been a notable pastorate. Nearly two thousand additions have been made to the membership roll. The Sunday school has an average attendance of about 800. The church has a mission school on 4½ Street, S. W., and another new mission school at Colmar Manor in Maryland. The church has recently bought and paid for two residences in the rear of the church property and plans are being drawn by an architect for the enlargement of the Sunday-school building. More than 4000 persons have united with the churches of which Doctor Briggs has been pastor and where he has held meetings during the twenty-five years of his ministry.



The Second Church, of which Rev. E. C. Primm is pastor, has definitely committed itself to a building program for the enlargement of its Sunday-school plant. This new building is badly needed to make provision for the rapidly growing Sunday school. The proposed building will cover the parsonage property, and property to the rear of the church and will also include the remodeling of the present Sunday-school house so as to unify the entire building. The present structure, the architect's drawings of which are in the hands of the building committee, will be three stories in height, giving modern departmental facilities to the school as well as a large lecture room and equipment for social occasions. With this enlargement the Second Church will be the best equipped church in the southeast section of the city and one of the best in this entire region. The improvement will cost around $5,000. For the present the church is creating a cash fund. When this is completed loans will be negotiated and work on building commenced. It is expected that the building will be finished in 1924. An unusual feature of the work of the church has been its enlarged prayer-service attendance. The pastor has devoted special attention to this and has developed a meeting thoroughly alive and interesting. Night after night the prayer-meeting room is crowded, sometimes to overflowing. The men practically equal the women in attendance. A goodly number of soldiers and sailors are always present. Decision day in the Sunday school on June third netted nearly twenty decisions for Christ.

A number of Washington people are going to attend the Baptist World Alliance Convention at Stockholm this summer. Among the pastors are Dr. W. S. Abernethy, Dr. Gove Griffith Johnson, Rev. Hugh T. Stevenson and Dr. H. W. O. Millington. In addition to these will be Mr. and Mrs. E. Hilton Jackson, Mrs. Abernethy and her son Theodore, Mrs. H. H. Talbott, Miss Mabel F. Strider and Miss Helen Smith. The Washington Baptists are sending an invitation to the Baptist World Alliance to hold its next session in the Capital city, and this invitation has been officially reinforced by the action of the Southern and Northern Conventions. There is reason to think that Washington will entertain the next Baptist World gathering.

Lee Walton Terry

An Appreciation

The many friends of Rev. L. W. Terry will be saddened by the news of the sudden passing of one of the outstanding Baptist figures of the west. Brother Terry passed away at his home at Sunnyside, Wash., on April 13. His going is mourned by a host of friends all over the west. After graduating from Chicago University and Morgan Park Seminary in 1884 he served important churches in Iowa, Colorado and Nebraska. From 1902 until 1911 he was the secretary of the West Washington Baptist Convention. Through all his ministry he was actively interested in the missionary and educational work of the denomination. After retiring to his farm in Eastern Washington in 1912, he not only continued his interest in the work of his church but devoted much of his time and effort to the aid of the farmers. It was his unceasing labor for others that resulted in his sudden death. His long and useful service will be perpetuated through the lives of the many people whom he has inspired with the ideals of our Master.

He is survived by two daughters, Mrs. Quniter Miller of Sunnyside, Wash., and Mrs. Owen T. Day of Portland, and by a son, Walton Terry of Sunnyside, Wash.

The large gathering of friends and the long line of cars which followed wending their way to the burrying grounds were eloquent testimony to the esteem in which he was held. His wise counsel will be greatly missed both in our Baptist circles and among the farmers' organizations where he made himself invaluable.

CONNECTICUT

The calendar of the First Church, Bridgeport, Rev. C. A. Decker pastor, contains this statement: "The amount we contributed to the New World Movement last year was $11,249.99. Now our budget for beneficence this year is $12,410. Of this amount $12,000 is for the New World Movement. We can raise it. Some of our people have not made their pledges to this fund. All such are urged to attend to this matter at once. We should have a pledge for beneficence from every member of the church."

RHODE ISLAND

SUNDAY, JUNE 3, MARKED the thirtieth anniversary of the settlement of Rev. H. W. Watjen as pastor of the historic church at Warren, R. I. This church was established in 1764. The day was fittingly observed. At the morning service Rev. Edward Holyoke, pastor of the Calvary Baptist church, Providence, preached the anniversary sermon. In the evening the pastor reviewed the thirty years of his first and only pastorate. Thursday evening was given over to a parish gathering. Rev. William Reid, of Providence, brought greetings in behalf of the Baptist pastors of the state and Rev. J. J. Goodacre, of Bristol, brought the greetings of the local pastors. Mr. Edward R. Cutler, treasurer of the church, presented the pastor with a purse of $200 in gold, and Mrs. Watjen with a large bouquet of choice roses.

MASSACHUSETTS

AFTER ELEVEN YEARS OF SERVICE Rev. Frank M. Holt has resigned at Reading. His resignation will take effect in September. He has not been in good health and will take some time for rest before entering upon another pastorate.

REV. GEORGE L. MICHELSON has accepted the call of the church at Framingham. He has been pastor of the Calvary Church, Salem.

Commencement at Newton

Newton Theological Institution passed its ninety-eighth milestone at its commencement on June 6. On the preceding Sunday, Pres. George E. Horr preached a sermon with evangelistic power on the words: "I have no good apart from thee." He declared that the gospel was "the possibility of reconciliation with God and a new life through personal relationship with Jesus Christ." The Boston Baptist Social Union celebrated "Newton Night" on Monday when strong addresses were given by Mr. Fred T. Field and President K. C. M. Sills of Bowdoin College. Alumni gathered in large numbers on Tuesday to the scenes and fellowships of Newton hill—"mount of God," Dr. Samuel F. Smith called it in his Newton hymn.

The address before the alumni by Dr. William P. Merrill, of the Brick Presbyterian Church of New York City, bore the striking title, "The One Fundamental." The one thing which he regarded as fundamental was the supremacy of the spiritual. Possession of the spirit of Jesus is the vital consideration. The test of Christian discipleship, the bond of Christian fellowship is love. In the evening Dr. Joseph C. Robbins gave an address, glowing with prophetic earnestness, upon "The Minister and His Ideals."

At the graduating exercises on Wednesday, twenty-five men received degrees. The degree of Master of Religious Education was conferred for the first time, two men receiving it. Six representatives of the class gave addresses. Of the nineteen regular members of the senior class, thirteen saw active service in the war. The empty sleeve of one of the speakers bore witness to the sacrifices on Vimy Ridge. The members of the class have been called to places of responsibility in city, rural district and mission field. A professor, over twenty years in service, declares the present year, on the whole, the best year of the two decades.

NEW YORK

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH of Croton, recently celebrated the first anniversary of the pastorate of W. S. K. Yeaple. Mr. Yeaple went to the Croton Church from the seminary in Rochester. He is also a graduate of Shurtleff College. During his twelve months with the church the building has been put in repair and redecorated. Plans are formulated to commence work about the middle of June on a new parsonage to be located on the lot adjacent to the church building. The completion of this will constitute one of the objectives for the coming year. All services are well attended.

Keuka College Closes Second Year

The closing exercises at Keuka College have been of unusual interest as they mark the termination of the second year of the college. The annual sermon was preached by Rev. E. T. Dahlberg of Buffalo, who took as his text, "Taking Up a Claim." The annual meeting of the board of trustees was held Monday, June 4. Judge Harvey Remington of Rochester was reelected president of the board. The board voted to continue its efforts to bring the assets of Keuka College to $1,000,000. The present plan is to raise $400,000 more endowment and erect another building. The college shares in the proceeds of the New World Movement and if the present plan is successful it will have adequate financial support. The student exercises terminated with "As You Like It" given in the natural amphitheater in the "Forest of Arden" on the college campus.

The college will open for its summer session on July 2, and the fall term will begin September 19. Six new members are to be added to the faculty, making a total number of eighteen. When the college opened, it was expected to fill the dormitory in five years. Keuka College has been a college for women but twenty-one months and every dormitory room is now engaged. A few more will be registered to make allowance for those who may not return, but the situation is such that a new building in the near future is necessary.

International Missionary Union

The fortieth session of this convention was held at Clifton Springs, N. Y., May 30—June 3. There are 1700 living members of this union in various mission fields throughout the world. There were 120 in attendance at this meeting. This is probably the only convention in the world where missionaries of all boards representing all mission fields, meet in open forum to consider the various problems which confront them.

The general theme was the consideration of the message in the Christian religion which most deeply impresses the non-Christian world. These were discussed by men and women of large experience. The different great religions were considered, and those appointed to lead these discussions were really great missionary statesmen, such leaders as Rev. Harlan R. Beach, Mr. Robert Wilder, Dr. S. M. Zwemer, Mrs. J. W. Emrich and many others.

The consensus of opinion was that the simple message of Christ's great love for humanity and his exemplification of this love in his life and death was the vital message of the missionary, and that only as the missionary manifests this Christ life in his own is his message heeded.

The scope of the interest shown by this body of most intelligent students of history is seen in the series of resolutions discussed and adopted, such as our interest in the World Court advocated by President Harding and commendation of his stand; denunciation of the white slave and opium traffics and suggestion of more specific regulations, etc.

The convention also adopted a resolution and sent a telegram to Governor Smith on the eve of the hearing on the repeal of the Mullan-Gage enforcement law, urging a veto. If the message could have contained all the electricity felt by the voters his hand would have been too paralyzed for him to have signed the bill the following day as he did.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

A DINNER GIVEN THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS and their wives or husbands by Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Stauff, on June 4, at the First Church, Pittsburgh, was a happy occasion. Following the dinner, Dr. C. W. Petty, pastor, and Dr. I. D. Metzger, chairman of the board of trustees, Dr. A. J. Bonsall, Dr. H. W. Ewalt, Mr. J. A. Brown and Rev. A. J. R. Schumaker were called upon for brief remarks. Mr. Stauff has served on the board for twenty-three years. Only those in close touch with the church extension department realize the amount of time given by Mr. Stauff and the painstaking and exact way in which all details of the department are attended to.

THE HOMEWOOD CHURCH GAVE a reception to its new pastor, Rev. B. F. Patt, Thursday evening, May 31. Mr. R. W. Long presided during the program of welcome. Mr. W. P. Beck spoke on behalf of the church, W. C. Chappell brought the greetings of the association, and Rev. F. L. Carr and Rev. R. N. Jessup of the neighborhood Baptist churches. Rev. D. N. Boswell, junior minister of the First Church, Pittsburgh, gave a short address and several of the ministers of other denominations in Homewood were present and extended a cordial welcome to Mr. Patt.

THE SHERADEN CHURCH has extended a call to Rev. W. J. John, formerly of Canonsburg.

MISS MILDRED DETRUDE HAS resigned as missionary at Beth Eden. She will spend the summer in Philadelphia assisting the pastor of one of the Baptist churches.

REV. W. C. CHAPPELL attended the commencement exercises of Hillsdale College, his alma mater. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him while there.

MRS. HENRY J. STANGE WAS presented a silver loving cup, Sunday, May 13, by the officers and teachers of the Union Baptist Church Bible school for a perfect attendance record of over twenty-five years. Mrs. Stange became a member of the school Jan. 1, 1898, and for the past twenty years has been a teacher of one of the adult Bible classes. All these years Mrs. Stange has resided in Sheraden. The presentation was made by Mr. J. J. Chisholm, superintendent for twenty years. Others with perfect attendance records are: Miss Cloyd Smith, who, after being carried in arms for three years, entered the beginner's class and has not missed a Sunday for nineteen years and five months. Next on the list comes Mrs. Alberta Henning and Miss Margurite Jenkins, each with seventeen years to their credit. Then comes John P. Isaacs, teacher of the young ladies' class, who has not missed a Sunday for thirteen years. Arthur Lee has a perfect attendance record for nine years.

WEST VIRGINIA

THE AVERAGE ATTENDANCE at the church school of the Baptist Temple, Charleston, for the month of May was 652. The church has broken ground for its new building and the work will be pushed from this time until its completion. The pastor, C. W. Kemper, was one of the speakers at the Broaddus commencement.

FRANKLIN COLLEGE closed its eighty-ninth year with the usual events of commencement week. On Sunday morning Secretary P. H. J. Lerrigo preached the missionary sermon. The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by Dr. E. Y. Mullins who used as his theme "The Master Passion." The commencement address was given by Dr. C. Wallace Petty of Pittsburgh on the theme "The Perils and Safeguards of Democracy." In the annual presidential address Dr. C. E. Goodell reviewed the past year and announced the program for the immediate future. During the year a number of changes in the faculty have occurred because larger institutions have sought members of Franklin's staff. Over $100,000 have been added to the financial resources of the college. The productive endowment now exceeds $750,000. During the past year the trustees launched a campaign for a building fund of three-quarters of a million, toward which Grafton Johnson, president of the board of trustees, made a conditional gift of $100,000. Two honorary degrees were conferred. Alva O. Neal of the University of Arizona received the degree of Doctor of Pedagogy; Secretary P. H. J. Lerrigo was given the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

MICHIGAN

Hillsdale College Commencement

The sixty-eighth commencement, and the first under the administration of Pres. William Gear Spencer, was marked by innovations which proved highly acceptable. Commencement day was moved back from the traditional Thursday to Monday, and was followed by the annual examinations.

President Spencer's report for the year and recommendations for expansion were strong and convincing, and were adopted. Outstanding features were the addition of $160,000 to the endowment during the year, a very considerable increase in student patronage and other growth in income, the purchase of three residences and their conversion into cottage dormitories, the gift of a tract of fourteen acres finely suited to an arboretum under the supervision of the department of biology, and lesser acquisitions to the property. The policy and specific projects for five years were approved by the boards.

The women commissioners reported that the undertaking assigned by the trustees to them, of remodeling and equipping the women's dormitory and the boarding department at a cost of about $40,000 and liquidating the cost in five years, had been finished in two years. They returned the building to the trustees debt-free. To them has now been committed a much larger undertaking covering a series of years, and they are forming plans for the same.

Hon. Grant M. Hudson, former director of the Michigan board of promotion, now congressman from the district which includes the capital of the state, is a trustee of the college and participated in some of the sessions of the board. His successor as the Baptist director, Dr. John E. Smith, was a commencement visitor at the college meetings and the social events at homes in the city.

Judge William E. Ambler, of Cleveland, of life-long loyalty to the college, has for many years been the chairman of the trustees and was re-elected. At the conclusion of the meeting he said that he had never had such a comfortable feeling over the condition of the college and its future as now. Mrs. Joseph W. Mauck was reelected as chairman of the women commissioners. She is also one of the several women who are members of the board of trustees.

The annual debate of the Alpha society, for which Trustee James E. Davidson, of the class of '87, gives $75 in gold each year, was peculiarly attractive in that Mr. Davidson himself presided. The St. Lawrence deep-water subject was debated, and Mr. Davidson, who has long been and is on federal and other boards dealing with shipping and related projects, gave a talk on the Great-Lakes-St. Lawrence question while the judges were making the award.

The baccalaureate sermon and the graduating exercises were the outstanding events. President Spencer's first baccalaureate sermon, from the text "God so loved that he gave," was masterful in exposition of the theme that giving of service and treasure is the highest expression of love.

The commencement address was given by United States Senator Simeon D. Fess of Ohio, who had a notable career as an educator and college president before attaining the place he now has in the public service of the nation. The place of the scholar in leadership and the peculiar obligations for service which rest upon college men and women were treated with compelling power.

The honorary degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon Senator Fess. The same was bestowed upon Henry W. Magee, a Chicago lawyer, who entered the preparatory class of Hillsdale College in the first year of its life, sixty-seven years ago. Interrupting his course for his self-support, and with other students offering his service to his country on the day Ft. Sumter was attacked, he served until the close of the war, and was graduated from Hillsdale in 1867. After admission to the bar he made a tour of the world, working passage in several ways, and on the western plains joined the party of Duke Alexis of Russia who was then cultivating friendly relations of his country and the United States. On this trip, Mr. Magee was present at the opening of the Union Pacific Railroad, the first transcontinental line, and the Suez Canal; and he was the first visitor, official or unofficial, from America to the Bengal-Orissa mission field, in which many students of Hillsdale have been missionaries.

The honorary degree of Master of Arts was given to Ernest H. Barnes, of the fine-arts faculty of the University of Michigan, who began his art study in Hillsdale College; that of Doctor of Divinity upon Rev. Will C. Chappell, a graduate of Hillsdale, 1902, and Union Seminary, and now executive secretary of the Pittsburgh Baptist union; Doctor of Science upon Professor Frank Smith, of the biologic research faculty of the University of Illinois, graduate and former science professor at Hillsdale.

The bachelor degree and state teachers' certificate were bestowed upon the graduating class, whose ivy-planting exercises on the campus and passing of their senior caps to the juniors finished the entrance of another class to the ranks of the alumni.

An unusual if not unprecedented feature of the season, was the retirement of Dr. Melville W. Chase, at the age of eighty-one from active service at the end of an unbroken tenure of fifty-four years as the head of the department of music and organist of the college church. Regrets are in a measure tempered by his continuance with the rank director-emeritus of music and a moderate retiring honorarium.

REV. L. D. LAMKIN IS ACTING AS STATED supply of the church at Danvers. The church wants to settle a strong man as soon as possible. Mr. Lamkin will continue in the evangelistic field.

REV. L. C. TAYLOR CONDUCTED eleven days of special meetings at the Minonk Church, as a result of which twenty persons united with the church, fifteen by baptism. Twelve were the heads of families. This totals twenty-four additions to the church since the coming of Mr. Taylor to this field last September. One young man has volunteered for life service. The second year's work in the Keystone training course has been completed with sixteen graduates. Plans are on foot for repainting and decorating the parsonage. The church showed its appreciation of Mr. Taylor's work by an advance of $100 in salary.

ILLINOIS

THE BUNKER HILL CHURCH, Rev. John J. Shuler pastor, is making steady progress. The Children's Day program brought out a large congregation on a very rainy night. The offering was $26.

THERE WAS EVIDENCE OF GENUINE SORROW when the congregation of the First Church, Elgin, came to the time of saying goodbye to Rev. A. D. McGlashan and family. A total of 311 new members have been received into the church and every department has felt inflow of the new life. Mr. McGlashan and family are making the trip to Mount Shasta in northern California by automobile. They left Elgin, June 11, in a new car, the gift of the members and friends of the church.

IOWA

CALVARY CHURCH, OF DES MOINES, had a three weeks revival meeting during May. Rev. Harry Vom Bruch, evangelist, assisted by Mr. James Harrison, pianist and Bible teacher, both of Chicago, accomplished an excellent work. During their stay more than 100 persons pledged their acceptance of the Lord Jesus Christ. A number of these united with Calvary Church. Others have joined neighboring churches. A personal workers' class, conducted by the pastor, Rev. H. O. Meyer, throughout the winter months, laid a foundation among a group of his own members. The thought and work and prayers that preceded the meetings quickened in many a deeper sense of their personal responsibility toward the growth of the kingdom. The church is now experiencing the results of a most refreshing season of spiritual revival. Additions are being made to the church every week, some from the members of the congregation who have been faithful in attendance but who have never before known the salvation of Jesus, some brought in through the influence of new members, or newly aroused older ones.

Des Moines

THE FIRST CHURCH, Des Moines, celebrated its final payment of its mortgage May 20 with a special program. Mr. E. S. Hunn burned the mortgage and Rev. Robt. T. Craig, pastor, spoke of the accomplishments of the past and the prospects of the future of the church.

PRESIDENT JOHN W. MILLION, Rev. J. Orrin Gould, Rev. Victor N. Witter, Rev. Hugh Moore, and Mr. and Mrs. B. W. Armstrong, of the University Baptist church were in attendance at the Northern Baptist Convention. The total enrolment from Iowa to the convention was thirty.

STUDENTS AND FACULTY OF DES MOINES University recently enjoyed an inspiring address on "The Mono Indians" by Dr. Bruce Kinney of Denver. Doctor Kinney remained in the city a day renewing acquaintances. He is perhaps the best posted man in the denomination concerning the religious work among the American Indians.

COMMENCEMENT WEEK AT DES MOINES UNIVERSITY, May 31 to June 6, set another milestone in the history of the institution. The program included as the most outstanding events, the university assembly by the senior class; the oratorio, "Redemption;" the commencement fete; the baccalaureate sermon by President Million; and the commencement address by Rev. Clarence A. Barbour, president of Rochester Theological Seminary; the presentation of diplomas and conferring of degrees; scholarship awards and the reception given by the president. One hundred and fifty-three received degrees: B. A. 28; B. S. 19; B. A. in music 2; Ph. G. 49; diploma in education 54; Th. B. 1.

THE SUMMER SCHOOL OPENED JUNE 11 with 320 registered the second day. The summer courses of the university are becoming popular among the teachers of the state.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE DES MOINES-WESTERN Association is being held at Rockwell City this week.

PASTOR GEO. C. CONRAD OF KEOTA, was a recent visitor at Des Moines University. He received his B. A. degree commencement week.

PASTOR J. G. EATON RECENTLY baptized six young people into the fellowship of the church at Fairbank.

THE MISSOURI VALLEY CHURCH is progressing under the leadership of Rev. M. C. Powers who recently went to that field.

NORTH DAKOTA

REV. F. E. STOCKTON, SUPERINTENDENT of the work in North Dakota, received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from Sioux Falls College at its recent commencement.

THE MEETING OF THE CONVENTION will be held at Fargo, Oct. 3-7. It is the fortieth anniversary of the organized work in the state and great preparations are being made for a suitable observance.

REV. JOHN GERALD YORK HAS closed his work at Grand Forks. He has proved himself an able preacher and faithful pastor, and is loyal to the whole program of the denomination.

NEBRASKA

AFTER A PASTORATE of four years, Rev. H. M. Wyrick, has resigned. He is to complete his seminary course in Louisville. Mr. Wyrick will supply the First Church, Lincoln, during a part of the summer.

Commencement at Pillsbury Academy

The baccalaureate sermon was preached on Sunday evening by Dr. John A. Earl, pastor of the First Church of St. Paul on "Christ is all." On Monday afternoon, the cadets met the members of the Owatonna High School in a track meet. Their winning over the high school by twenty points gave just ground for hilarity since the latter held the championship over the high schools of the state outside the Twin Cities. The annual prize contest in declamation on Monday evening was a delight. Tuesday was a military drill and the term music recital.

On Wednesday morning, during the forty-sixth annual commencement program, six members chosen from the senior class, competed for cash prizes. The interest on the money of Mrs. Margaret Pillsbury's gift of $5,000 makes these prizes possible; the interest stimulated by such prizes is manifest. After the commencement luncheon in Jefts dining hall, several spicy and pointed after-dinner talks were enjoyed. If any one doubts the place in education of such a secondary school as Pillsbury Academy, he should have heard the speakers. One in ten from our high schools goes to college; for over fifteen years, eight in ten from Pillsbury Academy have attended college, said Principal M. B. Price. The outstanding orator of Carleton College this year, and one of the three leading debaters in Hamline University are graduates of the academy.

One trustee with his kind and always timely suggestions was keenly missed about the grounds—the late Frank C. Nickels.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

REV. JAMES S. WEST, pastor of the First Church, San Francisco, has adopted as a slogan "No Summer Slump." The church calendar says: "There is no reason in the world why there should be the slightest slump in any phase of our work here, during the summer months upon which we are now entering. God has blessed us with a summer climate in which it is just as pleasant for church in July and August as in any other part of the year. Of course, most of our people will take a vacation of a few days or weeks, and this is as it should be. But hundreds of our members and hundreds of thousands of people will be right here in the city every day of the week and Sunday, too, throughout the summer. These make possible a great, growing, restful summer drive."

Bible Stories

The restoration of that familiarity with the contents of the Bible which our forefathers possessed is an achievement greatly desired by all leaders of Christian thought or activity today. Theologians, pastors, teachers and parents are at one in regretting the comparative ignorance of the simplest facts of biblical history or narrative which young people, even those who claim considerable culture, often display. They recognize, as do all who review the expression of human interests in current literature, the relative barrenness of mind and narrowness of outlook which prevail in regard to religious matters, and that much of this is evidently due to ignorance.

That the Bible is the finest possible source book for religious training, however assumed theoretically, does not seem to be recognized in practice as it deserves to be. Those who read it regularly in accordance with some plan are all too few. Those who are capable of giving instruction to others in regard to it are hard to find. The reason is chiefly in the fact that family instruction and discussion has become so generally neglected that the Bible seems as remote and as difficult to the average young man or woman as any text book on science or philosophy.

This should not be so. The English Bible is as much as ever a reservoir of rich religious experience awaiting interpretation and adaptation by each new human being in turn. It records the religious emotions and longings of all kinds of people. It fits every one somewhere and every phase of life, however deep or bitter, in some fashion. No young person should fail to enter this golden treasury of religious aspiration and devotion. The key which opens it is that love for the Bible which grows out of a real familiarity with its contents. Whoever really knows the Bible, even in a halting fashion, comes to realize its depth and power, and to draw more and more upon its interpretations of life.

The best way to get this familiarity is the good old way of beginning with the simple yet wonderful stories of the Bible. How they cover the whole range of religious history, and religious experience, the selections which make up the volumes of this series show. Their name is legion. As a matter of fact much of the Old Testament early narrative consists of stories. Biblical history is concrete rather than abstract. An era is described by relating the experiences of some one who was a principal factor in it. The greater part of Genesis might be fittingly described as the narratives about Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. So, too, the stirring century in which the Hebrews came to a sense of nationalism is properly recorded as the days of Samuel, Saul, David and Solomon. The whole range of history in fact, as recorded in the Bible, can be surveyed more or less thoroughly through similar stories.—"Graded Bible Stories," by W. J. Mutch, Doran.

Community Church Workers Hold National Meeting

By Orvis F. Jordan

The reduction of over-churching in suburban and rural communities is going on rapidly in various parts of the country by a variety of processes. In some instances denominations have withdrawn from one field in order to secure an exclusive cultivation of another, the exchange being arranged by denominational leaders. In other cases, as notably in Massachusetts, the state federation of churches has assisted in the organization of federated churches with the blessing of denominational authorities. In many communities the initiative has been taken by the people themselves. There are now over 860 community and federated churches, the vast majority being independent of denominational control or connection. In the past these churches have had no fellowship and the ministers, aside from a few regional conferences, have never come together.

The first national conference of community church workers was held in Chicago, May 22-24. It was attended by about 200 people, who came from twenty-eight different states. Many denominational and interdenominational organizations provided speakers for the program, though the sessions for the most part were used in hearing addresses from the workers themselves. Among the secretarial visitors were Rev. E. Tallmadge Root, of Boston; Prof. Alva W. Taylor, of Indianapolis; Dr. David M. Latshaw, of New York. Prof. R. E. Hieronymus, of the University of Illinois, gave an inspiring address on "The Leadership of the Church in the Life of the Community." Rev. C. C. Morrison spoke on "The World Community and the Church."

In the one-minute reports from all the members of the conference, it appeared that in four years the churches of the movement had at least doubled their membership, in so far as they were represented by the men of the conference. Various typical local problems were presented for study and discussion. One of the problems of these churches is that of missionary activity. Various solutions of this problem were offered. The Chicago Tract Society had a representative present with a strong bid for support. Doctor Hung, dean of the School of Religion of Peking University, suggested that the community churches would do well to support union educational institutions in the orient. The Home Missions Council was represented by a speaker who suggested some union projects in home missions. St. Paul's Union church, where the sessions were held, reported that it was supporting eight missionaries at home and abroad.

Another problem was the question of denominational relationships. It developed that most of the ministers in the conference have ministerial standing through a denomination. The denominations represented were Presbyterian, Congregational, Disciples, Baptist, Methodist and Church of Christian Union. It seemed to be agreed that ministers should continue to secure their ministerial standing in this way as a guarantee that the movement did not seek to become a separate denomination. It was also suggested that the community church minister could serve his denomination by carrying to it the message of Christian unity and by securing support for missionary enterprises which were of such a nature as to command the united support of a community church.

Every one agreed that no effort should be made to state any doctrinal conviction in the conference, since it is not a church but rather a fellowship of workers. The conference was organized permanently with a corps of officers and to it were committed several tasks. One was to print the presidential address of the year as a tract for the movement. Another was to set up a service bureau which would provide information as to ministers and churches, but which would offer no recommendations. In the presidential address this year on "The Future of the Community Church Movement" the following is suggested: "One can scarcely believe that a wide-spread independent movement of the people such as the organization of hundreds of community churches is displeasing to the Holy Spirit. The prayer of Jesus for the unity of believers is finding a partial fulfilment in this movement. The democratic movement of the people for Christian union in local communities can well shake hands with the movement of the church leaders of the world who are seeking Christian unity by negotiations at the top. In Canada the organic union of Methodists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians was preceded by a community church movement which spread all over the northwest. The spirit of this movement must never be critical or unfriendly. While disapproving of the efforts of some denominational leaders to increase confusion in the religious world by organizing churches in communities where they are not needed, the attitude of a community church to the denominational churches must be friendly or its message is stultified. If the movement will continue to live with such watchwords as service, cooperation, fraternity and piety, it must serve most acceptably in realizing the will of God in our day."

The sessions this year were presided over by Rev. O. F. Jordan of Park Ridge, Ill.; Rev. F. J. Malzard, of Wyoming, N. Y., was secretary. The officers for the new year are: Pres., Rev. J. H. Feely, of Philadelphia; vice-pres., Rev. J. A. McGaughey, of Imperial, Cal.; secy., Charles E. Coleman, of Chicago; treas., Rev. C. E. Henry, Stuart, Ia. The editors of the leading journal of the movement, the Unity Messenger, are Rev. O. F. Jordan, and Rev. David R. Piper, of Park Ridge, Ill.

The task of securing accurate statistics of the movement will be prosecuted vigorously during the coming year. In the last month the existence of sixty new churches has been discovered. It is also proposed to support a community adviser who shall respond to invitations from communities who wish aid in organizing community churches and who shall visit communities where the church may have fallen into difficulties. The new executive committee will at once seek funds for this purpose.

World Alliance and World Education

his prose style was like the prose style of John Milton. After the American Civil War, Barnas Sears, president of Brown University, in an interview with Robert C. Winthrop of Boston outlined a plan for the use of a large educational fund for the South, broken and impoverished by war. Winthrop was the adviser of George Peabody, the philanthropist and donor of the Peabody fund. Sears became the first secretary of the fund and was succeeded by J. L. M. Curry, an eminent Southen Baptist. This fund was operative for fifty years when according to the terms of the charter, the principal was distributed. It was the model and inspirer of other great funds. Brown University, by the way, is associated with the names of Eliphalet Nott, Francis Wayland, Horace Mann, J. B. Angell, John Hay, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., each of whom is in a remarkable way connected with the spread of education. It would be a pleasure to make an excursion into this field, to recall the lustrous names of our denomination who have served their own and later generations in the things of the mind and spirit but space prevents. Such an excursion would show the amplitude, grandeur, and promise of life and introduce us to the society of men equal to or greater than Plutarch's heroes. Emerson says. "Go with mean people and you think life is mean. Then read Plutarch and the world is a proud place, peopled with men of positive quality, with heroes standing about us."

I have thought the Baptist denomination has some peculiar traits which should put it in vital sympathy with the education of man the world over for the majority of mankind today cannot read the sacred scriptures in any language or dialect. It is extremely democratic in spirit. This fact gives it sympathy with all men, makes it fearless of popular movements, brings it near to what Mr. Lincoln with rare understanding called "the common man." Besides it has never been a state or national church so that as it moves among

Papini's Life of Christ

BY W. T. ELMORE

The Translator

O one would think of this book as a translation. The English is exquis- e. So complete is the sympathy of the ranslator with the work of the author hat the translation appears to have all he force and beauty of the original. It s interesting to note that Strauss' "Life f Christ" was also translated by a oman, George Eliot.

Dorothy Canfield Fisher, now well alled, "woman of letters," is an inter- sting personality. She was born in awrence, Kans., where her father was rofessor of history in the state univer- ity. When she was twelve years of age er father became chancellor of the Uni- ersity of Nebraska at Lincoln. The amily remained here four years, then hancellor Canfield was called to the residency of Ohio State University. Here the daughter took her college de- ree. Later her father became librarian t Columbia, where he died some years go. Dorothy Canfield took the degree f Ph.D. in Columbia.

Dorothy Canfield Fisher now lives with her husband and two children on he old Canfield place in Vermont, which as been in the family since colonial ys. Her mother lives near. The kind f a mother she is needs no further evelation than the following couplet:

I am the mother of a star,
So fair and bright she shines, and far,
On distant land and shimmering sea,
And still she softly shines on me."

Her Christian Faith

George Eliot had the remnants of her aith shattered when she translated Strauss' "Life of Christ." Willa Cather, who was a student in the University of Nebraska, and assisted Dorothy Canfield n some of her first literary efforts as a chool girl in Lincoln, strays further and urther away. In "One of Ours" she akes actual characters, and only slightly lisguising them, quite distorts their ctual lives in order to make thrusts at hristianity, churches, ministers and nissionaries. What about Dorothy Can- ield?

Chancellor Canfield was a striking, igorous, unforgettable personality. In our years he transformed the Univer- ity of Nebraska from a provincial school o a university of first rank. He was a taunch Episcopalian, vigorous and con- ervative in theology. He was a strong eligious influence in the university. His hapel services will never be forgotten. Dorothy Canfield has a good religious oundation.

In "The Bent Twig" we have what ppears to be a composite of the state niversities of Kansas, Nebraska, and Ohio. The heroine has the religious struggles which may well believe beset the author, but she wins through and regains her faith. In "The Brimming Cup," which has been said to be the antidote to "Main Street," the heroine again maintains her faith, and continues to serve in the village church and Sunday school. And now comes this sympathetic translation of the "Life of Christ," in which the point of view is that of the conservative theologian, and the spirit that of the devout, adoring Christian. The translator must share this view or never could she have given us this book as it is in the English. We may well rejoice that one so able is upholding the faith of her fathers, and we may well believe that constructive Christianity will profit more and more by her abilities and devotion.

Giovanni Papini

Forty-two years ago Papini was born of poor parents in Florence. He has risen until he is considered the foremost man of letters in Italy. He tells us how under the influence of the war he took up the Gospels after having re-read Tolstoy and Dostoievsky. His studies convinced him of the necessity of the transformation of human souls for the hope of the world. This can be accomplished only by religion, and he considered the religion of Christ the most suitable.

With this intellectual beginning, he says: "In 1919 I began on a sudden to write my book, and in writing it I became more than ever persuaded of the truth of the Gospels and the divinity of Christ. In 1920 Christ led me to the church."

Thus was changed "a hater rather than a lover of his kind, a master of invective, anarchist, atheist, nihilist," into a devout Christian.

The Book

The only way to appreciate this book is to read it. One cannot dip into it anywhere without realizing its power. Papini states that his intention is to compel people again to consider Christ. He is true to the narrative, but with undreamed of realism he makes the Christ stand before us.

We see the farmer behind his plow, the blacksmith at his forge, the housewife starting her fire, gathering the eggs, and getting the supper. We hear the tread of the soldiers, the roar of the storm and the muttering of his enemies. We walk entranced in the days long gone by and the land far away, and we feel that the Christ lived and still lives. To make the Christ real will be the great contribution of this book.

Papini's Attitude Towards Criticism

Papini disclaims that this is a critical life of Christ. He accepts the records of the Gospels. There is evidence that he is well acquainted with the critical study of the Bible and the Gospels. He makes use of this in his harmonizing of the accounts. But as for destructive criticism, there is none at all.

Strauss, the German, wrote his life of Christ on the mythical theory. Renan, the Frenchman, wrote his on the romance theory. Papini, the Italian, writes his with no theory, but accepts the Gospel records on simple faith,—faith founded on the finest literary training and erudition.

His Attitude Towards Fundamental Beliefs

The virgin birth is not mentioned. The narrative begins with the birth of Jesus in the stable. There is no intimation as to the reason for beginning here. His statements concerning Mary in later parts of the work do not indicate that he was trying to avoid the question.

He accepts the miracles and uses them. His treatment of miracles, however, is illuminating. Contrary to what might be expected from a Catholic, he makes but little of the wonder performed, but makes much of the spiritual values of the miracles.

The resurrection of Jesus, and his ascension into heaven are treated very fully and with absolute literalness. He believes in the bodily resurrection.

He closes his work with these words: "No divine promise can be blotted out: the May cloud which hid him from sight still hovers near the earth, and every day we raise our weary and mortal eyes to that same heaven from which he will descend in the terrible splendor of his glory." He accepts the literal second coming of Christ, but in no way goes into detail.

His belief in the deity of Christ is absolute. He does not philosophize about it, but believes it.

Papini and Roman Catholic Beliefs

Papini is a Catholic. There was no other church on his horizon. He says he accepts the dogmas of the church. However, as we read his book we believe that he would be acceptable as a member with any of us in practically every particular.

The sacraments—Baptism is by immersion. He speaks of it as a washing, but it is a symbol; he does not speak of it as a saving sacrament. He says that Jesus by his baptism bore witness to his death and resurrection. The Lord's Supper shows the influence of Catholic teaching. He says as Jesus once changed water to wine, now he changes wine to blood. He, however, says that the supper symbolizes the changed life. He does not mention any saving power in the eucharist. He also mentions that the supper is "in memory of me." It appears that his mind is struggling to get away from sacramentarianism.

The Virgin Mary.—In the introduction Papini tells us that he has refrained from developing the episodes in which Mary appears for fear of making the work too long. He even contemplates writing another volume of which she shall be the chief subject. Yet it is strange that he almost omits her from the record. He mentions that the church makes a woman the link between the Son and the sons. He gives the episode where Christ says, "Who is my mother?" We are led to wonder if in his heart he is not hesitating a little to support the Catholic idea of the virgin.

Peter.—He takes quite literally the statement that the church is to be founded upon Peter and his "legitimate successors." Yet again, "Thou, Peter, shalt be hard and staunch as a rock, and upon the staunchness of thy faith in me, which thou wast the first to profess, is founded the Christian society, the humble seed of the kingdom." And again we find ourselves not far apart from Papini.

Our Book Shelf

A Year in John's Gospel, Devotional Studies for Every Day, by Annie Richardson Kennedy. New York: Fleming H. Revell. $.

This is an arrangement of John's Gospel for daily devotional study. Each page is given to a scripture selection taken in order and treated topically with a brief meditation and prayer. The style is attractive and the meditations set forth seed thoughts which may be developed. The author has grasped the deep spiritual note running through the book and has treated it so as to contribute to the purpose of the Gospel itself.

In the Footsteps of the Master, Sermon Outlines on St. Mark's Gospel, by J. H. Masterman. New York: MacMillan.

A series of expository articles which originally appeared in a church family newspaper. The author has followed the Master as his life and ministry are set forth by Mark. He has given a fitting theme and a brief but suggestive outline to each new phase of Jesus' thought and ministry. The work is really a homiletical commentary and any pastor will find it a help in the prayer service as well as for general sermonic work.

Blowing Weather, by John T. McIntyre. New York: Century Co. $1.90.

An excellently written, corking good sea story. It has a tang and a wholesome atmosphere as fresh and invigorating as the sea itself. The action takes place in the eighteenth century at the time Citizen Genet visited this country. Anthony Stevens, nephew of the head of the merchant firm of Rufus Stevens' Sons, was mysteriously summoned from New Orleans to Philadelphia, the headquarters of the company, because of rumors of the peculiar and unexplained loss of several of the firm's vessels. Anthony finally succeeds in saving the ancient and honorable house from bankruptcy after a voyage to the mythical Sargasso Sea.

Lincoln: An Account of His Personal Life, by Nathaniel Wright Stephenson. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill. $3.

Abundant unto satiety though the Lincoln literature is, yet this new work claims a place for itself, and is among the best of the biographies which undertake to portray the development of personality and the maturing of character which had their ultimate issue in the Lincoln of history.

The author reveals—though he does not parade—an intimate and exhaustive acquaintance with all the important sources for a clear insight into the history of the times and into the career of his subject. Particularly does this knowledge bear fruit in the discussion of Lincoln's administration of the "war powers," and his wearisome and vexatious controversy with the "vindictives" in Congress, led by Wade and Chandler. Doubtless Lincoln's steadfast insistence on the constitutional right to control those powers in the prosecution of the war, rather than yield them to Congress, made the way easier for McKinley in 1898 and for Wilson in 1917.

Mr. Stephenson uses frankly and freely such terms concerning Lincoln's policies and public services as "failure," "narrow vision," "vacillation," which we are not wont to associate with Lincoln. The following paragraph sets forth his interpretation of the Emancipator President, and also indicates the high quality of the style and diction in which the book is written:

"There is a period of sixteen months—from February, 1861, to a day in June, 1862—when Lincoln is the most singular, the most problematic of statesmen. Out of this period he issues with apparent abruptness, the final Lincoln, with a place among the few consummate masters of statecraft. During the sixteen months his genius comes and goes. His confidence, whether in himself or in others, is an uncertain quantity. At times he is bold, even rash; at others, irresolute. The constant factor in his mood all this while is his amazing humility. He seems to have forgotten his own existence. As a person with likes and dislikes, with personal hopes and fears, he has vanished. He is but an afflicted and perplexed mind, struggling desperately to save his country. A selfless man, he may be truly called, through months of torment which made him over from a theoretical to a practical statesman. He entered this period a literary man who had been elevated almost by accident to the position of a leader in politics. After many blunders, after doubt, hesitation and pain, he came forth from this stern ordeal a powerful man of action."

OUR MUSIC CORNER

CONDUCTED BY WILLIAM LESTER

Music in Protestant Worship

How should music be employed in Protestant worship? First, in the united singing of the great congregation. Our idea of church worship being congregational, the primary duty of those privileged to direct the service of song is to promote and lead the voices of the greatest number in their vocal tribute to the throne of grace. It should be the recognized duty and privilege of every worshipper, as part of his Protestant birthright, to join, as a general rule, in the hymns of every service (I could explain my reservation if time permitted), and where that privilege is most generally, reverently, and intelligently exercised, there is the first condition of our Protestant worship music best attained. I have said "reverently and intelligently" because I must not be misunderstood to mean that the heartiest singing, in the true sense of the word, always means the greatest mass of strident sound. There are some hymns which it would be sacrilege to shout; there are many which should be sung quietly, as becomes their burden of solemn contemplation; there are verses which, to be truly hearty, should be almost whispered before God. But whether the hymn be the shout of a triumphant host, or the solemn recital of the church's faith or experience, or a penitential prayer, it should, to be ideal, carry with it every voice, where there is a voice, and every heart without exception.

I assume, as a matter of course, that in all our sanctuaries there will be either the best obtainable organ or the best obtainable harmonium, according to their resources, and a four-part choir, varying in numbers with the dimensions of our buildings, but large enough effectively to lead their respective congregations, and representing the best talent and culture of our people. But I cannot leave this brief reference to congregational hymn-singing without expressing the conviction that comparatively few of our organists and choirmasters are fully conscious of the wonderful resources, musical as well as devotional, contained in the rendering of our hymns.

We are often told that organists and choirs must have other and more varied music to keep them employed and interested, and I am about presently to express a wide sympathy with the higher development of our church music. But let it be understood that for organist and choir, as well as congregations, the proper rendering of the hymns should be the first duty. And, in proportion as the rendering of those hymns is studied, art and reverence joining hands in the endeavor worthily to produce in worship-song the measures of our great hymn-book, so will that study be found interesting as well as profitable in the highest degree.

I have referred to the cultivation of congregational hymn-singing as the first feature of the music of Protestant worship. But I presume there are few Puritans left who would today hold that it is the only one. Not even the possession of our inimitable hymn-book should deprive us of the privilege of singing the actual words of scripture by our choirs and in our congregations through the medium of suitable chants and service settings. I am aware that congregational chanting is not easy of attainment, but it is attainable, and the effect of a great multitude praising God in the words of David and Asaph, commencing their Sabbath morning service with the invocation "Come, let us sing unto the Lord," and the evening with the very song in which Mary "Magnified the Lord," or Zacharias "Blessed the God of Israel," is worth the labor and patience by which it is achieved.

Our reference to the privilege of singing the exact words of scripture naturally suggests the next section of our subject—the place of the anthem in Protestant evangelical worship. My friends who are aware of my past connection with the service of praise will be prepared for my advocating its use, not only on the admissible ground of the attractiveness and variety thus introduced into our services, but on the much higher ground of direct spiritual blessing.

Anthems may be in a measure, and with ever-growing education and culture probably will increasingly be adaptable to congregational use. But the resources of the select voices which we call a choir will always be greater, and the range of sacred composition will always be higher than can be attained by the multitude. I certainly advocate that the higher powers of the few should be among the talents dedicated to God and used by the church in its public services. And I am ready to appeal to scripture, to experience, or to sanctified commonsense in this contention.

Do you think that the primitive church had but one form of song in its service? Admitted that the New Testament—probably with design—gives us little detail for modern guidance, yet we have here and there significant indications which have probably not received the attention they deserve. St. Paul enjoins the Ephesian Christians to "admonish one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs," apparently a triple division of the vocal music of the sanctuary, corresponding (as excellent commentators think) to the hymns, psalms, and anthems of our later times. It would not be good exegesis to suggest that this phrase represented a mere redundancy of expression; and when we find the exact words reproduced in his letter to the Colossians, we are the more convinced that "singing to one another" means something other than the combined praise of the whole congregation, and that at least some diversity and variety of early church music is advocated.

And if the objection be once more heard that for a choir to sing to a congregation cannot be an act of worship, I appeal to the experience of thousands that it often is felt to be a very gracious act of worship, rich in edifying the hearers, as illustrated from the eventful day of Wesley's conversion, when he went, as he tells us, into St. Paul's cathedral, and heard the anthem, "Out of the deep have I called unto thee, O Lord," as a preparation for the "strange heart-warming" of the Moravian meeting-house in the evening—typical of the two stems of our spiritual ancestry—down to the times when we ourselves have seen or felt Ira D. Sankey or Philip Phillips sway the hearts of thousands by their songs of salvation.

I instantly admit that my very illustration has its own significance with respect to the qualifications—other than artistic—proper for those who play our organs, and sing for Christ in our choirs. That is true, and I press its significance this day on my brethren associated with us in the sacred order of "the singers and players of the house of the Lord." To which I will add this, that in proportion as the church recognizes the use of these talents, and accepts their dedication, her own sons and daughters will, and do, offer their God-given treasures of voice and finger, taste and culture, to her service.

Let the anthem be a means of "keeping the choir together" and of interesting additional worshippers by all means, but that is not my standpoint for its advocacy today. For myself I would hallow it or exclude it. To me it is either a means of grace or a "sounding brass or tinkling cymbal." The selection of an anthem for any given choir and its employment in any particular service should be made with a primary view to direct spiritual edification. The subject first, and then its musical beauty and suitability, should guide its adoption. With this end in view, whilst it should sometimes be difficult enough to call out and develop the best powers of our choristers, yet it should be so well adapted to those powers as not—in the rendering—to require extreme effort, nor suggest display, but always to be capable of reverent expression and religious purpose. Whenever practicable, let the anthem be topical—that is to say, let its subject have distinct reference to the significance of any anniversary or special service in which it is employed. Illustrations of felicity of selection would crowd upon the memory if the exigencies of our time permitted. I think these old walls could tell of some. I believe some effort in the direction of appropriateness is usually made on special occasions, though one does sometimes hear of outrageous incongruities, the very report of which is a reproach to us.—Sir George Smith in Nonconformist Musical Journal.

Copies of Report on Future Denominational Program

The revised report of the committee on future denominational program adopted at the Atlantic City meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention is now in the hands of the American Baptist Publication Society. A document will be issued containing

1. This revised report.

2. The resolution adopted at Atlantic City that the General Board of Promotion be requested to carry out the plan adopted by the convention at Minneapolis in 1916.

3. A full statement of the above plan adopted at Minneapolis.

4. The report of the finance committee presented at Atlantic City.

Copies of this document will be sent to each state convention secretary with the request that each secretary see that one copy gets to every church in the Northern Baptist Convention and is carefully considered by the church and further with the request that the document be read to each state convention and that each state convention express its approval of the plans set forth in the report of the committee on future denominational program.

In view of the high cost of printing it is evidently impossible to print enough copies to flood thirty-six states with this document. One copy for each church and state convention should be ample. None of our treasuries can afford to waste any money. Every effort will be made at once to start the great work contemplated this year. The executive committee of the convention earnestly requests every state convention secretary and every church in our denomination to cooperate heartily with the General Board of Promotion in its efforts to discharge the great duty which confronts us during the current convention year.

W. C. Bitting.

Chaplains for the Navy

According to a statement recently put forth by a joint conference representing the churches and the war department; the men in the army and navy "have a definite constitutional right to the religious ministrations their consciences demand. Both the government and the churches would be false to their trust were those rights denied or due care not taken to meet them."

At last after considerable delay and discussion the size of the navy has been decided for the present. It is found that a number of men are needed as chaplains in the navy. Our Baptist quota is not full. We want several Baptist men at once.

According to regulations all applicants must be under thirty-one years of age. They are expected to have a college and seminary training. They should be men in first-class physical condition. It is necessary that they be men of marked intellectual capacity and with high administrative ability. Above all, as the crown of all, they must be men of irreproachable Christian character, who are devoted to Christ, who love men and have ability as preachers.

The position of chaplain in the navy is a most desirable one. The salary ranges from some $2400 to $7200 a year. The chaplains now have a chaplains' corps, with a head chaplain whose duty it is to look after their interests and aid in the work.

It is hoped that there may be several Baptist men who will seek appointment in the navy. Apply to Capt. Evan W. Scott, Navy Department, Washington, D. C., for blanks and for further information. As a representative of the committee of chaplains I shall be glad to approve all worthy applicants and to aid them in every way.

—Samuel Z. Batten.

Important Announcement for Stockholm Delegates

Dr. W. C. Bitting, secretary of the Northern Baptist Convention, reported on June 4 that he had issued credentials to 420 delegates, to the meeting of the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm, July 21-27. Doubtless a good many others will even yet secure credentials. Some who have secured credentials will not attend, but probably as many as 400 Baptists from Northern territory, including representatives of the Swedish Conference, will go to Stockholm. We do not know how many may be expected from the Southern Baptist Convention and from the National Baptist Convention (negro).

Northern Baptist delegates who have not yet received their credentials should communicate immediately with Dr. W. C. Bitting, 5109 Waterman Ave., St. Louis, Mo., giving full name and address and indicating the church in which membership is held by the prospective delegate or delegates. A self-addressed, stamped envelope should be enclosed for use in mailing the credentials.

Within the last week or so a few berths have been surrendered on the official ship for Northern Baptists, the "America," sailing June 30, by delegates or others who cannot go to Europe this year, and there is a possibility of accommodations being secured even yet on that vessel. A great many people are accepting sleeping accommodations in what has ordinarily been used for third-class passengers, in order to cross on the "America," but this is not recommended by the committee to promote attendance.

Many of the delegates have failed to make hotel reservations at Stockholm. They should communicate immediately with Mr. H. S. Myers, 276 Fifth Ave., New York City.

In all probability at least 700 American Baptists will attend the meeting at Stockholm. The Baptists of Norway expect to send a delegation of about 100. Probably several hundred will go from Great Britain, and about 200 from Central and Southern European countries. Denmark will be well represented. The Baltic states and Finland are sending good delegations, and of course the brethren in Sweden will be there in large numbers. It would appear, therefore, that the congress hall will be taxed to its utmost capacity.

Passports are absolutely essential. No one can board a ship bound for a foreign port without a passport with proper visaes.

Rev. C. E. Wilson, of England, makes the following suggestion to Stockholm delegates: Mr. Sven B. Robinson, Malarebanken, Drottninggstan 71, the Norra Latinluroverh, Stockholm, Sweden, will be glad to handle all exchange matters for our people while there in Stockholm and can "effect payments" on the letters of credit of Brown Brothers, the National City Bank of New York, and the Irving Bank-Columbia Trust Company, also of New York. Travelers' checks of the American Express Company will be duly honored and United States currency notes will be exchanged.

Alliance Delegates to Be Met In Scandinavian Capitals

For several days immediately preceding and immediately following the meeting of the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm, delegates will find English-speaking friends at the railway stations and steamship docks in the principal cities of Scandinavia, ready to assist in every possible way. These friends will display the initials "B. W. A." on hatband or sleeve, and delegates arriving at Copenhagen, Gothenburg or Christiania should look out for them.

At Copenhagen the Baptists of Denmark have arranged to have a small exhibit in one of the rooms at their headquarters, Baptist Church House, Sogade 32.

The Baptists of Norway are making similar arrangements in a room at the Baptist Tabernaklet, Hausmannsgate 22-24.

At Gothenburg the Baptists are arranging to help the delegates see the exposition which will be in progress during the summer months.

American Independence

HAIL to the planting of Liberty's tree!
Hail to the charter declaring us free!
Millions of voices are chanting its praises,
Millions of worshipers bend at its shrine,
Wherever the sun of America blazes
Wherever the stars of our bright banner shine.

Sing to the heroes who breasted the flood
That, swelling, rolled o'er them—a deluge of blood,
Fearless they clung to the ark of the nation,
And dashed on mid lightning, and thunder, and blast,
Till Peace, like the dove, brought her breach of salvation,
And Liberty's mount was their refuge at last.

Bright is the beautiful land of our birth,
The home of the homeless all over the earth.
Oh! let us ever with fondest devotion,
The freedom our fathers bequeathed us, watch o'er
Till the angel shall stand on the earth and the ocean,
And shout mid earth's ruins, that Time is no more.

Fresh from the Field

Yale University at its recent commencement celebrated the one hundred fiftieth anniversary of the graduation of Nathan Hale.

When Rev. Thomas J. Hopkins, pastor of the First Church, Adrian, Mich., was invited to deliver the commencement address at Ottawa University, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him.

We recently called attention to the fact that Rev. Herman W. Watjen had served the old historic church at Warren, R. I., for more than twenty-five years. Mr. Watjen is to take his vacation in August and would be available for supply work in the middle west during that month. Any church interested may address him at Warren, R. I.

Rev. D. L. Schultz, widely known as the labor evangelist of the Home Mission Society, died at his home in Philadelphia, June 15. A few days before the end he was planning for the summer evangelistic campaigns in Cleveland and Detroit. He is survived by a wife and daughter. The latter is a student in the Missionary Training School in Philadelphia. The funeral was held June 18.

Samuel C. Jennings, 1312 Oak avenue, Evanston, has been elected a member of the board of trustees of the University of Chicago. Mr. Jennings is president of the Columbian Bank Note Company and has been in business in Chicago for thirty years. He is a trustee of the Baptist Theological Union, president of the Baptist Social Union, and a member of the First Church of Evanston. He was elected to fill a Baptist vacancy on the board. The election was a surprise to Mr. Jennings, who was not apprised of the fact that his name was under consideration before the election had taken place.

The "Canadian Baptist" reports a sermon by Rev. Bowley Green, pastor of the church at London, Ontario, on the poverty of the Baptists. The text is "I know thy poverty but thou art rich." He declared that Baptists are poor in creedal statements, poor in ecclesiasticism, poor in ritual. With Baptists it is life or nothing. In days of spiritual drought our spiritual poverty becomes most apparent. Others have the show, pomp and majesty of outward and visible form but Baptists in such times are little more than spiritual scarecrows. A Baptist church must have spiritual life.

David Lloyd George speaking at the celebration of a Congregational minister's twenty-five years of service said, "It is the preacher and the teacher who are doing the work which will last when the statesman's name will be barely recalled." One reason for this eulogy of the minister was found in the spirit of Rev. J. D. Jones of Bournemouth in whose honor the exercises of the day were held. The citizens of the city and members of the Richmond Hill Congregational Church desired to present a purse to the man who had labored so long and so faithfully among them. At his request the gift of about $3,000 was set aside for an open-air ward in one of the local hospitals in memory of his wife and son.

Major Ralph Willcock is the new principal of Woodstock College, succeeding Doctor Wearing, who resigned to accept a position in Colgate University. Major Willcock took part in the battles of Ypres, the Somme, Vimy Ridge, Lens, Amiens, Arras, Cambrai and Mons. He was a member of the staff of the college.

The E. K. Warren estate has recently made a gift of a fine property on Lake Michigan, near Sawyer, Mich., to the Congregationalists. The property can be used as a site for a summer camp or such other uses as the new owners may determine. Mr. Warren was widely known as a Sunday-school worker, having been a prominent figure on the international committee.

Judged by a news note in the "Christian World" of London, young people are much the same the world around. "If I had my life to live over again, I should do more in the way of athletics" said Rev. L. H. Marshall, pastor at Coventry. "I would give everything to be an expert cricketer, because if I could score a century on Saturday I should be listened to open-mouthed when I preached my sermon on Sunday." The merely scholarly minister is practically of no use, in his own judgment, where young people are concerned.

EVEN so the wild birds sang on bough and wall
That day the bell of Independence
Hall
Thundered around the world the word of man,
That day when Liberty began
And mighty hopes were blown on every sea.
But Freedom calls her conscripts
now as then—
Calls for heroic men:
It is an endless battle to be free.
—Edwin Markham.

The "America," sailing from New York, June 30, has already booked about 200 Baptists, principally from the North, who are delegates to the meeting of the World Alliance at Stockholm. At the same time there are many who will sail on other vessels. Dr. and Mrs. J. F. Watson sailed on June 2 on the "Albania." Mr. W. B. Lipphard and a large company of Swedish Baptists sailed June 18 on the "Kungsholm" of the Swedish Line, for Gothenburg direct. On the White Star Steamer "Pittsburgh," sailing June 19, was a large party led by Dr. and Mrs. W. S. Abernethy of Washington, D. C. On the "Berengaria" of the Cunard Line, June 26, were booked a large company of Texas and Missouri Baptists. On the "Doric" from Montreal, June 23, was a party of principally Chicago people, led by Dr. Herbert Hines of Kankakee. Rev. R. A. Ashworth, of Yonkers, N. Y., sailed with a small party June 28 on the "Manchuria." Dr. J. J. Wicker of Richmond, Va., took a large party on the "Montcalm" from Montreal June 29. Most of the National Baptist Convention delegates, led by their president, Dr. L. K. Williams, will probably sail June 30, on the "Olympic" from New York. A small party, including Secretary Lerrigo of the Foreign Mission Society, will sail on the "Finland," July 5. A large group of Swedish Baptists will sail on the "Stockholm," July 3, under the leadership of Dr. Frank Peterson of Minneapolis. On the "Drottningholm" from New York, July 7, there will be several small parties, and among them Mr. C. S. Shank, president of the Northern Baptist Convention, with his family, and Rev. Charles A. Brooks.

Rev. Homer F. Yale, whose article "Contact with God" appeared in THE BAPTIST of May 26, has been teaching for several years, but now desires to return to the pastorate. He may be addressed at Hartwick, N. Y.

At the Colgate commencement, Tuesday, June 19, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was bestowed upon Albert H. Gage, director of religious education of the Baptist Executive Council of Chicago, and upon Rev. W. T. Elmore, pastor of the First Church, Lincoln, Nebr.

Does your church have a moving picture machine? Does it use standard or narrow safety film? Will you kindly send the answer to both questions to Harry S. Myers, 276 Fifth Ave., New York City? It will help the Board of Promotion to make plans for the future. This method of questionnaire saves money and time providing you reply.

The board of managers of the Publication Society has issued a call for a special meeting to be held in the board room of the society's building, 1703 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, on Wednesday afternoon, July 25, at 2 o'clock to consider and pass upon the election of officers and other actions taken by the society at meetings held in Atlantic City last month, and to consider such other business as may lawfully be brought before it.

The United Baptist Convention of Maine, at Bangor, June 14, 1923, according to C. E. Owen, recording secretary, placed itself solidly back of the denominational program in the following action: "Resolved, That we express our high appreciation of the work done by our national, state and local boards of promotion, and especially by those who have had immediate charge of that work, and that we call upon our people to rally for the last year of the New World Movement program. The issues involved are vast enough to challenge and deserve our utmost effort."

By special request of the committee on program, the Home Mission Society is sending Mr. David Paddelty, a full-blooded Kiowa Indian, as delegate to the meeting of the World Alliance at Stockholm. C. S. Miao, graduate of Shanghai College, will be one of the Chinese delegates at Stockholm. Dr. Y. Chiba, president of the Japan Theological Seminary, and Mr. S. Saito, a member of the Baptist Tabernacle, Tokyo, and senior Japanese secretary of the Y. M. C. A., will represent Japanese Baptists at the congress. Mr. Daniel Swamidoss, one of the strong Telegu Christian leaders, will represent the East Indian Baptists, and it is hoped that one of the Burman leaders also will be present. Representing the work of the Woman's Foreign Mission Society in Bengal-Orissa, will be Miss Khanto Bala Rai, a native of that country, who has just received her B. A. degree at the University of Nebraska, and is returning to her native land by way of Stockholm.

A Model

The East Washington and North Idaho Convention, at its recent meeting in Yakima, did a thing which ought to inspire other conventions. It appointed one of its laymen, J. C. Barline of Spokane, as the state representative of THE BAPTIST and Missions. The convention asked each church to appoint a representative of these journals and to notify Mr. Barline of its action. In a letter which comes to hand as we are writing this, he enclosed a good check and said there is no reason why the list should not be increased by several hundred subscribers. Of course there is no good reason why we should not have fifty or sixty thousand subscribers, and the laymen will make such a list a reality.

Killam's Kollum

Great Is Habit

A young lady in Chicago was giving a "booster" announcement for the Boston convention. She waxed eloquent in setting forth the attractions of the convention program. As a climax she said, "And then there is Doctor Conwell. He will give his famous lecture on 'The Ace of Diamonds.'" Great is the power of habit. Better form good habits like that of reading THE BAPTIST and Missions.

A Mistaken Function

A denominational newspaper editor of wide experience in the South recently told ye editor that the one great function of such a paper in the minds of official and semi-official brethren in his country was to lie gracefully, convincingly and piously about the real denominational situation. We believe that this is a mistaken idea as to the function of a religious newspaper. We admit that judged by surface appearances some of our contemporaries are living up to the ideal. This editor went on to say: "It is a question whether a Baptist paper should ever say anything about a society or board except to praise its secretaries and laud the work that it is doing." He thinks that discretion is the better part of valor and that we may as well accept the inevitable. THE BAPTIST is honestly trying to keep from lying (too much). We admit that "news" sometimes appears that sounds a little like the average fish story. But you ought to see the same stories before they were edited.

Propaganda

It is an age of propaganda. Everybody seems to be trying to promote something or somebody. If it were not for propaganda the editor would have many hours of leisure and many blue pencils. Talking of propaganda is there any more senseless than that to which we referred in this kollum repeatedly—What shall we do with THE BAPTIST? Now comes a letter from the far East where the wise men used to live, and where some still reside. This letter says: "There's a silly rumor I've heard that THE BAPTIST has been offered to the———— at the latter's own terms. I heard it from Brother——— but Brother——— is strong on denominational myths." Now you have said it —"denominational myths." It is pure propaganda. Who offered it for sale? When? Why? Such a combination would have at least one redeeming feature; it would assure the permanent location of at least one Baptist institution in the Middle West. No one would be fool enough to try to run an honest-to-goodness national Baptist weekly from New York.

The Work of the General Board of Promotion

Address of Albert L. Scott, Chairman of the General Board of Promotion, Before the Northern Baptist Convention at Atlantic City, May 28, 1923

WE are gathered here this morning to consider the work of the Board of Promotion. This is the first time in the history of the Northern Baptist Convention when a session has been given over to the work of this board.

The duties of the Promotion Board have been to promote the work and interests of others. In this service its time has been so fully occupied that it has had little time and less inclination to talk about itself.

It is well, however, once a year, to spend two hours in thinking upon the important duties assigned to the Board of Promotion and to inquire whether on the whole the work has been well performed. With the recommendations of the committee of fifteen in mind, we may pertinently ask whether the board's statement today might not be summed up in the cry of the Roman gladiator, "We who are about to die salute you." But before we die we wish to report on our stewardship and call attention to the fact that we all have another year of hard work for the denomination ahead of us.

Consider for a moment the task you asked your board to assume. To vitalize and energize our 10,000 churches scattered from Maine to California, many ignorant of denominational affairs; to direct the thinking and giving of these churches; to work out methods for handling funds and keeping accounts; to cooperate not only with our national societies and boards, but also with state conventions, city mission societies and schools and colleges, never before thought of as parts of our national program. All this work of planning, of adjusting, of educating, of conferring, of explaining, of corresponding, was started six months late, so that the achievement of the five year goal had to be compressed into a little over four years. This has been a task somewhat equal in magnitude to consolidating the elements of the United States Steel Corporation. Certainly nothing like it for complexity has ever been attempted by any religious denomination within a similar length of time. Such success as has been attained has been due to the combination of rare, consecrated and devoted ability at headquarters, coupled with most genuine and hearty support from the great majority of our churches and participating organizations. I am prouder than ever of being a Baptist in the face of such unexampled achievements in the field of organization, a field in which Baptists are not supposed to be particularly adept.

A few years ago a certain American firm was authorized to plan the first American cotton mill to be built in China. They prepared their plans with most meticulous care, studied particularly Chinese conditions, and sent experienced engineers to construct the plant and set up the machinery. The mill was started after the Chinese had been carefully drilled in its operation, but within a short time distressing reports came in. The Chinese owners were dissatisfied, the mill was not justifying their hopes. An examination showed that the machines were running at about 70 per cent efficiency because the Chinese were saving money in oil, belts, supplies and the care of the machinery. The trouble was not with the American spinning machinery, but with the Chinese. They had been accustomed too long to spinning yarn by hand to grasp quickly the methods by which spinning must be done by machinery.

Now some of us Baptists are like these Chinese. We have not yet grasped the principles which govern the operation of highly specialized machinery. Let us not make the mistake now of reducing the efficiency of what is a most effective denominational tool by denying to the Board of Promotion our prayers, our sympathy and our genuine and wholehearted cooperation.

I wish to call your attention to a few of the things the denomination is doing and can do through the Board of Promotion to increase efficiency and to deepen our spiritual life.

1. We can simplify our denominationl bookkeeping by arranging for all of our cooperating organizations a similar method of keeping their accounts, so that terms in the statement of each board will mean the same thing. The finance committee is now at work on this problem, but the Board of Promotion is the medium through which we can make effective use of the figures once they have been assembled. We need to make our figures much simpler, much less involved, and to put our financial statements in non-technical language.

2. The relations between the Northern Baptist Convention and the state conventions and city mission societies should be made more intimate. The state conventions are now the bulwark of our program and to the devotion of our state convention and city mission secretaries much of our success is due. As a denomination we must understand better the local problems of our churches. The Board of Promotion is the only board in the denomination which can assume the responsibility for bringing this about.

3. We have never used as much as we might the experience of the denomination as a whole to assist the local church. Isolated churches often feel that the only time they hear from the denomination is when it wants money. They must be made to feel that to be in the denomination is a great asset and that reservoirs of spiritual power, of experience with local church problems and of sympathetic understanding are theirs to draw upon. The Board of Promotion is a logical agency to be used for this desirable end. It is the one body, which, through its state boards of promotion, reaches on the one hand to every church and on the other to every agency, missionary or educational, in our widely varied program.

Others will tell more particularly of our work, will furnish details, give specific facts. Let it be my province to congratulate you upon the possession of so efficient a piece of denominational machinery as the Board of Promotion and to voice the hope that in 1923-24, when we are faced with the task of meeting our operating budgets and freeing ourselves from debt, the Board of Promotion will not fail those whose high hopes are centered in its activities.

Rev. C. T. Holman has resigned as pastor of the Normal Park Church, Chicago, to accept a position at the Divinity School of the University of Chicago.

Rev. Arthur C. Baldwin of the Chestnut Street Church, Philadelphia, will preach during the month of July in First Church, Los Angeles, taking the place of Dr. Francis.

Rev. Raymond S. Carman of Rockford, Ill., has been called to the pastorate of the combined First and Eastern Avenue churches of Joliet, Ill. He begins his new work July 1. The church expects to build a splendid new edifice in the near future.

That the missionary effort of the Methodist Episcopal church in its inspiring forward movement is seriously threatened, is proved by cold figures received from the office of the committee on conservation and advance. So clearly are the conditions set forth in these statistics carefully compiled by the treasurer of the committee that it is scarcely necessary to make a single interpretative comment. The total receipts for the months of November, December, January, February, March and April of the year 1920-21, were $6,219,788, for the same months of 1921-22, $4,712,136 and for 1922-23, $4,099,717.

The friends of education will be glad to know that just before leaving New York for Europe and the Stockholm Convention, President Claiborne M. Hill, received from Dr. D. J. Harris of Evanston, Ill., an offer of $25,000 for the Berkeley Baptist Divinity School, on condition that $75,000 additional be raised by the friends of the school. This proposed gift by Doctor Harris is another proof of his interest in our only theological school on the Pacific Coast. He became interested in the work at Berkeley while spending a winter there several years ago, and has shown that interest by many generous gifts over a period of several years. This latest offer has been accepted and others will have an opportunity to help meet Doctor Harris' generous and timely offer.

The resignation of Rev. William H. Jones as pastor of the North Shore Church of Chicago was presented on Sunday, June 24. He goes to the Immanuel Church, Portland, Me., beginning work there Sept. 1. Mr. Jones has been with the North Shore Church five years. During that time the present site was purchased and the splendid church and community house was erected. The Bible school plant has one of the outstanding equipments in Chicago. A three manual Austin pipe organ was dedicated last winter. The growth and development of the past five years has placed the church in the ranks of the foremost churches of Chicago. The Immanuel Church is the product of the merger of the Free Hill Baptist and the Free Street Baptist churches, two historic churches of New England. It has a membership of over 900. A new church house is to be erected.

Why?

THE streets and sidewalks were lined with people waiting for the parade to pass. It was a silent, expectant crowd of folks, made up from every walk of life and occupation. Suddenly the sound of music broke the silence and the band heading the parade swung around the corner. Behind the band came the flag of our own dear land, but the crowd on the corner allowed it to pass without any marks of respect. Why? When it came opposite a group of men near us, they instantly doffed their hats and stood at attention until the flag had passed by. Why? Beyond us were grouped the children from a public school and as the stars and stripes passed them, they gave to the emblem of their country every mark of respect. Why?

We must now answer our three queries. A glance at the children revealed the teachers among them and we knew at once that from them the school children had learned to love the flag because it was the emblem of the country, the history of which they knew in part. Such teaching by well-trained teachers is a splendid preparation for citizenship in this land where every child is a future citizen and voter. Are we training the children of God for their citizenship so that they will respect the things of Christ as the children respected the flag of their land?

Why that group of silent, disrespectful people who paid no attention to the flag? A careful stroll among them revealed the fact that they were largely foreign-born and while they lived and prospered here they belonged in spirit to an old world and in their hearts gave allegiance to another flag. We thought then, and we think now, that they were ignorant concerning the things for which the flag is an emblem. All who come to live among us should be taught the principles of democracy and what our flag represents. Our future and their whole welfare depend upon our bringing all who come to live among us to a place of unity with our principles and an understanding of our history. To let them live here just for what they can get out of the country is not good for them or for us. We wonder if many a church member is not in that institution upon a similar plane and is concerned only about what he expects to get rather than for what he can contribute to its upkeep. If so, it is a bad situation that confronts the local church, for values in spiritual things as well as in patriotism are largely based upon the investments each one makes.

That third group was made up of ex-soldiers with their families and friends. Oh, yes! We knew at once the source and power of their instant respect for the flag. They had lately fought and suffered for their country and had paid a high price to do it. Their love and respect were as deep-seated as were the memories of those never-to-be-forgotten days when their all, their best, was at the disposal of their country; so they paid its emblem every possible respect.

We know that Christianity is great and wonderful, like patriotism, in proportion as it calls forth the services and sacrifices of its followers. Wherever there is a great serving and heroic giving there is a great and abiding love which produces respect within, and without, the person.

Our Lord's sufferings and death on the cross have made the awful tree that bore him the emblem of world salvation. The cross is only an emblem, his was the sacrifice and he it was who paid the price to set all free who believe on him, and follow in his steps. Christian, when the cross of Christ passes by your spiritual vision, pay respect to the emblem because of all the costs and glory that made it the emblem of the world's great Saviour. Then give him your best allegiance.

Our flag—yes, give it every respect as the emblem of your country; then invest yourself in its future so that it may continue to be great and glorious.

The President's Oath

THE daily newspapers of the country are already discussing vigorously presidential possibilities for the general election next year. The recent action of Governor Al Smith of New York in approving the repeal of the state prohibition enforcement law has been followed by columns of comment as to his availability for the nomination.

The very first consideration is of course the requirements for the office of president which are specified in the constitution of the United States. A candidate who cannot qualify in this preliminary trial will never contest in the finals with any hope of success.

No person can become president of the United States, under the constitution, who does not first take an oath concerning the fulfilment of his office, which oath is specified with a degree of particularity not to be found elsewhere in the constitution. This oath required of the president is as follows:

"Before he enter on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation: 'I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.'"

On June 2, at Albany, Governor Smith used to the utmost the powers of his high office to relieve 25,000 state officials from legal responsibility for the suppression of the liquor traffic in New York state. The Corporation Counsel of New York City, in an opinion given June 6, so interpreted the repeal of the state enforcement law. Colonel William Hayward, United States district attorney at New York, in a statement commenting on this action, says: "If the policy enunciated by the Corporation Counsel is carried out, it will be an appalling blow to law enforcement, and will do exactly what we told the Governor at Albany it would do, to wit, turn loose the underworld and invite the reopening of New York City's 10,000 saloons, closed by Enright, New York police commissioner, under the Mullen-Gage law. . . . Already we read open boasts of the ex-saloonkeepers that they are starting up their saloons again, polishing the brass rail and installing the old cuspidors."

This resurgent tide of debauchery and traffic in drink is the result—the foreseen and foretold result—of the governor's action in signing the repeal bill. The constitution of the United States is being flouted and defied and nullified, as the direct consequence of Governor Smith's deliberate act.

Can Governor Smith take the oath required of every man who would become president? If he should take it, does anybody believe, since June 2, that he would, to the best of his ability, "preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the United States"? If he failed to do it at Albany (the federal constitution requires that every state executive shall take oath to support it), why should he be expected to do it at Washington?

Commercialism or Stewardship

STEWARDSHIP is a living recognition of God's ownership and man's accountability to the owner of all life and things. Under God's plan of Christian accountability, every child of his is required to set aside the first part of all that is entrusted to him. Compliance with this requirement constitutes one great evidence of real allegiance to God.

Failure to comply with this requirement is a noticeable contradiction to the profession of faith in the Lord Christ made by the person. So far as money is concerned, the teaching is plain that the tithe, or tenth, constitutes the required minimum portion which should be set aside for gospel purposes. An outstanding evidence that there is something radically wrong with the teaching and training processes of our local churches is to be found in the failure of at least 80 per cent of our members to set aside and give this minimum of a tenth of their income for gospel purposes.

Ministers are underpaid, Bible schools are not planted in growing sections of our cities, the serving life of the church is hampered, church members are untaught, and large areas of the world are unevangelized because God's people fail to give proper account of their stewardship of money.

To make matters worse, churches failing to get money enough on a right basis, allow the members to go into commercial ventures in order to make profits with which to maintain the church, and its program of evangelization. Half our church members practically contribute no money for God's purposes.

We need to cease all church profit-making ventures and put the time, talent and energy of God's serving people into a real loving effort to produce every member as a good steward who renders a good account to his Master. Commercialism in the church destroys spiritual dynamic, while stewardship creates great spiritual powers. Commercialism, in the long run, is a waste of church time and effort, while the program of stewardship is the sure road to spiritual conservation. Commercialism brings shame and ridicule upon the church of the Lord Jesus Christ, while an exhibition of stewardship causes the outside world to recognize the validity of a Christian profession.

We need to revive our work in the local churches so that in love and obedience the membership will all give to God the first fruitage of their productivity and then the need of, or taste for, commercialism will soon disappear from our activities.

President Harding on the Next War

WAR brings out some of the finest and all of the meanest qualities in human nature. Thousands of persons became millionaires because of the abnormal conditions produced by the last war. Profiteers were everywhere. All wars have furnished opportunity for the supreme sacrifice of many and the supreme selfishness of some. In his Memorial Day address at Arlington, President Harding made clear that if another war should come, wealth as well as men would doubtless be drafted. In part he said:

"The arguing veterans, fifty years after Gettysburg, on the scene of the world-famed combat, were thinking of industrial greed in the North and slave-owning greed in the South. But in reality their prejudices had been inspired by the hateful profiteering incident to war. In all the wars of all time the conscienceless profiteer has put the black blot of greed upon righteous sacrifice and highly purposed conflict. In our fuller understanding of today, in that exalted consciousness that every citizen has his duty to perform and that his means, his honor and his life are his country's in a time of national peril, in the next war, if conflict ever comes again, we will not alone call to service the youth of the land which has, in the main, fought all our wars, but we will draft every resource, every activity, all of wealth, and make common cause of the nation's preservation. God grant that no conflict will come again, but if it does it shall be without profit to the noncombatant participants except as they share in the triumphs of the nation."

American Democracy

THE discussion of the theme, "Is Our Democracy Stagnant?" by Frank I. Cobb, editor of the New York World in Harper's for June, is valuable as a candid critique of American government by an eminent journalist. Mr. Cobb observes that none of the nations that reorganized its government (or became self-governing) after the war followed the American plan of congressional government; rather they followed the British system of parliamentary government. The framers of the constitution, he says, did not believe in democracy and endeavored to apportion the power so that no branch of the government should have too great influence, and each branch could act practically independently of the others. The principle of democracy was recognized only in the method of election to the house of representatives. The senate is "a constitutional manifestation of a rotten borough system." The method of election to the senate so that the terms of only one-third expire at the same time as those of the house, and the fact that representation in the senate has no relation to population have made government by minorities possible. The constitution has become a "fetish" because for a long time the American government was the only "responsible expression of the principle of free institutions;" because it was the only government that claimed to rest on the consent of the governed and the only one in which average men had a chance to share. But actually the people have been trying to free themselves from the "shackles" of the constitution. The nominating convention without constitutional authority has made the president's election a matter of popular vote, "established party government, and made the president ex-officio leader of his party in congress," and is, in fact, "a government within a government." Very little has been done to improve congress. The direct primary has made congress irresponsible as well as unresponsive (which it always was) and has helped the growth of minority power. When the president and a majority of congress are of different parties there is a deadlock and very little can be done. Under parliamentary government the responsibility cannot be thus shifted from one branch of government to another. A popular vote can always be secured on a single issue and a parliamentary government can settle only one question at a time. The United States "in its mechanism of government holds fast to the eighteenth century. More than that, it refuses to concede that anything of general importance has been learned about the science of government since the eighteenth century, and prior to the French Revolution."

The Treatment of Crime

A LIBERAL view of this subject is presented by Charles L. Chute, general secretary of the National Probation Association, in the American Review of Reviews for May. He says very little has been done in the way of scientific treatment of crime problems. Severe penalties have never been a deterrent. The recent increase in spectacular crime is due to after-effects of the war, the automobile's increase as a means of escape, publicity given through motion pictures and the newspapers, and especially the inadequacy of the old system of treatment under present conditions. A thorough overhauling of the entire system of law, courts and prisons is necessary so that it will be possible to learn the causes of crime in each individual case and establish a system that will remove or correct these causes. The chief agencies now being used are probation, court clinics, juvenile courts, with special detention homes and domestic relations courts. In place of the modern prison we should have: 1. A well-supervised probation system; 2. Special hospitals for feeble-minded, insane, epileptic or physically sick offenders; 3. Reformatories for confirmed criminals where they should be taught trades and made to live as nearly normal lives as possible; after their release they should be put on strict parole.

Too Much "Unity"

"DO WE NOT have a deal of eloquent mush about unity, especially interchurch and intrachurch unity? Let us be careful how we use the word, and let us be sure we are seeking the real thing. What passes for unity in most cases among the fervid brethren is a lazy and impossible, not to say utterly dishonorable, agreement to keep quiet about many things, whether important or unimportant, just because they make for difference of opinion and for controversy. Unity means, again, a goodly feeling toward one another, without any respect whatever for the fact, proved by every man's experience, that unless feeling be given substance by means of ideas, it is fat and flabby affection. Far apart in thought cannot mean close together in fellowship.

"Some think of unity, also, as a mystical, vague, indefinable something that is peculiarly spiritual, a gift of God, which we need but acknowledge, and lo, all is lovely here! The unity extremists are like the pacifists. Unity at any price is as bad as peace at any price. . . . .

"Compromise—there is the worst sin of the usual seeker of unity. It never gets its followers anywhere, or the churches anywhere, but into a bog. Unity is genuine and effectual when it is based upon agreements moral, spiritual, and doctrinal. So long as there is disagreement upon a matter either essential or regarded as essential by either party, unity cannot abide. As a matter of fact, the standard is never unity as it is never peace. The standard is truth and right. Follow after these and ultimately unity may come. Unity is an effect, not a principle."

We Can

"For such service as this who is competent? We are!" II Corinthians 2:17—Weymouth's version

By Robert Gordon

TO Paul's mind preaching the gospel was serious business. Christian work was a sobering responsibility with tremendous issues for time and eternity. It was, in fact, a matter of life or death.

In recent times many have held a very different idea. Faith has been considered no great factor for either weal or woe. Nobody has been thought in any particular peril. Regardless of how we preached or whether or not we preached at all, it has been guessed all would yet be well with everybody.

But today men are returning to the conviction of Paul that Christianity presents both a peremptory challenge and a supremely momentous choice. Amid heaped-up ruins it has been seen anew that neither security nor progress come of themselves. Even the evolutionist speaks of reversion. On a vast stage it has been established that human betterment is gained only by right decision and costly endeavor. It would be easy to pile up pronouncements of statesmen, editors, educators, and business men, but all say in essence what the premiers of the British Empire declared a while ago—Christ and his gospel are the sole hope of the world. The preaching of the gospel is nothing less than a matter of life or death for men and nations.

Who Is Sufficient?

As Baptists we have faced this solemnity and declared that the denominational program is the minimum of our responsibility. The least part of that great program is the financial, but that calls for $10,000,000 this year. We are asking, "Who is sufficient for these things?" And many do not hesitate in answering, "We are not." That attitude spells defeat. Somehow we must be moved to affirm with Paul, "We can." Were that transformation wrought, we might celebrate victory as already won. A grain of faith will move mountains. Babson cites lack of confidence and fear as two of the outstanding obstacles to success in business. He quotes,

"Life's battles don't always go to the stronger or faster man;
But soon or late the man who wins is the one who thinks he can."

Dr. J. A. Hadfield, an English neurological expert, proves strength may be diminished by two-thirds when minds are depressed by the idea of weakness. Under normal conditions, men upon whom he was experimenting were able to register 101 pounds by gripping a dynamometer. When these same men were given the suggestion under hypnosis that they were very weak the average grip was only twenty-nine pounds, while a suggestion of strength produced a grip of 142 pounds. The difference was not in the will but rather and solely in the belief that the thing attempted was impossible. The mental factor is of foremost importance. A new idea may mean new life. If given assurance of an oasis ahead, an exhausted desert traveller will plod on for miles. "All things are possible to him that believeth."

But that, you say, is just the crux of our problem—we do not believe we can. How can we be persuaded this enterprise is within our power? This scripture points the way. Note Paul's exalted estimate of human powers—"We can." True, some are crippled by conceit. But the average Baptist and the average church are hindered far more by failure to put a high enough estimate on their powers. Too frequently we think of ourselves as poor, helpless worms of the dust. We are not worms, but if we were as feeble as they it would be a good thing to read again Darwin's volume on the miracles wrought by the despised earthworm and so be reminded they are not nearly so impotent as they seem. No, we are made in the divine image and as the psalmist says are "just a little lower than God." The sort of piety that discounts human ability dishonors God. The spies who moaned, "We are not able to go up against this people for they are giants and we are but grasshoppers" were not praised for humility. Divine approval was given to a man of another sort. Caleb had the right stuff in him—"Let's march now for we are well able to overcome them." It was the one-talent man who thought he could do nothing who most dishonored and most displeased his master.

> WE follow, all of us, one flag. It symbolizes our purposes and our aspirations; it represents what we believe and what we mean to attain, and wherever it floats, it is the flag of the free and the hope of the oppressed, and wherever and whenever it is assailed, at any sacrifice, it will be carried to a triumphant peace.
> —William McKinley.

Vibrant Energies

There never was a time when this fallacious notion of human inability to do things great and glorious was being more roundly rebuked than right now. I read Wells' "Outline of History" and find him closing that amazing review of the triumphs and tragedies of the ages with the confident assertion, "We can." He writes, "Our poverty, our infections, our quarrels are all things controllable and removable by concerted human action." I turn to sociology and find Kidd closing his stirring volume, "The Science of Power," with the assertion that through the intellectual and spiritual inheritance it is within our power to change a whole people in a single generation. The thing was actually done in Germany. He has no difficulty in believing a nation may be born in a day. I pick up a book of general science and find Sir Oliver Lodge saying, "Probably (as hinted by radium) there is enough power in this handful of mud to lift the entire German fleet and transport it to the hills behind Manchester." I rise from a treatise on creative chemistry with the conviction that there are all about us vibrant energies which when harnessed will make all the mighty marvels of yesterday seem like child's play.

Where will you find any class of men today saying, "We can't?"

Physicians have said, "We can." Small-pox, yellow fever, typhoid, diphtheria and other deadly plagues have been mastered and may be wiped out any day we will. Farmers have said, "We can." Despite drought and pest and blight there is no need that any child go hungry a single day anywhere on this earth. Engineers have said, "We can." They have sailed the clouds, bridged the seas and cleft the continents in twain. For a century or more commissions reported — "It can't be done." But a man stood up at Panama and the mountains moved aside.

As individuals and as churches, we are using but a fraction of our powers. Of course most do not think so. Most have an idea they are taxed to the limit and honestly feel burdened. But read again that notable essay on "The Powers of Man," written by Professor James of Harvard shortly before his death. He makes it clear that after we have seemingly gone the limit and are as we say "all in" we may get our second wind as exhausted players do and that that may be repeated again and again. The Doctor Hadfield whom I quoted a while ago tells of a soldier who had been buried under ruins by a high explosive shell in France. He could not make the slightest exertion without exhaustion. Under hypnosis, he was caused to recall the details of that terrifying explosion, the debris burying him to the neck, and a great timber tottering above his head ready to fall. By that recollection he was thrown into a condition of extreme terror and put forth such extraordinary strength that it took four men to hold him down. When awakened from the hypnosis he remarked how refreshed he felt! Somehow he had found a strength vastly greater than his will could command. All of us can do more than we have dreamed. There are untapped resources within reach.

We Have the Money

No argument is required to convince us we can raise the $10,000,000 required this year. If the average Baptist earned no more than the humblest household servant and gave a tenth of that income we would have more than is asked. A leading American financial expert has said that the income of the church members of the United States last year was forty billions and that we ought to give at least a tenth. I have heard talk of millions, but this business man talking to business men says we should give four billions and to do less is not so much selfish as short-sighted.

We admit we have the money, but what about the rest of this program? What about evangelism and Christian education and recruits for life work and all the rest of it? Let us stick to the facts. There are 600,000 possible horsepower still unharnessed in the rivers of Wisconsin alone. That is a parable. There are unused Niagaras of possibility in our homes and Sunday schools and churches. As Doctor Stilwell has said we do not need to bring an army of great evangelists from afar. We have the needed forces here now. Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward. "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O arm of the Lord," so we read the people cried and from the skies the answer came back, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion."

Freedom

HERE at thine altar our vows we renew
Still in thy cause to be loyal and true—
True to thy flag on the field and the wave,
Living to honor it, dying to save!
Hope of the World; thou hast broken its chains
Wear thy bright arms while a tyrant remains,
Stand for the right till the nations shall own
Freedom their sovereign with law for her throne!
—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

We can. Paul said it with a smile. Morale means more than munitions. The bandmasters, songleaders and heralds of hope were indispensable in building that formidable host that crossed the seas to unhorse the kaiser. The discourager was drummed out of the ranks. It may not have been a great song, but there was sound psychology in its rollicking rhythm —pack up your troubles and smile, boys, smile. John Clifford selected as the text of his first sermon, "The joy of the Lord is your strength." After all the ups and downs of fifty years in the heart of London, he chose as the text of his golden anniversary sermon the same words, "The joy of the Lord is your strength." No wonder he has been, and, at almost ninety years of age, still continues to be a veritable dynamo of human energy, a mediator of cheerfulness and strength to discouraged warriors for truth and righteousness.

Read again the honor roll of Hebrews. The great things of history have not been wrought by men of genius or abnormal endowments. Gideon, Jeremiah, Paul were profoundly conscious of their limitations. But they heard in one way or another the divine assurance, "Ye shall receive power — and greater things than these shall ye do." Believing, they attempted and achieved the impossible. Oh, for the courage to dare to say with Paul, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." With that sense of power none would need to urge us to our tasks. Rather we would feel as did those seamen of whom a Near East worker told me. When the Turk set fire to Smyrna, our cruiser, the "Litchfield," was a hundred miles away. I am glad that on receiving word by wireless, Captain Rhodes turned prow toward Smyrna and not New York. They found the city aflame and thousands thronging the water's edge. At one end of the pier were about 450 terrified children under Turkish guard.

"Let's Go!"

"Can we save them?" our men asked their captain. They meant, may we; they knew they could; Attention was called to the Turkish guard and possible international complications. "Leave that to us." A squad engaged the Turks in some sort of altercation; 450 jackies, each with a child under his arm, leaped aboard and in less time than it takes to tell it, all were safe under the stars and stripes. Knowing our power, surely none shall longer murmur "Must we?" but all together raise the cry, "Let's go."

One cold Sunday last winter, after travelling 150 miles, I came to an evening service. I was out at the invitation of our state office seeking to quicken interest in our denominational objectives. One who looked to me like an official brother nestled down into a comfortable position in the corner of a pew and went to sleep. No, it was not the sermon. He never gave me a chance. He did not hear the anthem. The offering meant nothing to him. I resolved to give him some personal attention. "As I go about," I said, "I am being told the churches are being distressed by this effort to raise millions of dollars because we have at New York a group of leaders who are not informed. They do not know how few we are. They do not know how poor we are. They do not know what a hard time we have to keep our home work going. We need a change at New York." "That may seem right to you," I said, "but I do not think the difficulty is at New York. The trouble is in our pews. The fact is, we are not aware of our resources. We are not alive to the needs of the world. We are not awake to our opportunities. That's it; we are not awake. In fact, many are sound asleep. And what we need is to hear a voice sharp, shrill, commanding, crying in tones that would wake the dead, 'Wake up! Wake up!' " He did. He thought he was late for breakfast. He never learned what disturbed him.

Soon he concluded the service was fairly safe in my hands and went back to sleep. Of course he deserved personal attention then more than ever. So I continued, "No matter where we go nor what we say, there is always somebody to arise and say we need a change at New York. These campaigns for millions are afflicting us because our leaders are a group of enthusiasts, ministers and returned missionaries. What we need is the injection of some practical business sense. We want to make progress; but we do not want to be everlastingly straining after the stars."

WE celebrate the return of the day on which our separate national existence was declared—the day when the momentous experiment was commenced, by which the world and posterity, and we ourselves were to be taught how far a nation of men can be trusted with self-government—how far life, liberty and property are safe and the progress of social improvement is secure, under the influence of laws made by those who are to obey them—the day when, for the first time in the world, a numerous people was ushered into the family of nations, organized on the political equality of all the citizens.—Edward Everett.

"Some of you agree with that," I said; "but again let me tell you the trouble is not at New York. Neither there nor here are Baptists in any immediate danger of being swept altogether off their feet by too much religious enthusiasm. All of us have quite enough self-control. We need no more ice. No, in order to do this impossibility, we need just one thing. We do not need another Baptist. We do not need another dollar. With our present resources we could do this thing if we had a little more zeal, enthusiasm. To put it in one word (and remember he was sound asleep) the only thing we need is fire, fire, fire!"

Friends, we can. We have the men and the money. We are stewards of the glorious gospel. We, he said it, are the light of the world; the salt of the earth. We can, through his grace, save souls from death and hide a multitude of sins. We can turn the world upside down. We hold the keys of the kingdom. "Who is competent for these things?" "We are!"

"With a thrill the intolerable craving shivers through me,
Oh, to save them, to perish for their saving,
Die for their life, be offered for them all."

"Pay Up" Not "Catch Up"

By J. Y. Aitchison, General Director

The organizations participating in our New World Movement need $12,161,521.67 to meet all obligations to April 30, 1924.

Stop Interest Charges

At Atlantic City the slogan "'Pay-up' not 'Catch-up'" was adopted. Each church is asked to pay each month one-twelfth of its contributions for the year. This will make it unnecessary for the organizations to pay out such large sums for interest. Why expect our organizations to borrow money to do our work because of our failure to pay regularly?

Quarterly "Pay-Up" Days

The advantage of the four pay-up-days is apparent. The last of June the full amount due for the first quarter (May, June and July) is requested. This means payment in advance for the month of July. At the end of each succeeding quarter, Oct. 28, Jan. 27, and Apr. 27, churches are asked to pay in full one-fourth of their contributions for the year. The heartiest cooperation of all our churches in this plan would be appreciated.

Regular Reminders

The treasurer of the beneficent fund in each church is asked to send to each subscriber, at least fifteen days before the quarterly pay-up dates, a financial statement showing the standing of his payments to missions and current expenses.

Promote Monthly Remittances

The treasurer of the beneficent fund of each church is also requested to send to his state director of promotion, at the end of each month, the total receipts to date on account of New World Movement funds.

We Have Evangelized; Now Let Us Christianize

It is necessary that the gospel of Christ be made to permeate the entire social system

By Elmer T. Clark

WHEN Christ gave the so-called Great Commission to the church he laid down the fundamental platform for all the legitimate activities of the kingdom on earth. The entire program of Christianity consists in going into all the world, preaching the gospel to every creature, and teaching them to observe all things that Christ has commanded. When the gospel has been preached to all men everywhere and when all men everywhere are taught to observe, and do observe, the ideals of Christ, then the kingdom will be at hand. It will not come until that has been done.

We have gone about the first part of that program with commendable zeal, but we have sadly neglected the second part. The church has not been negligent in preaching the gospel to every creature, but it has been extremely negligent in teaching the people to observe the commands of Christ. We have evangelized the whole world, but we have not Christianized any part of it. From the standpoint of proclaiming the gospel to those who do not know it, the task of world evangelization will soon be completed, for there will soon be no section of the earth where the gospel is not heard.

So we face another task, which is not a new one, but a neglected section of the great duty committed to us by Christ. It is the task of world Christianization. We must make this gospel which has been so assiduously preached, lay hold on and control the entire social order and all of its activities and relations. This is the one supreme and outstanding challenge to the church and the Christian forces of this day. Any forward movement or any plan which may be projected for the extension of the kingdom, whether it be by the educational, missionary, or other agencies of the church, must be projected from this angle and with this object in view. This truth is realized by the wisest missionaries on the field and the wisest leaders at home, and one of the most promising signs of the present situation is that their policies are being thus shaped.

The History of the Church

This is in line with God's dealings with the church and the world in all Christian ages. From the beginning he has instituted a vast program of evangelization, after which there has been a halt while a process of permeation has gone on. In the first century there was a missionary movement under Paul, which had for its object the preaching of the gospel to all men. Paul accomplished this; he evangelized all the world known to him, and when at last he came to die he could truthfully say, "I have finished the course." He had preached Christ to all the world as he knew it.

After Paul missionary activity waned and died, but Christianity itself was not less vital, because during this cessation of the evangelistic impulse the new faith was laying hold on the Roman Empire, permeating its world, shattering paganism and bending the social order to its own pattern.

Then there came another era of missionary progress, when men like Augustine and Boniface traveled northward and established Christianity all over Europe. Again there was a period of decline, during which the church was not distinctly missionary. But in this period, when the gospel was not being spread, the church was developing institutions, performing literary labors, keeping learning alive in the Middle Ages, controlling nations and performing her doctrines.

Then there came the modern missionary movement in connection with the discovery of new lands and the colonial expansion of Europe. We are nearing the close of this today. The world has been explored, missionaries have preached everywhere, colonial expansion has been completed, and we are witnessing the birth of national aspirations among the backward peoples. The ideal of the Laymen's Missionary Movement has been realized—the evangelization of the world will be completed in this generation.

Blessings Mixed with Evil

But the colonial expansion of modern times carried not only the religion of Christianity, but also the vices of Christendom. In many mission fields, Africa especially, heathen rites and pagan superstition have in some degree been banished but whiskey, licentiousness and industrial oppression worse than slavery have been introduced.

> I do not ask, O Lord, that life may be a pleasant road,
> I do not ask that thou shouldst take from me aught of its load;
> I do not ask that flowers should always spring beneath my feet,
> I know too well the poison and the sting of things too sweet.
> I do not ask my cross to understand, my way to see;
> Better in darkness just to feel thy hand and follow thee.
> Joy is like restless day; but peace divine like quiet night;
> Lead me, O Lord, till perfect day shall shine through peace to light.

Our missionaries have gone into Central Africa, for example, and by their ministry have healed the bodies of men and freed them from the thralldom of ignorance; but at the same time the industrial system of Christian lands has taken these same natives into the mines of Johannesburg and forced them to labor under conditions which kill 32 per cent of them annually with tuberculosis. From this standpoint, therefore, it is an open question whether we have or have not actually benefited the Africans to whom we carried our Christian message.

In spite of all our evangelization we cannot say that there is a single truly Christian nation of earth. Now we have reached the stage in our Christian progress when it is absolutely necessary that the message of Christ be made to permeate the entire social system and bend every department of human activity to the ideals of the kingdom of God. Industrial relations, politics, education, personal and family life, business, amusements, religion, and all other social processes must now feel the impact of Christianity until they are molded to the will of Christ. These no less than the church, must become instruments in the onward marching of the King to the establishment of the kingdom of God. God himself has made this our duty, and if it be ignored by the church he will further it through the idealistic culture which is beginning to prevail outside the church.

Education Is Now Paramount

Any forward movement in the ranks of Christianity in these days must be on the basis and with the full recognition of this fundamental mission of the church in this century. If it be projected on any other basis, if an appeal be made to the world on any other platform, the movement will be superficial and doomed to failure. It will plunge directly across the entire current of Christian and international thinking and thus fail to electrify big souls and secure the support of big men.

This is especially true in the realm of Christian education. The very essence of world Christianization is the spread of Christian culture. The greatest duty of the church, as it faces the problem of taking the world and its social order for Christ, is educating the people in Christian principles.

This fact is fully appreciated by the missionary forces, and they have so ordered their program that the biggest missionary institution on earth, whether it be in the home field or across the seas, is the Christian school. When we speak of the great missionary enterprises the mind of the well-informed man reverts immediately to Robert College, to the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, to the Hiroshima Girls' School and to the Kwansei Gajuin.

This is a fundamental policy in furthering the work of civilization, for the new democratic movement which is sweeping the world will not of itself usher in an immediate millennium of peace and good will. Mexico, China and Russia are democracies; but because their democracy rests upon populations in which 75 to 90 per cent of the people are illiterate, these nations, so far from being civilized and peaceful, in reality menace the world. No democracy can succeed until individual people have been brought to a point of culture where they can bear the responsibilities of government, and we may easily see the risk which men will incur if they apply a theoretical system of democracy to a world in which more than half of the people cannot read or write a single word in any language.

The New Order of Love

And so the present democratic movement, which we cannot and would not frustrate, will end in disaster unless the church has the courage and aggressiveness to spread Christian culture everywhere. If the social order is to be Christian, it must rest on a firm Christian intellectual foundation. The old order of force intrenched itself behind a perverted biology and distorted evolutionary theory. If the new order of love is to stand, it likewise must secure an intellectual basis. It is the province of the church to provide this basis, and the method by which it is to be provided cannot be by educating the few, but by inclining the minds of all the people.

In the process of taking the world for Christ, the time has come when we must make the message we have preached permeate the social order and control all departments of human life. This means that as we have stressed evangelism in the past we must stress education in the future. This does not by any means imply that the evangelistic impulse will be lacking or that we may turn aside from the work of saving men. It does mean, however, that Christian education must in the future loom larger in our plans than it has ever appeared before; it must become more and more the leading agency through which we will save the souls of men and extend the kingdom of heaven throughout all the earth.

Its Larger Meaning

Of course, Christian education means to the church infinitely more than the operation of its own schools and colleges. Avowedly and distinctly Christian institutions of learning conducted under the auspices of the church are certainly necessary. But it is none the less necessary to make sure that the elements of Christian education are carried by the church into those tax-supported institutions, which, in the nature of the case, cannot show a distinctly Christian character officially. Greater and greater grows the influence of these universities; more intense must become the work of the church in connection with them. Fundamentally Christian education must run the entire course of life and embrace all the elements of Christian culture. It will transform the thought of the church and make every local congregation a teaching, no less than a preaching, agency. It will involve a thorough policy of coalition and cooperation between such agencies as the board of education, the Sunday school, young people's societies and the local congregation. It must perfect a plan of operation whereby children will be pointed from the cradle to the Christian College. It is a mistake to approach the twenty-year old youth, who has been reared in a home where there was little appreciation of education, perhaps, and under the influence of an idea that success is to be estimated in financial terms, and then present to him for the first time in his life the claims of Christian education.

The larger idea of Christian education will no doubt involve a considerable overhauling within the Christian college itself. Its main reason for existence is to be Christian, and when it falters in this respect it has forfeited its chief motive in life. It must not, indeed, be turned into an agency of propaganda for religion; its supreme test must always be an educational test. But on our interpretation the broader principles of Christianity are a fundamental part of the truest education and they must always be kept in the forefront. It is a cause of gratification that they are today receiving in the Christian colleges a better application and emphasis than ever before.

While the college must not be considered as an agency of propaganda, it is legitimate for the church to expect a large and conscious service from it. This service is the production for the church of leaders trained for the social and educational task. We need here to stop and take an appraisal. Is the service which our church schools render to the church, over and above that which may be rendered by the state school, commensurate with their opportunity or even with the demands they now make of the church? Is the graduate of a Christian school necessarily a better Christian, or even a better church worker, than the graduate of a state school? Will he make a better director of religious education in his congregation or be better equipped to serve as an official or administrator in the congregation to which he belongs? It should be so that each and every graduate of a church school is, by virtue of the fact, a trained expert in religious education and church administration, ready to step at once into his congregation and revolutionize it from the standpoint of education, outlook and vision. With this aim in view the policies, methods and curricula of our Christian colleges should be arranged.

Thus by training of such workers, by a system of propaganda which will keep education constantly before the church, by transforming the local congregation into a teaching agency, by directing the minds of all children to the Christian college so that they naturally incline to it from childhood, and by cooperation between all agencies working among Christians to the same general end, the church may be in a position to undertake the Christianization of the social order by direct influence upon the very people who will tomorrow make the social order.

The Defense of the Faith

BY T. R. GLOVER

In commenting on the election as president of Dr. T. R. Glover, at the recent annual meeting of the Baptists of Great Britain and Ireland, the "Baptist Times and Freeman" says: "Doctor Glover has one contribution which he can make in a way and to a degree possible perhaps to no other man. Doctor Glover has the ear of the young men and young women of this country. They will listen to him as to no one else."

SINCE I write for the "Daily News" people write to me from all round, people whom I do not know, but who are anxious about me and what I am doing and the effects it may have. They tell me how wrong I am. Now it is a postcard to say that Dean Inge and I have both much to learn. Whatever may be the case with Dean Inge, I have long felt this true of myself, and I feel it more and more. Another time it is a theological treatise in manuscript with a vigorous title. Or, again, some one writes that if I will buy a book by somebody else who knows forty languages (price 1s.) I may find out how sadly astray all the Old Testament scholars are. For my part I have been trying for forty years to learn two ancient languages and I have not succeeded at all to my satisfaction. So I am disinclined to pay a shilling for a book by a man who has learned forty languages—one a year perhaps; I don't believe either that he has, or that it would matter if he did. For I know a little about scholarship by now; I have met many great scholars; and I think I know a scholar when I see one or read his work, and I don't care to tell him, or suggest to myself, that I could do it better. Hence, on a great many things I take the judgment of scholars, sometimes, as my readers may have observed, with a little caution, as they would take mine.

Now, knowing how long it takes to learn anything thoroughly, and how easily your results may be upset as you go along by the discovery of facts that have escaped you, I do not want to make my religion depend on a complicated structure of ancient texts and medieval or even modern scholarship. In the daily round and common task, in the shaping and controlling of impulse and thought, in short, in the business of life I find I need a foundation of some strength and endurance. A loose stone heap, where some of the stones may be crumbling clods, will not do; nor the many and miscellaneous piles of a lake-dweller's primitive platform. The points and places, at which things may give way, I feel, must be lessened. If it is essential to the Christian faith (the New Testament does not say so) to hold that in a certain year B. C. a man, by name Moses, the details of whose career are precisely known, wrote an account of creation, word by word, and letter by letter, accurate and so complete that no geology or other science can ever add a syllable to it, then I say, so much the worse for the Christian faith.

But, as I said, I know what scholars are, and I also know personally many men of science. Instead of finding them markedly worse than traditionalist theologians and ordinary people, I find them very often more candid, more keen upon truth, simpler, and a great deal more humble. The great scholars are not the arrogant dogmatists that outsiders suppose. I find it hard to think that to God men, so earnest in the pursuit of truth, so open-minded, and so modest, should be anathema, simply because they do not take the narratives of Genesis as historical and scientific truth. I cannot think that to Jesus of Nazareth they would have been repellent; I think he would again and again have found them congenial. But, if literal acceptance of every syllable of Moses is essential to a Christian, these men are outside the pale of Christendom.

Liberal Acceptance

Religion must depend on something more verifiable than records attributed to Moses, or even (I will add) detached sayings attributed to Jesus. For some one (I forgot who it was) said a wise thing—that we do better to judge and test the evangelists by Jesus than to judge and test Jesus by the evangelists. I find passages in the Gospels, very obviously in the vein of Jesus, to the effect that the outcome of a life and its fruit is what gives you the clue to the truth and value of a man's thoughts of God. Paul was of the same mind as Jesus; he found all corruption to be the outcome of a central false conception of God, and the fruits of the spirit he found in love, joy, self-control and meekness. With this test before me I find that some of the best Christians I have known were men singularly independent of Moses and Daniel and Jonah, and very little interested in them. (Robert Ingersoll was much more interested in them, and much less intelligent, so far as I can judge, of Jesus). I conclude that a literal acceptance of the Old Testament as history in every syllable is not a part of the Christian faith.

But a lot of people say the opposite. Traditionalists and sceptics unite on that, and both groups have said it so long and said it so loud, that their statement has been widely heard and widely believed. "Christianity," accordingly, with many people, "is believing all about Jonah and the whale and the axe that floated, and so on; an endorsement of every misconception of God that the Hebrews ever formed." As a result they will hear no more about Jesus Christ. They suffer the loss; but the sin rests chiefly with the traditionalists, who, too lazy and too cowardly to think, misrepresented God and made the gospel ridiculous. They cannot blame the sceptics who took them at their word. . . . .

There are three questions I would wish to put about "the man in the street," for whom my critics are so anxious: Why should his mind not be temporarily disquieted to obtain a higher view of scripture and Christ and God? How can anybody suggest that the average man is not aware of what science and scholarship are doing? Who is responsible for the ordinary man's damnation (if he really is ordinary, and if he is damned)—the people who by a false theory drove him from Christ or the scholars who tried to show the ordinary man that common honesty and common sense in historical and scientific research were not alien to faith in Christ? . . . .

I believe that a thoroughgoing acceptance of modern critical methods is not inconsistent with a genuine evangelicalism, and is the real reply to cheap atheism and lazy indifference.

I believe that the modern scholar's attitude to religion is a more serious one than the old traditionalism, with its fear of questions and its mental laziness, and that with every increase in seriousness the claims of Christ are felt to be more real.

The Declaration of Independence and Its Author

FEW men, having been chosen to fill the office of president of the United States of America, would be willing to have that fact omitted from their obituaries or eliminated from their epitaphs.

Thomas Jefferson, third president of the United States, served in that office for eight years, 1801-1809. He died on July 4, 1826, and his body was interred at his Virginia home, Monticello. The stone which marks his grave bears the epitaph which he himself wrote and ordered inscribed thereon:

Here was Buried
Thomas Jefferson
Author of the Declaration of American Independence—of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and
Father of the University of Virginia.

The common factor in these three achievements is freedom. To have contributed to the civil, religious and intellectual emancipation of the American people—this Thomas Jefferson believed to have been his greatest service to his fellowmen.

The House Where Jefferson Wrote The Declaration of Independence, 700 Market Street, Philadelphia. Erected 1775. Demolished 1883.

The Declaration of Independence came after long and painful discussion and negotiation designed to avert a break with England. The first positive overture was taken by Virginia when in May 1776 its legislature authorized the Virginia delegates in congress to propose a declaration that the colonies were and of right ought to be free. Pursuant to that action Richard Henry Lee presented to the congress on June 7 three resolutions: 1. For a declaration of independence; 2. For seeking foreign alliances; 3. For devising a plan of confederation. None of these proposals was finally disposed of until the following month; but committees were appointed to work on each of the three items. The committee to prepare a declaration statement consisted of Thomas Jefferson of Virginia, Roger Sherman of Connecticut, Ben Franklin of Pennsylvania, R. R. Livingston of New York, and John Adams of Massachusetts.

Adams, writing in 1805, states that the committee had several meetings and made suggestions as to the scope of the proposed paper, and that Jefferson and himself were appointed a sub-committee to draw up the declaration, which Jefferson prepared from the minutes of the conferences. Jefferson, however, in an account written in 1823, which he says was based on notes made at the time, declares that Adams is in error; that there was no sub-committee, and no substantial revision of the document after it had been written, before its presentation to the congress:

"They unanimously pressed on myself alone to undertake the draught. I consented; I drew it; but before I reported it to the committee, I communicated it separately to Doctor Franklin and Mr. Adams requesting their corrections..... Their alterations were two or three only, and merely verbal. I then wrote a fair copy, reported it to the Committee, and from them, unaltered to Congress."

Although Jefferson had been a member of the congress for a year, he had attended little, and had taken little or no part in the debates. He had, however, "the reputation of a masterful pen" (Adams), and, according to one historian, "was beyond all doubt the most widely-read man in the Continental Congress." He had arrived from Virginia, May 14 (the day before his state voted in favor of a declaration of independence); and three days later wrote to a friend reflecting a state of unrest and discomfort: "I am here in the same uneasy anxious state in which I was last fall without Mrs. Jefferson who could not come with me." Doubtless it was this restless and homesick mood which led him to welcome an opportunity to secure living quarters with a small family in a new brick house not far from Independence Hall where the congress was sitting. On the southwest corner of High Street (now Market) and Seventh, a Mr. Graaf had recently erected a three-story building, and with his wife and baby occupied a part of it as their home. The second floor, consisting of two rooms, furnished, Jefferson rented for 35 shillings per week, and in these two rooms he lived from May 23 until he returned to Virginia, September 3.

The declaration was written during the period of June 11 to 28, and of that document Thomas Jefferson was the sole author, as is evident from his statement above quoted. Shortly before Mr. Jefferson's death in 1826 the question of the place of writing the declaration was under discussion, and in reply to a letter of inquiry, he wrote as follows:

"At the time of writing that instrument I lodged in the house of a Mr. Gratz (Graaf), a new brick house three stories high, of which I rented the second floor, consisting of a parlor and bedroom, already furnished. In that parlor I wrote habitually, and in it I wrote this paper particularly."

Entries in Jefferson's personal account book for the year 1776 ("May 23, took lodgings at Graaf's;" "June 4 pd Graaf one week's lodging 35s", etc.) confirm this testimony and establish beyond controversy the place where the Declaration of Independence was written. Within a few years after Jefferson's tenancy, a fourth story was added, and a second building was erected and incorporated with the first; so that most extant woodcuts indicate the altered and not the original building. The woodcut reproduced with this article is of the building exactly as Jefferson knew it, and is used by courtesy of the American Bond, of Westerville, Ohio. The entire structure was razed in 1883, and the Penn National Bank now occupies the site. A tablet on the Market Street front commemorates the great achievement and its author's imperishable fame.

On June 28, Jefferson reported to congress for the committee, and his "fair copy" was received and laid on the table, pending action on Lee's resolution in favor of independence.

On July 1 Lee's resolution in favor of independence was discussed for nine hours. It is a deplorable fact that this epoch-making debate had no reporters; and that the great speeches, especially of Adams and Dickinson, are unrecorded in the annals of the nation. Final action came on July 2 when the congress adopted Lee's resolution, twelve states favoring and New York not voting.

Jefferson's report, which was the formal apology and defense for the action just taken by the congress, was then taken up for consideration, and was debated through that day, and the two following days. Jefferson sat hurt and writhing while one-fourth of his impassioned words were eliminated—constituting as he felt, the very strongest passages of the declaration. As the close of the last day (July 4) drew on, the amended document was agreed to in committee of the whole, reported to the house and formally adopted.

Two familiar legends associated with Independence Day seem to fail of vindication when tested by careful historical research. There is no satisfactory evidence that the Liberty Bell was rung on July 4; and it appears improbable that the members of the congress signed the declaration on the date of its adoption. July 2 was the date of the real birth of independence, and the bell doubtless rang that day. The declaration was formally proclaimed to the people on July 8, and the bell was rung then also. On July 19, the congress ordered that the declaration be engrossed and signed by the delegates, and this signing was done on August 2, as the records of the congress clearly indicate. Despite Jefferson's assurances to the contrary, the preponderance of evidence and the weight of modern scholarship is against the opinion that a signing took place on July 4.

(The Old South Association, Boston, Mass., publishes reprints of many of the most precious and important documents relating to American history, including the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, the Northwest Territory Ordinance, and the Mayflower Compact, at a cost of five cents each. These documents are valuable to teachers and to all students of American ideals and principles.)

The Perpetual Crisis in the Christian Church

AS reported in the Boston Transcript Dr. Henry van Dyke addressed the congregations of the Brick and Park Presbyterian churches in New York on the above subject. His address bears largely on the action of the General Assembly at Indianapolis. He said in part:

"It is said that the Christian church today is at a crisis. Well, this seems natural, inevitable, and not at all alarming to a believer in Christ, confident that truth will prevail. The fact is, Christianity was born in a crisis and never has gotten out of it and never will till the final victory is won and questioning minds of men are brought into harmony with the mind of Christ Jesus.

"Christ was sent of God to create a trial, a contest, a sundering and separating of the thoughts of men. Simeon, taking the holy babe in his arms, said of him: 'This child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel; and for a sign which shall be spoken against; that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed.' Jesus said of himself: 'I am come not to send peace, but a sword.' Why, then, should we be surprised at the recurrence of crises, not only between Christianity and its enemies, but within the church itself, as it struggles through the maze of human opinions to clear knowledge of the truth? Disputes arose among the early fathers. Paul and Barnabas had 'no small dissension' with the Judaizers who came to stir up strife. Every age has found the church in a crisis, and so it will be till the day breaks and shadows flee away.

"Let us ask ourselves about the nature and meaning of this perpetual crisis, what are the factors involved and the issues at stake? No one can have doubt about the nature of the crisis. In regard to the ancient scriptures, the scribes and Pharisees held to the letter that killeth; Christ, to the spirit that maketh alive. They interpreted every page literally and damned all that would not follow. The Pharisees taught that God was a stern judge; Christ taught that God was a wise, forgiving Father. They held that righteousness consisted in obedience to the external, keeping clean the outside of the cup and the platter; Christ taught that it must rise freely out of a pure heart. They regarded salvation as secured by strict obedience to law; Christ taught that it came by faith, penitence, hope, and love. The Pharisees had hid the divine commandment in a mass of human tradition; Christ had two great commandments: Love God with all your heart; love your neighbor as yourself.

"This was Christ's test of discipleship: 'If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.' What other test does any church need than this, with the acknowledgment that he who gave the test is the only begotten Son of God, who saves us by his life and his death on Calvary?

"Here is the contest—between the letter and the spirit, between reasonableness and obscuration, between sense and superstition, between liberality and censoriousness, between the open and the closed mind. The same old crisis recurs from year to year, and from age to age. Radicals reject the divine supremacy of Christ, and reactionaries are afraid to stand fast in their liberty. In both parties are good, honest men, who mean well but are mistaken, having forgotten Christ's promise: 'When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth.'

"In the light of this saying, let us consider calmly the form in which the perpetual crisis has come to that branch of Christ's church to which we have the honor to belong.

"Under the leadership of a sincere, devoted, but frequently mistaken man, there has been an attempt to force two or three things which would have crippled our church and ruined her constitution. First, there was the attempt to declare war between religion and science by denouncing the evolutionary hypothesis as anti-scriptural. Three or four hundred years ago the church was so misled as to denounce Galileo and the Copernican system, by which all our calendars are now regulated. She has lived to repent of this and to accept the proved fact that the earth is round, and that the sun only seems to rise and set. This has not blotted out the Bible. Holy Scripture was given by inspiration, not to teach science or history, but to guide us onward in religion. It is a record of the progressive experience of the spirit of man in contact with the spirit of God.

"The highly probable hypothesis of evolution, not yet proved, means to this gentleman and his followers that man was descended from monkeys. They would do well to read before they talk. If they read the Bible, what do they find about the origin of man? Just this: 'The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.' There is no word as to how long it took, or by what means the dust of the earth, the same stuff from which animals were framed, was formed into a fit dwelling for the heaven-born soul. Was it by wetting the dust and patting it, as a child makes a plaything? It seems much more reasonable to me to believe that the body of man formed of dust, the Divine Maker working through years from form to form till at last, man, fearfully and wonderfully made, was fit to receive the inbreathing of soul capable of attaining immortality. If science can show us that this was the way, we shall have reason to thank God. Evolution will not contradict but throw sunlight on the immortal destiny of the soul.

"The second mistake has been the attempt to impose on the Presbyterian Church, five new tests taken from a deliverance of the general assembly of 1910. No deliverance of the assembly has any binding force unconfirmed by constitutional methods. The only test

The Full Confession of Nathan Hale

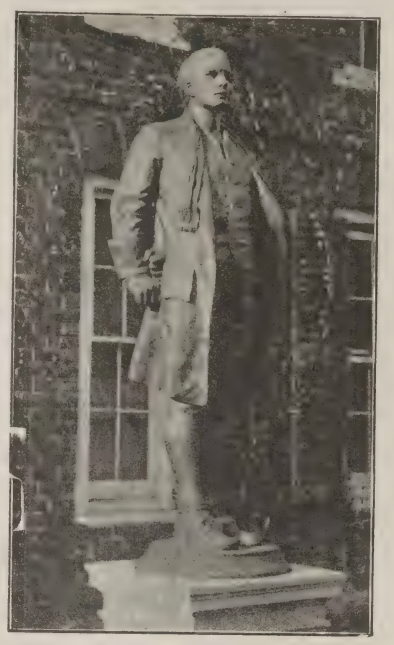
By George E. Burlingame

"Headqrs New York Island, Septr 22d, 1776

"A spy from the enemy (by his own full confession) apprehended last night, was this day executed at 11 o'clock in front of the Artillery Park."



The above words, included in the regular daily orders from General Howe, commander-in-chief of the British army in New York, were published on the evening of September 22. They announced the end of a daring adventure undertaken by a young Connecticut soldier in fulfilment of a request of General Washington.

Two weeks earlier, before the British forces had crossed over from Long Island to occupy Manhattan Island, Nathan Hale, a captain in Knowlton's Rangers, having learned that Washington desired to send a spy into Howe's army to secure information concerning his plans and resources, was discussing the hazardous enterprise with his old college-mate and fellow-captain, William Hull. Hull (later involved in the surrender of Detroit to the British in the War of 1812) sought to dissuade him from offering himself for this odious task. Hale replied: " I am fully sensible of the consequences of discovery and capture in such a situation. But for a year I have been attached to the army, and have not rendered any material service while receiving a compensation for which I make no return. Yet I am not influenced by the expectation of promotion or pecuniary reward; I wish to be useful, and every kind of service, necessary to that public good, becomes honorable by being necessary. If the exigencies of my country demand a peculiar service its claims to perform that service are imperious."

The American army was encamped at the upper end of Manhattan Island, in the vicinity of the present site of Columbia University. Captain Hale left on his fatal mission about September 10 to 12, and made his way up the Sound searching for a crossing to Long Island. He was of course ignorant of the fact that Howe was at that very time moving his army from Brooklyn into New York City. Hale's plan was to get over to Long Island and enter the British lines, disguised as a Dutch schoolmaster. He made a crossing from South Norwalk to Huntington and without interference succeeded in entering the British lines.

Before the evening of the twenty-first he had obtained the information desired, and with his notes hidden in his shoes he came to the enemy's line facing the Americans. Howe's troops were extended across the high ground north of Central Park, and if Hale came this far, he could see on that fateful evening the outposts of his own army a mile away, at what is now 127th Street. That last mile of his projected journey he was destined never to traverse; for by some adverse circumstance or by the alertness of a watchful sentry, he came under suspicion and was seized and placed under arrest.

Captain Hull, who knew him so well, had forewarned him that his characteristic frankness made him unfit for the service of a spy; and this judgment seemed to have its fulfilment after Hale's arrest. He was at once taken before General Howe, whose headquarters were at the old Beekman mansion at First Avenue and 51st street. According to Howe's aid-de-camp, Capt. John Montressor, when he was searched and the paper discovered, revealing his character as a spy, "he at once declared his name, his rank in the American army, and his object in coming within the British lines." This act of noble courage, this fearless avowal of his devotion to the American cause, are recorded imperishably in the orders published by General Howe the next day: "A spy from the enemy (by his own full confession) apprehended last night." (The original order is in the records of the New York Historical Society.).

"No explanation, no evasion, no base cringing with an offer to enlist in his army, no cowardly cry for pardon could come from him. That he gave his name at once, also his rank in the Continental Army, and stated his object in entering the British lines, we know through Hull from Montressor; but what more may he not have confessed—his love for his Washington, his hopes for the new nation, and his conviction of final success? In this full confession it is still the Hale whom we have been following that we see—the true, self-poised, undaunted youth, whose ingrained nobility no circumstances or peril could affect." (Johnston, "Nathan Hale").

This heroic and unreserved avowal of his position sufficed for the British general, and Captain Hale, without trial, was ordered to be hanged as a spy the next morning. He spent the night in the custody of the provost guard, Cunningham, "as great a savage as ever disgraced humanity" (Hull). He sought consolation in the word of God which he had learned to love in the old home at South Coventry; but a Bible was denied him. He asked the privilege of seeing a minister, and this also was refused. Letters written during that long night, to his mother and to his former sweetheart, were destroyed by Cunningham, "that the rebels should not know that they had a man in their army who could die with such firmness."

The hour for his execution brought new occasion for insult and humiliation. He was insulted to the last moment of his life. "This is a fine death for a soldier!" said one of the officers surrounding him on the way to the Artillery Park by the Dove Tavern. Hale lifted his cap and replied, "Sir, there is no death which would not be rendered noble in such a glorious cause."

On the evening of September 22 the American sentries perceived a flag of truce approaching. It was borne by Captain John Montressor, the aid-de-camp of General Howe. He was met by General Washington's aid, Adjutant-General Joseph Reed, attended by General Israel Putnam and Captain Alexander Hamilton. Montressor related the account of Hale's arrest, examination and death. He told of Hale's frank confession, of Howe's swift sentence, of Cunningham's brutality, of the gentle dignity with which Hale bore himself on the way to his execution. He repeated the last words of this young patriot as he stood on the cart facing a spy's shameful death:

"I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

"My country!" The words of the Declaration of Independence adopted by Congress eleven weeks before, were fresh in his mind. We may believe that as he crossed the sound, and trod the perilous way down the island, and entered New York City, he was sustained by the closing sentence of that immortal document: "For the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor." Life, fortune, sacred honor: all were imperiled—"for my country!" It is unlikely that he had ever seen the stars and stripes; but perhaps on that fatal evening when he thought himself at the gateway to freedom and security just before his arrest, he caught a glimpse of the Grand Union flag waving over the American lines which he failed to reach—emblem of his nation and symbol of the freedom he was seeking to secure. To live was indeed sweet; and at twenty-one, with a rich Christian faith and a great love for humankind, and an unusual capacity for culture, life meant much to Nathan Hale. Yet, even as he took his stand the next day on the cart and waited while the rope was knotted around his neck, perhaps he recalled that summer day a year ago when he was recruiting men for his company and had stopped at the New Haven home of his old Yale friend, Doctor Munson. As he talked of his mission and of the American cause, he cried out in ecstasy, "Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori! ("Sweet it is, and fitting, to die for one's country!") The hour had come for him to taste the sweetness, to demonstrate the fitness, of such a death. "Our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor!" His cherished motto must now be freely translated into suffering, martyrdom; and for this ordeal Nathan Hale was ready. He sorrowed not that he must die; he sorrowed only that he could not suffer more for the cause in whose behalf he had risked all —"I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

As an occasion for commemoration of genuine patriotism and self-sacrifice in which the sympathy of this whole nation is moved by every allusion to the event, the execution of Nathan Hale has no parallel in our history, and offers a theme worthy of the most exalted eloquence, and the most touching historic art."
—New York Historical Society.

In the old burying-ground at South Coventry, Connecticut, overlooking beautiful Lake Waugaumbaug, is an unpretentious and weatherbeaten stone, set up by members of Nathan Hale's family early in the last century, to commemorate his sacrifice. It bears this impressive inscription:

"Durable stone preserve the monumental record. Nathan Hale, Esq., a Capt. in the army of the United States, who was born June 6th, 1755, and received the first honors of Yale College, Sept. 1773, resigned his life a Sacrifice to his country's liberty at New York, Sept. 22nd, 1776. Etatis 22d."

Later memorials include the shaft of Quincy granite at the entrance to the same cemetery; a bronze statue in the capitol at Hartford, by Gerhardt; a bronze statue by Woods in front of the Hartford Athenaeum; the familiar MacMonnies statute in City Hall Park, New York (recently moved to the Broadway side); a statue in a city park in St. Paul, by Partridge; and memorials at South Norwalk and Huntington where he made his crossing of the sound. Finally, the statue by Bela Pratt, which stands in front of the old "South Middle Hall" at Yale where Hale roomed during his college days, is portrayed in the cut which accompanies this article. It shows the young captain at the moment prior to his death, with hands and feet bound, with spirit gloriously free, and with the immortal legacy of his last words on his lips—his complete ratification of the Declaration of Independence, in which he gave his life, his fortune and his sacred honor, and lamented that he could give no more.

A Fellow-Student's Tribute—

"Erect and tall, his well-proportioned frame,
Vigorous and active, as electric flame;
His manly limbs had symmetry and grace,
And innate goodness marked his beauteous face.....
For erudition far beyond his years;
At Yale distinguished above all his peers.....
Removed from envy, malice, pride and strife,
He walked through goodness as he walked through life;
A kinder brother nature never knew,
A child more duteous or a friend more true."

Nehushtan

BY O. P. EACHES

In the wilderness wanderings there were in close connection the bitter murmuring, the serpent bites, the up-raised brazen serpent, the healing. Fittingly the brazen serpent and the manna were preserved as we treasure our battle flags. They were reminders of God's interposition in times of utter need and appeals to obedience and trust in God. They were only things, but they spoke of large spiritual truths. In time they became, not helps to piety, but hindrances. As long as they spoke of God they were helpful to piety, but when the brazen serpent became a kind of God itself, it became a snare to the people. And then Hezekiah, an old-time Puritan, took a hammer and broke it in pieces saying "Nehushtan it is a vain thing." (2 Kings 18:4). His hammer became a preacher of righteousness, introducing a time of reformation. Hezekiah was an iconoclast, a prophet of destruction, but he was at the same time a constructive teacher affirming that customs, institutions, ordinances that have lost their spiritual character, that pervert the truths, must be done away with. Other ages besides the eighth century before Christ need Hezekiahs with their hammers.

Baptism is an ordinance of divine origin (Matt. 21-25), submitted to by Jesus, practised by him, commanded by him, designed to be observed everywhere and always. It is a John the Baptist speaking of Jesus, his death and resurrection. It is a witness to Christ—a visible confession of faith. It affirms a death to sin. It is a symbolic putting on of Christ over the life. It is an open, joyous enlistment in Christ's cause to be honored, reverenced, practised. In time it became not an observance speaking of Christ, but an agency of salvation, a kind of Christ in itself. An intelligent man said to the author, "I believe that my little child would go to hell if dying unbaptized." All high churches today and all state churches exalt baptism far above the New Testament conception of it. When a minister says, after placing water upon the head of an unconscious child, "Dearly beloved seeing that this child has been regenerated and become an inheritor of the kingdom of God," he is covering over the New Testament conception of baptism, is preaching a doctrine that is hurtful spiritually to all who are thus baptized. The doctrine of baptismal regeneration needs in every age and country a Hezekiah who will smite it with a New Testament, saying, "Nehushtan—it is a vain thing."

A Modern Hezekiah Needed

The Lord's Supper was meant to be a memorial meal, with Christ enshrined in it. It speaks of sins forgiven through the blood, of fellowship with him, a life depending on him, a supporting Saviour, a reunion. Nothing could be more simple or more tender than this meal. In time this simplicity was forgotten and it became an agency through which eternal life comes to the soul. All high churches among Protestants and the Romish church give it a place in the Christian system to which it is not entitled. The mass, the belief that the supper has power in and of itself to help the spiritual life of the participant need the presence of a modern Hezekiah who will strip off their false claims.

The church also has passed through this same process. It was, at the first, a simple congregation of believers joined about the personal Christ, for joint worship, for united service, for material helpfulness. Then it became synonymous with the kingdom of God, entrance into which meant salvation and eternal life. This places the church above Christian character and makes a growing churchianity and a lessening Christianity. The church should be loved, entered into, reverenced, helped, but we must beware lest a brazen serpent of today becomes a thing to steal away the heart from the Christ who owns the church.

Orthodoxy is desirable, especially in days of loose thinking. A right creed, in the long run, is essential to right living. But an orthodoxy held in bitterness, not allied to devout living, rested upon an assuring salvation—such an orthodoxy is dangerous. James takes up the hammer of Hezekiah and smites it. (James 2:19). Ordinances and institutions meant to be for our good may, through human perversion, become hurtful. It must be ours through the study of the New Testament to keep the brazen serpent in its proper place.

Night Roads

He tarried all night because the sun was set.—Gen. 28:11

LET me not turn my steps aside
Or tarry on the way
Though dusks of disappointment hide
The fast-declining day.

'Tis safe and easy on the path
To travel with the sun,
But he who braves the shadows hath
The half his guerdon won.

O Lord, but dimly I can see:
No lights the highway mark!
Yet, teach me how to trust to thee
And travel in the dark.

Self-Support in Education

How can the income be increased to meet the operating budget?

By James M. Wood

THE man who aspires to become president of a twentieth century college must put behind him all ambition to inaugurate and to direct the development of educational policies. However laudable the desire and however well qualified he may be for leadership in this field, the task is not for him. On the one hand he is a competitor of the organ-grinder with his tin-cup outstretched to receive the pennies with which to meet the regular annual deficit in his operating budget. On the other hand, like the organized "system," he sends forth his agents to prey upon the philanthropist, large and small, for "endowments" with which to create greater deficits, and so on ad infinitum.

This introduces the reader to one of the most serious problems confronting the American college. How can the income be increased to meet the operating budget? The current practice, aggravated in post-war days, is the "drive" for increased endowments.

Inherent in this plan are several elements of weakness. The frequency and the persistence with which they are presented by over-enthusiastic solicitors is alienating from the college many of its own clientele. The institution is compelled to appear at all times before the public as a mendicant seeking alms, an attitude that is certainly not conducive to a feeling of self-respect, either in a man or in an institution. Moreover, the student is encouraged in the pernicious feeling that the college owes him something more than he pays for. It is a mistake to assume that education must be sold below the actual cost of production in order to accommodate the poor boy. He enters college not as a decrepit, nor as an imbecile, but as an able-bodied American citizen, capable of making his own way if given a chance. However poverty stricken he may be, what is needed and desired is not a gift, but a source from which he can borrow the margin between his own earning capacity and what it actually costs to give him the training that is to double, treble and quadruple his own earning power. His board, room, fees and incidentals must be met anyhow. The comparatively small additional amount needed to carry him through college would not greatly increase his burden. In many colleges the margin between the present charge and the actual cost of instruction is doubtless represented by a sum less than $100 a year.

Dollars Released for Indulgences

Given buildings, grounds, and necessary equipment, probably 75 per cent of the students now attending college could, without serious embarrassment, pay each his proportionate share of what it actually costs to educate him. Laboring under the mistaken impression that the small minority of students attending college are and should continue to be objects of charity, colleges are pursuing a policy that releases from all sense of obligation this group, and likewise the vast majority who could with comparative ease pay the legitimate cost of instruction. Endowments, as at present administered, release many a dollar for the theatre, the movie house, the ice cream parlor, but students should indulge in them only after repaying the college that gives them training for their life work the sum it has actually paid out for their instruction.

Is there, then, no need for the college endowment? There certainly is. This article is not a condemnation of the endowment, but rather of a policy of administration that does not rest upon a sound business basis; one that is continually placing the college before the public in a wrong light; and one that, by implication at least, teaches its students to expect from the institution more than they give in return.

The function of an endowment should be to stabilize the finances of an institution. When a bank or other business enterprise is organized, its stock-holders invest certain sums, to which are added annually an undivided surplus. These constitute reserves and guarantees against emergency situations. So long as business is prosperous they are not drawn against; they are held against periods of business depression or other unforeseen emergencies. The college, which serves a public without thought of institutional profit, should likewise have a capital sum, known as endowment, sufficiently large to create a sinking fund to tide it over periods when the student attendance falls below the normal capacity of the institution. This endowment should be conditioned upon such a reorganization of the financial policy of the college as might be necessary to equalize its normal expense budget and the actual income from student sources.

This article is not an attempt to diminish, but rather to increase, the interest of a public in the particular institution that it is maintaining. The present system is felt by many to be unjust to the college, to its student body, and to its public alike. It would be manifestly unjust to charge against the present generation of students the initial outlay for buildings, grounds, and equipment. A careful survey of a given institution should be made, its physical needs determined upon the basis of the work to be undertaken and the student body to be served, and these should be provided. When this is done a fund should be created within the normal revenues of the college sufficient to care for replacements and necessary repairs, leaving to the public the task of providing for needed expansion.

A college under the auspices of a particular group has the undoubted right to demand financial support for any program which that group wishes emphasized. A church, for instance, that wishes the college maintained under its auspices to give special emphasis to the religious training of its student body, should undoubtedly bear the necessary cost of such instruction.

In order to serve best its particular clientele, there should be in every college a research department, presided over by the best available expert whose duty it should be to determine the extent to which the college is actually functioning in meeting the needs of the student body. For instance, colleges for women should cease borrowing their courses of study from the curricula of colleges for men. Under expert direction there should be a job-analysis made of the things that woman actually does to determine the qualities needed to make her most efficient as a home maker; as an economic factor in society; as a member of community organization, such as clubs and churches; as the conserver of the highest culture and best ideals of the race. Once these qualities have been determined, the entire curriculum should be built around them. The effort of the college for women should then be directed consciously towards the training of its students for the things that, as women, they are actually to be and to do. Every successful business takes an annual inventory of its stock. If the college were to profit by its example much rubbish would be drawn from the pigeonholes in which knowledge has been encased, and in which too often it has become encrusted. Since the benefits of such an inventory would surely not accrue to the present generation of students, the expense should not be borne by them, but should be supplied from public sources.

Temporary Assistance

Last, but not least, the college should be provided by its friends with loan-funds sufficient to care for the boy or the girl who needs temporary assistance. In rare instances only should this assistance be given other than as a loan.

While the public can in no sense be relieved of responsibility for the college that it has fostered and that has unselfishly served its interests, assistance should be rendered in accord with sound business policy. By providing emergency funds for the institution and for the student body, its ultimate aim should be complete economic independence for both.

Not only can this be done, but faculties can also be paid adequate salaries without making tuition fees exorbitant. In many instances it would doubtless mean drastic reorganization of financial policies. Other business enterprises make such reorganization. Why should the college be immune?

FAITH of our fathers, living still,
In spite of dungeons, fire and sword,
Oh, how our hearts beat high with joy,
Whene'er we hear that glorious word.

Faith of our fathers, faith and prayer
Have kept our country brave and free,
And thro' the truth that comes from God,
Her children have true liberty!

Faith of our fathers, we will love
Both friend and foe in all our strife;
And preach thee, too, as love knows how,
By kindly words and virtuous life.

EVOLUTION AND CHRISTIAN FAITH

The public discussion now being carried on concerning the Darwinian theory of the origin of species, including man, may prove opportune and helpful, if it clears up the misunderstanding which prevails concerning the subject. The misunderstanding is largely due to varied and confused ideas as to the meaning of evolution, therefore, a clear and concise definition of the term appears to be the first thing needed. Fourteen years ago a professor in the University of Wisconsin presented to his class such a definition. Upon the blackboard he had placed the names of "the fifteen leading scientists in the world" as they were then ranked. All but two of the fifteen scientists listed held to the definition as given, the professor declared. One of the two who did not accept it was Agassiz.

This is the definition given to the class: "Evolution is the development of organic forms by the operation of the forces of nature without design." "Organic forms" include both vegetable and animal life.

The phrase "without design" plainly denies a plan in nature's operations. It does not recognize a Creator as having any part in the development of living beings.

Scientific evolution adopts, as its fundamental principle, the materialistic idea of the universe as composed of matter which has inherent forces and methods of action, and by such action all existing things have been produced. It denies the existence of spirit and rejects the idea of an infinite Creator. Students of biological science have to face this materialistic explanation of organic life.

A professor in the agricultural department of a leading state university, several years ago, said to me, "With the very first bulb that a student examines he begins to get infidel ideas." He added, "When I entered the university I was an earnest believer in God and Christ as my Saviour; but by the time I had finished my course I had lost my faith altogether, and it took me seven years to get it back again."

Should the church take no stand against such training of young people? Although the "missing links" between man and the ape or other ancestor have not yet been found, still a Christian need not reject the theory of a directed, or creative evolution, and this is doubtless what most Christian believers in evolution understand it to mean; but this is not scientific evolution.

As the method of dealing with the subject of the origin of species and evolution of organic forms, in general, has such a direct influence upon Christian faith, it seems as if the church should require that a plain, definite, and clear statement of their theory of evolution be given by college and university professors. Then the Christian church and all persons who wish to maintain our Christian faith can take a decisive stand against infidel teachings.

FUNDAMENTAL BAPTIST PRINCIPLES

A study of the Anabaptists of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries reveals that they were renowned for their simple religious life, their effort to reproduce New Testament religion, and the great principles of individual and collective religious life, rather than perfect uniformity of doctrinal belief. The Baptists of the present day have an outlook in religion and church polity very similar to these early forefathers of a great Christian movement.

There really is no Baptist church, but there are Baptist churches, each one possessing the right of independent thought, experience, faith, policy and life, and all associated together in religious and social fellowship. No Baptist churches or groups of churches have the right to coerce another church in matters of faith or practice. English Baptists receive members of Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches, by letter, without immersion, yet the Baptists of America, who quite generally follow a more rigid plan, gladly recognize the English brethren as true Baptists, and cordially fellowship with them.

Baptists of today, when true to their heritage, are the living expression of great religious principles, rather than uniformity of doctrinal statements. The statement of faith in one Baptist church may differ even considerably from that in another Baptist church, and yet both churches be genuinely Baptist. We differ in many matters of belief and even practice, from the Anabaptists of the fifteenth century, and the later Baptists of Roger Williams' time, in America; but all of this difference is in harmony with the great principles to which the Baptists of the fifteenth century, and our early American life, were so loyal. The principles were the primary qualities which characterized Baptist churches, and which do today, rather than any specific statement of faith, or form of baptism, or phase of organization.

Baptist church members, when intelligent and true to their principles, never sign creeds, because there is no single creed for Baptist churches, and there is no statement of faith which must remain unchanged through the ages. It should always be remembered that true Baptists are not creed makers, but life builders. The emphasis is upon the experience of the spirit and life of Christ in the individual. It is most important that we have the creative life of God, which was in Jesus, in our lives, and let that creative life express itself in belief, in form, in methods of service, with the privilege of change in all of these, as this life grows, expands and seeks to fulfill its divine destiny.

Baptist churches, in ideal, embody the spirit of genuine Americanism, and give to the world the great basic principles of civil and religious liberty, to which Roger Williams, our forefather in America, was so loyal in the year 1631, at the very beginning of our history.

Fundamental Principles of Baptist Churches Specified

1. The competency and spontaneity of the human individual in religion and life. This is the first and basic principle in Baptist churches. It is really inclusive of every principle which governs the faith and life of our churches. From it all the others, which I shall mention, spring. The following principles logically develop from this basic one, which emphasizes man's capacity to believe and act and experience individually and collectively, in conscious, personal, direct relationship with the Infinite Spirit, his Heavenly Father, and his fellowman. The baptism of believers, when rightly understood, does not emphasize primarily baptism as a form, but the fact that each one is to act himself, before God and man in the matter, as an infant cannot do. The dedication of children to God was common among the Baptists of the fifteenth century, even while they insisted upon the baptism of adults, and at that time, by sprinkling, rather than immersion.

2. The authority of the Spirit of God in the enlightened soul of man. Religious authority therefore is not in a book or a creed or a church or a state.

3. The vital experience of love to God and love to man, with all that this implies in human relationships, as Jesus taught it and experienced it, the essential thing in religion.

4. Spirit and life more important than letter and form.

5. Liberty of soul and mind in the interpretation of the Bible and the understanding of all truth and the expression of genuine life within.

6. The competency of the Spirit of God to lead the church today in matters of belief, form and method, in the effort to meet the needs of this age, and to establish the kingdom of God on earth.

7. The rights of each individual in the church recognized and respected in all matters, on the basis of a true democracy.

International Sunday School Lesson for July 15

SIMON PETER

Lesson Text: Matt. 16: 13-18, 21-23; John 21: 15-17.

Golden Text: John 21: 17

Introductory

To study the life of a man every sidelight available should be thrown upon his character. So every scripture reference to Simon Peter must be considered for the fullest acquaintance with him. The references for the lesson text are given above. In addition the following should be read: John 1:35-42; Matt. 4:18-22; 14:28-31; 17:1-13; Luke 5:1-10; 22:31-34, 54-62; John 18:10, 11; 20:1-10; 21:1-23; Acts 2:1-5, 42; 8:14-25; 9:32-12:19; 15:7-11; Gal. 2:1-11. Simon Peter was a Galilean fisherman, led to Jesus through his brother Andrew. Jesus gave him the name of Peter, meaning Rock. He was one of the four who formed the first group of the twelve disciples. That he was very dear to Jesus is shown by the fact that he was one of the three chosen to be with Jesus on several momentous occasions. He was a leader in the work of the early church. He wrought miracles in the name of Jesus, he was a missionary to the villages of Samaria, and in many ways was active in the spreading of the faith. His outstanding weakness was that sometimes his courage was not equal to his convictions.

The Lesson

The time of the lesson text is six months before the crucifixion. The place of the first scene is in the neighborhood of Caesarea Philippi between Lake Huleh and Mount Hermon. To his disciples Jesus puts the question, "Who do men say that I am?" John the Baptist, Elijah, Jeremiah, one of the prophets—came the various answers. Then comes the personal question: "Who say ye that I am?" And Simon Peter answered "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God." Then Jesus bestows upon Simon the name of Peter—"Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it." Shortly after this when he has told the disciples of some of the events soon to befall him and Peter becomes somewhat presumptious and denies that this can happen to his Lord, Jesus says to him: "Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art a stumbling block unto me; for thou mindest not the things of God but the things of men." The next scene in the lesson is on the shore of the sea of Galilee after the disciples have partaken of the food provided by Jesus. Three times Jesus puts to Peter the question "Lovest thou me?" and as often receives the affirmative answer with various emphases. And with each statement of Peter's love for him Jesus answers "Feed my lambs"; "Tend my sheep"; "Feed my sheep." He is a various Peter, a changeable Peter, a very human Peter and a lovable Peter.

Leading Thoughts

1. To fall may not always indicate weakness of character; to remain prone does. 2. It is easy to say we love; it is another matter to show our love by our actions—Feed my sheep. 3. "Lovest thou me?"

The Habitual Talker

Among all the other annoyances, is there, after all, anything more exasperating to both teacher and class than the chap who habitually, systematically, talks?

There are several types of talkers. There is the member who buttonholes the secretary while the hymn is being sung or the announcements made, asking why such and such a committee hasn't acted. There is the young lady—young man too, and just as bad—who tells the girl beside or in front of her what Jessie Cordingly and the others wore at the party on Friday night. There is the one who makes sotto-voce comments to those around him on the points the teacher tries to make during the lesson period. These same people, rather peculiarly, will scarcely ever condescend to express their opinions openly so that the class as a whole may have the benefit of them.

With a class of children, or even teenage boys or girls, one can take hold of such a situation directly. But with adults, who are presumed to know what is right, and courteous enough to behave at least fairly under such circumstances, and who would readily resent any personal reference, it is one of the most difficult things to cope with.

Two factors lie at the bottom of it. First, the talker is more interested in himself and other things than he is in the session and the teacher's presentment of the lesson. Or he is thoughtless and characteristically discourteous.

If the teacher knows the members as he or she ought there are two direct courses. Where it can be done without fear of seriously hurting the offender's feelings, speak about the difficulty right in the class when the offense occurs. Frequently it can be done in a jocular way, always, of course, with a smile that will accomplish the purpose. Where this is not effective, a diplomatic reference to the matter individually outside the class altogether, coming to the point at issue casually, should have even greater influence. I used to have just such a chap in a young man's class, and about every six weeks, after a word or two about something else, I would look him in the eye and note: "You didn't give me much of a chance with the lesson last Sunday, Jim. What was in the air? Got a new girl? Didn't what I said suit you? Or what?" He always took it good-naturedly, and improvement followed.

One of the most effective methods—I learned it from a grand old high-school teacher—is to stop dead in the middle of a sentence when any one is running opposition to me. Frequently, if the classroom is quiet, the whispers of the talker will be generally audible; and the cure, for the time being, is accomplished right there. Of course, to use such a method you must have the attention of the greater part of the class. That condition is assumed.

One clever woman teacher I know has a plan—unique to me, at least—of manufacturing a point in her lesson talk when such difficulty crops up, around which she can hang some reference to the importance of little things. When she gets this far she begins to enumerate the things in detail and before long she reaches the difficulty in question.

After all, however, one wonders whether the responsibility for this frequently occurring difficulty does not lie as much with the teacher as with the pupils. You have seen, probably had the experience in your own teaching—times when the class was so interested in the presentation of the lesson that they sat forward in their chairs, seemingly drinking in the words, and no one even thought of talking.

Ideal, of course, and yet there are teachers and classes where this sort of thing prevails generally. It is an ideal for teacher and class members to work to, one that is worth going to a good deal of effort to even try to approach.—EDWARD MOORE IN Men's Class.

8. The privilege of the church to advance in intellectual and spiritual knowledge, under the leadership of God's spirit, as new light comes from any and every quarter of the universe.

9. The triumph of the brotherly spirit in the church and the world as each man gives to the other his divine right of opinion and conviction and all work together for the good of each other and humanity in general.

10. The unity of all life under the aegis of the one heavenly Father, regardless of race, color, or creed, in the common task of human development, as members of one great family of humans, seeking light on life's problems in the titanic struggle toward a better civilization and a glorious destiny.

"The Little Old Woman of Taira"

By Clara A. Converse

LITTLE and old, indeed, but very much alive is she, as she patters through the mud in a downpour of rain, kimono upturned, the wind and rain beating in her kindly old face. What strange errand takes her abroad on such a day? She is speaking with the Buddhist principal of the public school, who is vigorously shaking his head. Undaunted, she appeals to another official, evidently receiving the same response. Next we see her having an animated conversation with the owner of the theater. "Ah! Fine! Now we can invite a larger number. This is better than to go to the public school, for then only that school would be present. He said the roof leaked, and the building could be used only in fair weather, but God will cause the sun to shine on Monday so that we may have our service." These are her happy mutterings as she leaves the theater owner.

A teacher from the Mary Colby School in Yokohama is spending a few days with the native church in Taira, and while she was speaking on the Sunday evening previous to the opening of our story, God was speaking to this little old woman. She loved her Lord and she loved her village, and the words of the earnest Christian teacher stirred her her soul. In the midst of it all she seemed to hear him say: "For years the gospel light has been lighted in this village, but as yet it is only a flickering torch. A few here and there have been reached, but thousands have not even heard the message. Now is your opportunity. God wants the women of Taira to hear it, and this young woman, Yamada San, is his messenger."

Her heart burned within her as she spoke of her vision to the Christians in the little church. To reach the women of Taira, who were generally opposed to Christianity and even the education of women, seemed a huge undertaking. However, they believed in the little old woman, were touched by her message, and prayed for guidance.

In the Yokohama school were eight girls from Taira, and to the home of one of these Yamada San was invited the following evening. Not because the parents were Christians did they give this Christian woman a royal welcome, but because she was the teacher of their daughter. They had invited many of their friends to meet this lady just back from America, and a large number came, among them some teachers. The little old woman was quietly but powerfully present, watching for an opportunity to further the plan which God had laid upon her heart. The teachers expressed their great interest in the visitor, whereupon the little old woman promptly said: "Why don't you ask her to speak at your schools?" The suggestion was followed by an invitation to Yamada San to visit one of the two industrial schools the following day, where she spoke to about sixty girls. She told them some things about America, but spoke chiefly of women's responsibilities, of the life and work of good women. It was a new thought for them, and gave them a new vision. They liked it and talked about it. The heart of the little old woman beat fast; the Christians prayed with new hope; the story of the lady just back from America spread from girl to girl, from house to house, until the other industrial school said: "We must have her, too." At the latter school Yamada San had the opportunity of speaking to ninety girls, and the tide of interest continued to rise.

Some little old women would have been satisfied with having achieved so much, but not so our little old woman of Taira. The Spirit seemed to say that the public school must be reached, and thus her mission as we meet her in the rain on the streets of Taira.

The principal of the school is unresponsive to her appeal that Yamada San be allowed to speak in the high school. "I cannot invite her to our school, but of course the pupils are free to do as they please after school," is his final word.

With the promise of the use of the theater the Christians meet and pray and plan for the meeting on Monday. All three schools are invited, and their interest is assured. The little old woman now bends her energies to secure the attendance of the older women, which is a more difficult task. In the city there are two women's societies,—one a patriotic organization and one a Buddhist society—nearly all the prominent women belonging to one or the other. These must be invited. Letters are sent, houses visited, and in every possible way the invitation is extended.

There is one house of special influence in the community, noted also for its opposition to Christianity. "No Christian except a relative has ever crossed the threshold," is its boast. Again the Spirit seems to say to the little old woman of Taira: "The influence of this house must be gained." After counsel with the little band of native Christians it is decided that Yamada San must go to call on the aunt of one of her pupils living in that home. Knowing not whether she will even gain an entrance, the Christians send her away while they wait in prayer.

Her reception is cold and formal. The son of the house meets her with a stiff bow, which indicates that she is not wanted. The aunt does not appear. It is a chilling atmosphere, but remembering that she has come for a purpose she refuses to note the lack of welcome, and speaks interestingly upon various subjects until the young man forgets that she is a Christian, becomes interested in all she has to say and begs her to stay longer. Thus encouraged she tells him of the meeting, and leaves a word of invitation for the mother. On the morrow a letter of apology is received from the house, because no feast had been given to the Yokohama teacher. This is accompanied by suggestions to help the meeting, and the assurance that they will influence as many as possible of their friends to hear the address on Monday.

Ah, how breathlessly wait the Christians as the day and the hour draw near!

WE want a man of forty for the job.
One who has enjoyed his little fill of romance.
And suffered intermittent indigestion ever since.
One whose memories are sufficiently cold successfully to resist the embraces of truancy.
To whom a mountain
no longer looms an ideal to scramble up and tumble down, but is an actual thing made of stone bristling with multitudinous edges to bark one's shins or break one's neck upon.
To whom a lake or river or other body of water
no longer entices the search for one's likeness (we only ask a man to be himself and not go diving after phantoms), but is a place one might readily drown in,
one's muscles no longer quite what they were.
Who has achieved
that ultimate disillusionment:
not to be able to differentiate the respective features, limbs or what not of his whilom Graces and Gwendolyns, and if he could wouldn't want to,
would devote the rest of his days to a desk piled sky-high with ledgers and cashbooks:
Such a man would be certain to stick,
we want such a man for the job.

—Alfred Kreymborg in

How eagerly waits the little old woman! The invitations have been well sent; notices announcing "An Address by a Lady just returned from America on Woman's Position and Education in America" have been posted all through the town; the theater has been swept and decorated with flowers by the owner; the weather is all that could be desired.

Little Yamada San steps on the platform and looks over the audience of 630 Buddhist women, with only a handful of Christians to support her with their prayers. The room is hot and close; the tremendous responsibility weighs heavily as her eye flashes over that sea of faces. She never felt weaker than at this moment. What if now, after all the preparation, she should fail to bring honor upon his name in this city! Glancing at a little group of Christians near the front she sees the radiant face of the little old woman, eloquent of confidence in her, and faith in God as to the outcome of it all. She feels his power in her weakness, and experiences perfect abandon as she holds the audience for more than an hour, speaking in her rich native tongue.

She has not been advertised to speak upon religion, but as her subject grows upon her she realizes her great opportunity. The thought comes that this may be the last opportunity some will have to hear the gospel message, so she fearlessly opens the gate, and shows them the only path which leads to the highest possibilities for womanhood—the path of salvation. The large audience, despite the heat and closeness, listens breathlessly to the end.

It is finished! What of the results? Prominent Buddhist women crowd around little Yamada San, thanking her heartily, speaking gracious words to the Christians. Upon leaving for Yokohama the following morning seven Buddhist women representing the societies bring gifts, and ask Yamada San to come again and speak to their societies.

Thus has dawned a new era for Taira, because a little old woman "was not disobedient to the heavenly vision."

Taira is on the coast road from Tokyo to Sendai; a city of about ten thousand inhabitants. The little church, with a membership of fifty-seven, was frequently visited by Doctor Dearing, and as a consequence of his visits a number of girls went to the Mary Colby School in Yokohama, eight of whom became Christians before their return to Taira. After the events of the foregoing story their return was accompanied with a feeling of keen responsibility. Letters have been received from them at the school telling of victory. They report that the atmosphere is entirely changed, that the attitude toward Christianity is no longer hostile.

The Dissatisfied Workman

IN Spain, the man who breaks stones from the great rocks is called a pi-ca-pe-dre-ro. His work is very hard, and the pay for it is quite small. He must work such long hours for so little money that he often sighs and wishes that he were rich enough to eat and sleep as much and as often as would please him. One day, when the sun was very hot, and one of these stone-breakers was more than usually tired, he stopped breaking stones for a few minutes and, sighing, he said:

"How I wish I had a soft bed on which to lie. I should draw the silk curtains about it so that the mosquitoes could not annoy me, and there I should sleep and sleep."

The Picapedrero was astonished to see an angel, clothed in white, standing by his side, and was much startled when the angel said, "Your prayer has been heard, and your desire shall be granted."

At once Picapedrero became a very rich man. He had not only a fine bed to lie upon, but all manner of good things to eat, servants to minister to his slightest wish, and plenty of money to spend.

One day, while walking in his garden, he saw a great company of horsemen approaching along the road. There was also a golden coach, drawn by many prancing steeds whose harness and trappings glistened in the sun. Within the coach sat the king of the country, clothed in silken robes and shining with jewels. Upon seeing all this splendor, the rich man, once a poor breaker of stones, sighed and said:

"How much I should like to be the King!"

Again the angel stood by his side and said, "Your prayer has been heard, and you shall be the king."

As the angel said, so it happened. The rich man became king, and rode about in a golden coach. He was surrounded by lords and ladies, and whenever he walked, a servant carried a silk and gold parasol over his head to keep the sun from burning him. But when the king noticed how powerful was the sun, and how it withered the grass, made the trees hang their heads, and compelled him, the great king, to be protected from its rays, he sighed again, and wished that he might be the sun.

Once more the angel stood by his side and said, "Your prayer has been heard, and you shall be the sun."

The king was changed into the great powerful sun, which burned up the grass and the flowers, dried up the streams, and made hot and tired the great ones of the earth.

Then a cloud rose. It was big and black, and it covered the light of the sun so that he was no longer seen. This angered the sun so greatly that he cried out:

"How I wish I were the cloud!"

The angel, standing by his side, said, "Your prayer has been heard, and you shall be the cloud."

At once the sun became the cloud. In order to show his great power, he opened his sides, from which great quantities of water flowed. To such an extent did the cloud carry out his plans to show his greatness, that the streams were swollen and overflowed their banks, flooding the valleys, drowning the people and the cattle, and destroying everything with which they came in contact, except the rock. No matter how much the cloud attacked the rock with wind and water, it moved not.

Then the cloud cried:

"I desire above all things to be the rock!"

Once again the angel stood at his side and spoke the words which transformed the cloud into the rock, and neither the sun, nor the cloud, nor the violence of the winds and rains could move it. But one day, there came a Picapedrero, who began to beat and strike the rock with his hammer, until it broke into pieces.

Then the rock cried out, "This Picapedrero is greater than I, and above all things I desire to be this stone-breaker."

The angel, descending for the last time, stood by his side and said, "Your prayer has been heard, and you shall be the Picapedrero."

And so it was. The poor man, who had changed so many times, came back to his work, and was never again heard to complain.

Young People Mobilizing for Home Missions

The Student Fellowship for Christian Life-Service, organized a year ago for the promotion of enlistment in home missions and in Christian service for the world, has members in fifty institutions of higher education. A southern regional conference was held in Atlanta, Ga., April 6-8, an eastern conference in the University of Pennsylvania, April 14-15, and a group of leaders meeting in conference at New Haven, April 20-22. A New York Student Fellowship Union has been organized which plans a conference to be held in Yonkers, Oct. 12-13. A unique feature of the Atlanta conference was the presence of delegates from the negro educational institutions of the city. During the summer the fellowship will be represented at the conferences and summer campaigns under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, and the religious education movement. The executive committee, which is composed of representatives of nine colleges, will meet at Lake Geneva, Aug. 28-Sept. 2. An advisory council, with representatives from the Home Missions Council, the Council of Women for Home Missions, and the Council of Church Boards of Education, aids the movement.

THE INNER AND THE OUTER

(II Cor. 4:16-18; I Sam. 16:6-13)

"For man looketh on the outward appearance, but Jehovah looketh on the heart."

Saul having been rejected by Jehovah, a new king was to be anointed. The task of anointing was committed to Samuel and the appointed one was one of Jesse's sons. The seven sons of Jesse passed by in review. But there was another who was "keeping the sheep." "Now he was ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look upon. And Jehovah said, "Arise, anoint him; for this is he.'" In this way the Shepherd King was chosen.

Perhaps the greatest difficulty of the young people of today is that of being able to distinguish between the good and the bad, between darkness and light. Twentieth century affairs are so complex that young people often find themselves confused and perplexed as to just what is the right thing to do. The situation becomes all the more difficult because so many good people differ among themselves on even the smallest things.

1. The inner authority. In matters of right and wrong, there are some things over which there need be no question. Through long years of experience, we have found that it is best to be honest, truthful, pure, courteous, gentlemanly, kind, thrifty, religious. The principles of Christ have been working long enough in human society for these ideas to become rooted. It is not difficult, therefore, for one to know that he should fashion his life along these lines. In so doing, he builds up within himself an inner control, an authority, which for his life must be the guiding element. When this authority breaks down young people had better look out. There is danger ahead. The younger generation, as well as the old, should take time to be holy. We must never allow this spiritual reserve to run low.

2. The outward appearance. How easy it is to take appearances for the real things. Doubtless Jesse, a proud father, would have been delighted to have had his more cultured, handsome son, elevated to the kingship. But for such a job, something more was needed than looks. Out yonder in the field was a lad, who had learned the secret of power. While tending the sheep, he had time to think. He must have meditated upon the magnificence of God's universe. He must have communed often with the maker of the universe. In short, he was in preparation for the great responsibilties of leadership. He was "ruddy" but back of this outward appearance, there was a real soul.

After all, the deeper meanings of life are not found on the surface. It is necessary for us to look beyond the material to the spiritual. This is possible because of our relationship to Christ. Through his spirit, he is leading us from day to day into truth. Because our eyes have been opened, we are privileged to go beyond that which is material and temporary. We see the outward constantly falling into decay, but there is inner, spiritual renewal, and whatever may be our lot in this world, there is great hope

"For the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

Indiana to the Front

The next distinctive advance in the Extension Fund is the response of the Indiana societies. Their total contributions amount to about $100. The results in that state depended largely upon the splendid work of Ford Porter, one of the members of the committee of the board of managers, to develop the Extension Fund. We are still receiving amounts from various states, and hope within the next few weeks that we shall receive responses from a number of locals and individuals who have been promising action. Let us have your donation in time for the report at the Boston Convention! Send amounts to Dr. Herbert Hines, 193 N. Harrison Ave., Kankakee, Ill.

Our Own Folks

Boston Letter

By Charles H. Watson

Baptist Young People in Boston

Of course there will be a great army f them. And the most of them will 'do" the Hub, as other tourists do. 'hey will be spirited about in sight-eeing autos, and will get glances at 'aneuil Hall, the old State House, the cene of the much exaggerated "Bos-on Massacre," the Old North Church, he home of Paul Revere, the Old South Meeting House, Kings Chapel, Trinity Church, the Art Museum with Cyrus Dallin's appealing Indian standing in ront of it, the impressive Harvard Med-cal College, and the great hospitals and chools clustering around it. Then there rill be the extension trips to Bunker Hill monument, Harvard University, the ouses and graves of the great Cam-ridge poets, authors and preachers. exington battlefield, Concord Bridge, nd the homes and tombs of Emerson, Hawthorne, Thoreau, and the Alcotts.

Consider Beacon Hill

Everybody will do these, and more, ut only the particularly interested will o Beacon Hill, and the sloping sur-oundings of the old Boston Brahmins. e sure to join that rather choice rem-ant. Dismiss your auto, and spend an our or two on foot. It will be condu-ve to reverence, and a slow steeping in ich wonders and memories as few merican cities have to offer.

Just go pacing quietly about on Bea-on, Park, Mount Vernon, Chestnut, inckney, Walnut, West Cedar streets, nd tread delightedly around Louisburg quare as the old timers used to do. It not a large realm, but is one of con-entrated richness. Taking it leisurely nd gratefully you will find your impres-ons more indelible than the swift ight-seeing" ones.

A Preliminary

You had better start at Park Street hurch. That corner is the North Pole winter, but the glory of the summer. Tom" Appleton, brother-in-law of ongfellow, and waggish wit of his per-d, said that "a shorn lamb should be thered at Park Street and Tremont, temper the blasts of winter." But early July it will welcome you with almy beauty. As a preliminary, just oss over Tremont street, and from the ont of the Macullar Parker store, get e view of the old Granary Burying round. Notice the noble background the cemetery given by the Tremont, eacon, and Pilgrim buildings, the Park reet Church, the Boston Atheneum, nd the rear of the old Park Street man-ons.

What city has in its heart so much of iet, such calm suggestion of the cool-g of flaming spirits! Sam Adams, the domitable revolutionist and patriot, eeps well under his rugged boulder. o does James Otis the fiery orator. The adstones of the old worthies are all out you. Perhaps you will cross over d enter—nearly everybody does.

Up the Hill

Then slowly stroll up the one block called Park Street to the State House. That block might well have been called "Authors' and Publishers' Row." Yet the other chiefs associated with it might object. Rarely has a short block focused so much history and literature. Bliss Perry spoke of it is "a short, sloping, prosperous little highway." Two great objectives are at the top of it—Bulfinch's State House, and St. Gaudens' "Shaw Memorial."

Meanwhile, as you meander upward, mind your numbers! Remember that Josiah Quincy, the great mayor, with his own hands planted the great elms that you see lining the Park Street wall. There are not many numbers in the brief street, but they count. With it were identified some of the foremost names in the old city, and in its later fame. Number 1 speaks of the Warrens and the Wigglesworths, Number 2 of the Lowells and the Masons, also of Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy and Christian Science. Here was Hawthorne Hall, which has been called "the cradle of the Christian Science Church." Number 3 associates the names of Brooks, Cabot, and Ward, with Daniel Webster as frequent guests. Number 4 is a star number. After the solid earlier families of Davis and Miller, came the tenants that made it illustrious: Houghton, Mifflin, and Company, and the Atlantic Monthly, bringing with it the genius of two continents. Says Bliss Perry: "Mr. Howells' tiny sanctum was on the second floor, and many a delighted caller remembers the third floor back, looking out upon the burying ground, where Mr. Aldrich mitigated the severity of his position with an Irish setter and a pipe."

Number 5

This is partly Baptist. It was the home of Josiah Quincy. A celebrated Baptist has a famous bookshop in the old dining room and kitchen: Charles E. Goodspeed of Wollaston. He is past-master in prints and book-craft. He beams with geniality and bristles with antiques in art and letters. Number 6 is connected with the great Warren family of surgeons, and the Mayflower Club, the pioneer women's club of this region. Number 7 and 8 are now only occupied by the Union Club. Here were the homes of the Lowells and Lawrences, leading merchants and philanthropists.

A Historic Mansion

Park Street mounts in importance as you reach the Amory-Ticknor mansion. Here was George Ticknor, and his books, for forty-one years. Here lived Harrison Gray Otis "the Boston Cicero." Here came Daniel Webster, Edward Everett, and Rufus Choate. Here was the home of Lafayette when he revisited America in 1824. This house is still standing. Its imposing outline is apparent in spite of the various changes that encroaching business has compelled. But it was a great social and intellectual center for nearly a hundred years.

The Monuments

Cross over to the monuments in front of the State House. Stand quietly before Robert Shaw's memorial, and let St. Gaudens' masterpiece have its way with you. It is a wonderful work, and has all the tragic patriotism in it of that Iliad of ours—the war against slavery. One by one do the heroic elements of that struggle enter the soul while we stand there.

Then cross over before the left wing of the State House and let the distant Anne Hutchinson of Cyrus Dallin come close to you. She was the prophetess of the Old Colony. She soared so high, looked so deep and so far, that blind men compelled her to join the noble army of martyrs.

The Old Streets

Now thread the old streets of Beacon Hill—there are but a few. But the flavor of Old Boston hangs round them still. You are on Beacon street going towards Charles. Holmes called it "the Sunny Street that holds the sifted few." Mark the quaint, artistic doorways with their immaculate approaches. Notice Number 55—that was the home of Prescott the historian. He and the other great historian, Francis Parkman, lived back to back. Parkman's home was at Number 50 Chestnut street. Go through Walnut street and facing down Chestnut you will pass the site of Motley's home. "How the great historians grouped themselves here! Bancroft was not far off, for he was collector of the port, and one of his assistants was Hawthorne. Strange coincidence that two of them, Prescott and Parkman, both struggled against blindness while they were producing their masterpieces. Theirs was a great victory.

A Group of Brilliants

Number 13 Chestnut street was the home of Julia Ward Howe when Henry James came over to take his final look at this country. He was protesting to her his fadeless appreciation of her and of Boston, when, looking over her spectacles at him as she used to do when he was a boy, she said with slow and gentle emphasis—"Don't lie to me, Henry!"

Pinckney Street was a favorite preserve. The Alcotts lived at Number 20. Bronson Alcott was an able, likeable, unpractical man. One of the wits called him "an Angelic Charletan." Though the first part was true, the last was severe. Yet Louisa, his most famous daughter, had good reasons for including him among those famous Concord philosophers "who were so busy discussing and defining great duties, that they forgot to perform the small ones." At Number 50, Hawthorne lived when he wrote a note to Rev. Jas. Freeman Clarke asking him to marry him, giving him the hour, but forgetting the date. Aldrich lived in Number 84, and in the ugly, overhanging bay windows wrote his "Story of a Bad Boy:" Alice Brown still lives in Number 11.

Louisburg and Mount Vernon

We are getting to the heart of things. Louisburg Square is Bulfinch's reproduction of Russell Square in London. Walk around it. Bask in its quietude and memories. It is the heart of Beacon Hill. At Number 4, Howells lived. At Number 10 Alcott died. At Number 20 Jenny Lind was married to Otto Goldschmidt, her accompanist. All about the square are fine old homes of old Boston type. It is a bit of old London. Those two little statues modestly standing at the ends—who are they? Aristides the Just, and Christopher Columbus!

Mount Vernon Street is the last and best wine. Henry James, he of the supercritical faculty, and conversant with the finest streets in Europe, gave to this street some of his strongest and foggiest enconiums. It was Brahmin Boston to him par-excellence. The shining brass knobs and knockers, the old glass in frames of iron, leaded into brick or stone, all suggested the French and English aristocrats! That large, homely house on the corner of Joy street is the old Robert Treat Paine homestead. Number 57 is the old home of our greatest ambassador—Charles Francis Adams, of the Civil war period. At Number 59 Aldrich lived, after he left the little house on Pinckney street, and was more prosperous. At Number 76 lived Margaret Deland. At Number 83 the tablet set into the gate post speaks of Doctor Channing.

The "City of Holmes"

So Boston has been called. Because more than any other. Holmes embodied it—mind, spirit, alert sensibility, flash of wit and fancy, hilarity in literature and song. He was Boston concentrated. His three homes were commonplace until he lived in them. Wherever he was became attractive and enlivening. When he lived in Bosworth street—that glowing pocket just off Tremont near the Temple, he irradiated for twenty years. There he was the "Autocrat." Then he went to unattractive Charles street. Then to newer Beacon street, its modern elegance eclipsed by the mottled sheen of the Charles River basin, seen from his rear windows. If you look into Kings Chapel where he worshipped, sit down in pew Number 102 in the left gallery. That was where his shining face encouraged the preacher. He was always after the truth.

In General

When you look into the old South Church, remember that little baby Benjamin Franklin was carried there to be christened in the afternoon of the day when he was born; and devoutly thank God that Baptists have helped to dispel that superstition.

When you see the old Corner Bookstore at School and Washington streets, recall one of the ironies of life. Far back in the rear end, was J. T. Fields' sanctum, where he greeted the geniuses of both continents. At different times, the writer has seen Holmes there, and Lowell and Higginson, and Norton, Emerson, Whittier, Hawthorne, Longfellow,—all of the immortals frequented the old corner. What is done there now? They sell talking machines! And at the front where the choice books were, they sell cigarettes! But if you are not a smoker you can easily forget it.

Be sure and do justice to the gilded dome of the State House. Even Henry James approved of it: "High in the air; poised in the right place over everything that clustered below; the most felicitous object in Boston."

Take a peep into the old Atheneum on Beacon Street. It is the resort of the intellectual aristocrats of Boston—choice, quiet, exclusive.

Boston Common

Do not fail to appreciate the Common. Even he who refuses to "keep off the grass," would fight for it, and figuratively speaking, die for it! It is always the crown "when glory awakens." It has ever been the loftiest benison, and the commonest convenience. There patriotism blooms to bursting. There for years, cows pastured, there the boy Emerson watched his widowed mother's indispensable milk provider. There boys have swimmed in the "frog pond," skated on it, coasted down the many inclines—played everything; and strong men were wont to encircle the whole common for their "constitutional." Even solid statesmen like Daniel Webster and Edward Everett were daily "steadies" in that period. Tradition tells of little "Billy Everett" puffing and stretching his gait to keep up with his daddy. Some of us recall that intellectual and temperamental entity, Dr. William Everett. Anyhow, enjoy the Common to the utmost. Nothing so free!

A Hint

Would the visiting Baptist disguise himself, and pass for a descendant of one of the old families, let him carry a Boston bag, a copy of the Transcript, and stride onward conscious of a high moral purpose. Often the picture is taken for the thing!

Chicago-Iowa Letter

By J. W. Weddell

Old Timers

Morgan Park has had a historical meet, and I was not there—my loss. But Doctor Goodspeed was on hand and he could tell all about those halcyon days when the seminary moved in and the old settlers received the professors and students with open arms.

That class of '80 that were the pioneers, will never forget their greeting from the hospitable villagers. You later classes knew next to nothing about it. The open doors everywhere, the Shakespeare recitals at Doctors Morgan's and Northrope's, the pleasant informals at the Female College and the Military Academy, the prayer meetings and sociables with the Union Baptist-Methodist church as the center, Doctor Goodspeed and Frank (now bishop) Bristol alternated in the pulpit. H. A. Nixon and I sang in the choir for both of them, till the budding bishop carried off Miss Frisby, the soprano, for his wife. Then the wonderful initial meetings in class room with Doctors Boise, Smith, Sage, Harper. Ah, those were wonderful days! Life was young, and we were all one in heart and soul, as indeed we may well be today.

Books, Books

I have been dipping into the vast waters of the library at Iowa City. It is natural, for I was librarian both at Denison and Morgan Park, and it made a good part of one's education. Dr. T. J. Morgan, my chief, taught me what I am glad to hand on to others, how to "heft" a book, as he called it,—turn over the title page as you place the volume on the shelf and get a glimpse of the theme and the author. It told us where to find what we wanted—what else is there in practical knowledge?

These shelves are rich in biography, the penchant of some of us. There is no end to it, new and old. Here is a rare old volume of "Dr. Archibald Alexander's Life" by his son Dr. James W. Alexander. Reading there about the founding of Princeton Seminary in 1812, our first thorough-going divinity school—and Baptists helped to give it a welcome—and seeing the pains with which the fathers laid a straight theological foundation, one marvels at the monstrous things that are lightly said today about dropping the doctrine for the sake of getting things done, as if we can get things done without laying the solid foundation, and as if the inculcating of saving doctrine were not the real doing under God of his saving work.

Presbyterians and Baptists, thank God, are much together here.

A Fraternal Epistle

Here is a note from Prof. Wm. Lyon Phelps of Yale, regarding his recent valuable book on the influence of the English Bible, "Human Nature in the Bible." "I am glad," he says "that you agree with me about the authorized version. I heard another version read in church the other day, and it sounded like a very bad joke." He strongly urges the invariable use of the King James stately diction in all pulpit rendition of the word. What a help and comfort it would be in our ordinary responsive service, often broken by varied translations, which, however good, seem sometimes to savor of impertinence in the reading. Doctor Phelps adds, "I am glad you know my brother Arthur S. Phelps who used to preach at Los Angeles, and is now in Berkeley, Cal. (newly elected professor in the seminary.) I have another brother who is also a Baptist minister, Rev. Dryden W. Phelps, who is at present at San Diego. My father was also a Baptist minister."

Yes, we know it and are rightly proud of it. Professor Phelps is the splendid dean of America's men of letters today.

A Church or Two

We are making progress here in Iowa among the churches. Keokuk is getting ready to call a pastor, who, it feels, will fit its large demands. As we passed through Burlington, the church had just given an invitation to Rev. W. J. Diegelman, late of Rochester, whom it had heard the previous Sunday.

Iowa City has at last laid hands on a man acceptable to all—Rev. E. J. Smith, of Fair Haven, Vt., one of our popular men of the khaki. We are simply holding the fort till he comes the last of July. He will have a great work to do in this great educational center. You would have thought so if you had seen the 800 graduates march on to the campus the other day and if you should see the throngs that now crowd the thoroughfares for the summer schools here. This is the place where Doctor Witherspoon Wylie, now prominent in New York Presbyterian pulpit—we used to know him as junior pastor at Davenport—won his spurs. He had good bringing up at Granville, where his people were Baptists; his uncle is a deacon still in Pastor Houf's church there. Our next letter will perhaps be from the Baptist Assembly at Iowa Falls, where the writer has a bit of an engagement in the vesper services of that lively gathering, July 18-29.

I may mention, ere I close, some pulpits calling for new pastors in Iowa. Rev. I. N. Howell has finished his work at Humboldt and gone to Burnside. Rev. G. W. Fogg goes out of the state, leaving Corydon to be filled. Rev. Jas. M. Wilson has responded to the call at Lake City and left a good church at What Cheer, ready for some one to carry on the work so well begun. Rev. D. MacPherson goes to the Northern Seminary to complete his ministerial studies, and Messena is without a pastor. In like manner Pastor Peterson of Cascade leaves in September for seminary studies and the old church there, where Dr. Aitchison, the father of our secretary, once did so great a service, will need a new under shepherd.

So goes the work in Iowa—

"That's where the tall corn grows."

Doctor Sweet Resigns as Pastor to Head College

On Sunday morning, June 17, Dr. Franklin W. Sweet tendered his resignation as pastor of the Church of the Master, Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, the resignation to take effect September 1. Accompanying the resignation came the announcement that Doctor Sweet had accepted the presidency of Brandon College, Brandon, Manitoba. He will succeed Dr. H. P. Whidden, who leaves Brandon to become head of McMasters University.

In offering Doctor Sweet the presidency, the trustees of the college expressed confidence in his ability to serve as the administrative head for the institution in the period of expansion upon which they believe it should immediately enter as the center of the Baptist educational interests of western Canada.

Brandon College is affiliated with the Baptist Convention of western Canada, which is composed of churches in the four provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. It is one of three Baptist institutions of higher education in Canada, the others being McMasters University at Toronto and Acadia University, at Wolfeville, Nova Scotia.

The theological schools of the three institutions train most of the Baptist ministers of Canada, and have also supplied ministers to many churches of the Northern Baptist convention.

Besides its theological school, Brandon has a college of arts and sciences, a conservatory of music and an academic department, with a total enrolment of 300 students. It was founded thirty-five years ago.

September 1 is the occasion of the fourth anniversary of Doctor Sweet's pastorate in Cleveland. At the time he became its pastor the Church of the Master was called East End Baptist Church. It had just dedicated a new building to take the place of one which had been destroyed by fire in 1917. The name was changed to the Church of the Master following the merger of Willson Avenue Church with East End Church. The present membership is over a thousand. The church has a graded Sunday school, one of the best in the country.

Doctor Sweet is a native of Ohio. He was born in Dayton, and is a graduate of Denison University. His theological training was received at Rochester Theological Seminary. The degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon him in 1918 by Des Moines College, and in 1921 by Denison University.

He has had three pastorates, all of which have brought him into close relations with a college or university. His first pastorate was one of eight years at Adrian, Mich., where Adrian College is located. His second was for ten years at Calvary Church in Minneapolis, where he met frequently with the students at the University of Minnesota.

Doctor Sweet has been prominently connected with the educational work of the Northern Baptist Convention. He served as secretary of a special committee of nine appointed in 1920 to "inquire into the loyalty of our Baptist schools to Jesus Christ and his gospel and to the historic faith and practice of the Baptists."

United Baptist Convention of Maine

The annual session of the Maine Convention was held in the Essex Street Church, Bangor, June 12-14. Pastor Roy M. Trafton and his people had made careful preparation and when the Baptist hosts in record numbers appeared, they were met with joyful hospitality. The other Baptist churches of Bangor and Brewer shared in the entertainment.

The session was notable for its addresses, its spirit of unity, its courage, and its united purpose prayerfully to seek and resolutely to secure greater things in the kingdom service than ever before.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Missionary Society proved of great interest. Mrs. A. D. Paul presided. Reports of the successful work were rendered by Mrs. Annie Cobb Smith, Mrs. H. R. Hatch, Mrs. Florence O. Lorimer, Mrs. B. P. Browne, and Mrs. Ralph T. Andem. In the Continuation Campaign, Maine has come next to the top in New England. As an extra service the women of Maine are sending Miss Clarissa Hewey to her work in China with "refit," passage money, and a large part of her salary already paid.

The Ministers' Association met at the same hour, Rev. C. C. Koch, vice pres., presiding. The main address of the afternoon was given by Prof. Richard M. Vaughan of Newton Theological Institution on the "Fundamental Beliefs of Baptists." Officers for next year were elected as follows: Pres., Rev. C. C. Koch; vice-pres., Rev. F. P. Freeman, secy., Rev. A. D. Paul; treas., Rev. A. E. Kingsley.

The United Young People's Society, Rev. Ralph T. Andem, pres., after a banquet in the First Church was addressed by Dr. C. N. Arbuckle of the Newton Center Church.

The first regular session of the convention occurred on Wednesday morning, when, after a devotional service, led by Rev. H. A. Welsh of Brewer, the welcome of Bangor and Brewer Baptists was given by Rev. Roy M. Trafton, with a response by Pres. Edwin M. Hamlin, who gave some suggestive impressions of a layman concerning the work in hand. For the twenty-first time, Executive Secretary Irving B. Mower gave the report of the convention board. Fittingly, he styled it "A Report of Service." Tender reference was made to Rev. C. C. Tilley of Jefferson, and Rev. J. H. Trites of Caribou, who died during the year. The special work of pastor-evangelists has been carried forward faithfully and successfully by Dr. Geo. H. Hamlen, Rev. Benj. Beatty, and Rev. S. A. Evans. Advance work was noted in the completion and dedication of the new chapel at Glenwood Square, where the remarkable increase of the work is largely due to the faithfulness of colporter-missionary Rev. William Fletcher. The non-English work is going forward. Rev. Auguste Bocquel has become pastor of the French Church at Waterville, the leading French mission in New England. Recently ten candidates were baptized. Rev. Filemon Novitsky comes to the new Russian-Polish mission in Waterville-Winslow. A lot has been purchased and a chapel will soon be erected. Extensive improvements have been made in several houses of worship throughout the state.

At the last meeting of the board it was voted to send Secretary Mower as the representative of the convention to the meeting of the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm, with expenses paid. Secretary Mower referred gratefully to this action and expressed his purpose to attend, but waived the payment of his expenses by the convention.

The report of Treasurer Graffam showed an increase in the funds of $19,000 during the year. On account of adjustment payments to the General Board, however, the deficit for the year showed considerable advance.

Director of Promotion, Dr. E. C. Whittemore, rendered his report. During the year missionary and promotional conferences have been held in every association, many missionary speakers have been heard, the matter of stewardship has been urged as never before and a considerable number of students have given themselves to ministerial and missionary service. During this year 285 churches have contributed through the New World Movement. These churches have 20,194 resident members. The non-contributing have only 1,266 members, or 5.8 per cent of the total membership. The total contributions for the year applicable to budget objects are, in round numbers $128,000, or 93.7 per cent of the sum called for on the basis of seven millions. Reference was made to the new program for the year and the convention heartily committed itself to raise its share of the twelve millions proposed for the budget of 1923-24.

Rev. George C. Sauer paid tribute to those who have died during the year. The annual sermon was preached by Rev. H. F. Huse of Dover, on "The Glory of Kings at the Feet of Jesus." The feature of the meeting of the Woman's Missionary Society was an address by Mrs. Nathan R. Wood of Boston. On Wednesday evening Dr. Joseph Taylor of the China Mission gave a thrilling address.

Thursday morning was given to educational interests. Chairman Merriman of the commission of education presided, and Secretary Whitemore read his report. Sixteen students have received the aid of the board. An encouraging number have joined the Student Volunteer Union, and yet larger numbers the life service organization. In the two colleges and six fitting schools of the denomination, 125 teachers are employed and over 1,800 students are enrolled. These schools and colleges have had a remarkably successful year. Their principals spoke briefly but to the satisfaction of the convention. The chief address was given by Prof. Herbert L. Newman, student's pastor at Colby College. In the afternoon Rev. Alexander Henderson, formerly director of religious education, who has resigned his office to become pastor of the Fairfield Church, gave his report. A great work has been done and the report was enthusiastically received. Director Peterson in an effective address, presented the work and the need of Ocean Park.

The evening program consisted of brief addresses by state workers, Rev. Harry Taylor, Rev. Auguste Bocquel, Rev. Filemon Novitsky, Dr. Geo. H. Hamlen, Rev. E. A. Davis, Rev. William Fletcher, Rev. S. A. Evans, and Rev. Benj. Beatty. The closing address was given by Rev. Benjamin T. Livingston, formerly of Bangor but now of Boston.

This was very nearly an ideal convention, in spirit, grasp, and purpose. It will make possible greater things in every department of kingdom service, for it was a kind of reconsecration of the churches in Maine to their living Lord.

MAINE

THE SPRINGVALE CHURCHES have recently had a season of revival under the leadership of Evangelist George R. Stair in a union campaign. As a result, Rev. C. C. Koch, pastor of the Free Church, recently baptized twelve candidates, and Rev. C. W. Corey, of the First Church, also administered the ordinance. Mr. Stair can be reached at Morsam Lake, Emery Mills, Me., until Oct. 1.

AS THE RESULT OF SPECIAL MEETINGS held at the Monson Church, Rev. Joseph Grosa, pastor, by Rev. Raymond W. Cooper of Millinocket, eighteen persons were baptized. Mr. and Mrs. Grosa after attending the Stockholm meeting will tour the continent.

THE ANNUAL MEETING of the Free Woman's Missionary Society will be held in Jordan Memorial Hall, Ocean Park, Aug. 1, at nine o'clock for the purpose of hearing the reports of the officers and committees, for the election of officers and for such other business as may come before the meeting.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

REV. R. H. TIBBALS, pastor at Antrim, is meeting with encouraging results. Congregations have increased and there have been recent baptisms. Mr. Tibbals will soon complete his first year in the pastorate there.

REV. J. W. RAFTER of the Merrimack Street Church, Manchester, preached the annual sermon before the local post of the Grand Army, May 27.

REV. G. C. KINCAID, who recently became pastor of the South Church, Laconia, is finding a most encouraging response in his work. Congregations are large and his preaching is appreciated.

THE PLEASANT STREET CHURCH, Concord, has secured E. A. Rockwell of the graduating class of Newton Theological Institution as pastor. He will begin his pastorate Aug. 1. The state convention meets with this church in October.

THE CHURCH AT DOVER is prospering under the pastorate of Rev. L. C. Holmes formerly of Biddeford, Me. The attendance is good at all services.

REV. HARRY L. SMITH a graduate of Gordon Bible College, has taken up his work as pastor at Troy.

MR. H. E. DANIELSON, a recent graduate of Gordon Bible College has taken up the full work of the pastorate of the Peterboro Church. Mr. Danielson has been supplying the church since last fall. Thirteen have been added to the church since the beginning of the year, seven by baptism and six by letter. There will probably be other additions. The church is also prospering financially, a larger amount being pledged for current expenses and benevolence than heretofore. Mr. Danielson will probably seek ordination soon.

VERMONT

THE VERMONT STATE CONVENTION was held at Montpelier, June 4-6, and while not as largely attended as usual, because of rainy weather, was interesting and helpful. Two new features of the convention were the sessions of the recently organized Woman's Mission Society of Vermont and the World Wide Guild supper-time conference. Miss Linnie M. Holbrook, the speaker at the first session, received a warm welcome to her native state. Miss Helen E. Hobart, field secretary of the World Wide Guild, at the supper-time conference gave much practical help to W. W. G. girls along the line of program building, while in her evening address she pictured the importance of missionary instruction. Rev. Peter C. Wright, Rev. W. B. Lipphard, Rev. W. E. Raffety, Miss Ruth Carter and Rev. Harry S. Myers all brought inspiring and informing messages regarding the work of the various national societies and methods whereby the work in the local churches might be made more effective. Rev. George W. Peck, Jr., of Rutland, gave a splendid address on state missions in which he pointed out the importance of the work carried on by the state convention and called attention to several of the many missionaries who have gone out from small Vermont churches. Rev. J. J. Ross, of Boston, who delivered a stirring address on Wednesday afternoon and also the closing address of the convention, made such a profound impression that an effort is being made to secure him for the ministers' conference and school of methods to be held at Vermont Academy in September.

IT IS THE GENERAL OPINION of those who have attended many commencements at Vermont Academy that the exercises held June 9-12 were particularly enjoyable and that an unusually fine spirit was manifest. In the prize speaking contest held on Saturday evening, the first prize went to Mr. Hitchcock, son of a Baptist minister who was formerly at West Halifax. The second prize went to Mr. Tiffany, a young man who is working his way through school, while the third prize went to Miss Wright, one of the Saxtons River girls. The baccalaureate service held in the church in the village was largely attended. Rev. George W. Peck, Jr., of Rutland, delivered the sermon. Others assisting in the service were Rev. W. E. Lombard, pastor of the local church, and Rev. H. L. Ballou, pastor of the Congregational Church at Chester. In the evening a unique service of worship was conducted by the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. At the graduation exercises on Tuesday the newly elected principal, John B. Cook, was introduced. Mr. Cook is a native of New York state, where he received his early education. In 1903 he graduated from Bucknell University and the following year received his master's degree from the same institution. For five years Mr. Cook was principal of Keystone Academy in Pennsylvania, for nine years supervising principal of all schools in Canajoharie, N. Y., and for the past five years has been associate principal and dean of men at the Slippery Rock State Normal School, Slippery Rock, Pa. Mr. Cook spoke briefly at the graduation exercises and also at the alumni banquet which followed. Rev. W. A. Davidson, presided at all the commencement exercises.

MISS MILLICENT L. SWAFFIELD, who has been with the academy for more than two years, coming even before the school was opened to help plan the work, has tendered her resignation as principal, in order to enter Y. W. C. A. work. The board reluctantly accepted Miss Swaffield's resignation, and adopted resolutions commending her as a clean, consecrated, Christian woman, an indefatigable worker, and one who rendered intelligent, efficient and self-sacrificing work for the students with whom she labored.

AS A RESULT OF THE SPECIAL MEETINGS held at Manchester Center, in which Rev. W. F. Sturtevant assisted the pastor, Rev. J. Alex Donald, twenty-two have come into the church by baptism, and still others are expected to unite later.

THE ST. JOHNSBURY CHURCH has recently extended a unanimous call to Rev. W. M. Richardson of Bridgeport, Conn., and it is expected that Mr. Richardson will begin his work in the near future. The church is now busily engaged in making repairs upon the edifice.

THE CHURCH AT MONTGOMERY CENTER has extended a call to Rev. A. Ritchie Lowe of Nyack, N. Y., who will take up the work on that field immediately following the close of Rev. H. R. Goodchild's pastorate there.

REV. D. M. D'ARCY OF OGUNQUIT, ME. has recently accepted a call to the Powna Baptist Church and the North Powna Congregational Church, and will take up the work on those fields in the near future.

REV. LAWRENCE COMEY of Boston has begun his work as pastor of the Baptist Church at South Windham and the Congregational Church at Windham Center.

DR. AND MRS. F. M. PREBLE who spent the winter in Riverside, Cal., have returned to their summer home in Ludlow. Doctor Preble for nearly eighteen years was pastor of the Court Street Church, Auburn, Me.

NEW YORK

WHEN THE OSWEGO ASSOCIATION met in annual session at Mexico, June 5, a resolution was passed expressing its appreciation of the service of Doctor Aitchison and urging every church within its boundaries to do everything possible to meet its pledge on or before Apr. 30, 1924.

NEW JERSEY

THE CLINTON AVENUE CHURCH of Newark has had a prosperous year. Since ıst fall fifty persons have been received ıto the membership of the church and 22,000 has been raised for all purposes. he school of missions held on two Sunday venings of each month from October to ebruary helped to raise the payment on ıe N. W. M. pledges to 90 per cent. The aster offering amounted to $2,800, and a ıccessful campaign to raise an additional 2,000 for the new Italian Baptist Church uilding in the city, is now closing. The verage attendance in the Sunday school as been greater than that of last year. his church was the only Baptist church in ıe state to report having attained all ten oints in the standard of excellence in issionary goals. The pastor, Rev. Archer . Bass and his wife will sail on the America" and will visit the battle fields f France and Belgium where Mr. Bass rved. After the Stockholm conference, ıey will tour Scotland and England for ıree weeks. Mr. Frederick J. Axman, the rganist, will also attend the Alliance.

International Seminary

The third year of the International aptist Seminary at East Orange, closed lay 31 with various fitting exercises to ıark its commencement season. The ınual sermon was preached Sunday, lay 20, in the North Orange Church of range, by the pastor, Rev. Joseph C. azen. In his practical way he brought ome to the audience that filled the om stirring messages from the general ieme, "A Record True." In the eve- ng of the same day in the Peddie emorial Church of Newark, of which ev. M. Joseph Twomey is pastor, Sec- tary James H. Franklin of the For- gn Missionary Society delivered the ınual missionary sermon. The mes- ge was one that stirred the heart, oadened the mind, and strengthened ıe will of all who heard him. At both these services the faculty and stu- nts attended in a body.

On Tuesday afternoon, May 29, the ınual athletic meet was held on the minary campus under the direction of rofessor Prodan, who has had charge the athletics in the seminary during ıe year. In the evening the woman's ıxiliary, the chairman of which is Mrs. dgar O. Silver, provided the annual ınquet for the faculty, students and iends.

The board of trustees met in the after- on of the 31. The report of the esident showed that during the year ere had been the following enrolment: zecho-Slovak department, six; Hun- rian department, ten; Polish depart- ent, seven; Roumanian department, ur; Russian department, twenty-four; anish-American department, thirteen; alian department of Colgate Theologi- l Seminary affiliated with the Interna- nal, ten; specials, four; total, seventy- ght.

It was decided to make special efforts secure between twenty-five and thirty 00 scholarships to help students meet eir expenses during the eight months the school year. This amount in addi- n to what the student makes during e summer vacation and during the hool year will make adequate provision pecially for unmarried students. The ard believes that a large number of dividuals, Sunday-school classes, or urches will respond to this oppor- nity. Smaller amounts will help to alize this worthy object.

In the evening the closing exercises re held in the Hawthorne Avenue Church of East Orange, the president of the seminary presiding. The invocation was offered by Rev. Rufus M. Traver; Dr. Frank A. Smith, chairman of the board, read the scripture; Secretary Hovey, of the Home Mission Society, in an earnest address challenged the students of the seminary to see "first things first", "to focus their heart and mind on that which is central in Christianity." Rev. Benjamin Otto, superintendent of the Executive Council at Chicago, delivered the annual address. having for his subject "The High Calling." Doctor Otto in a most earnest address made a profound impression upon the audience to which he spoke. Four from the Hungarian department were given certificates in recognition of the fact that they had spent one year in the Hungarian Seminary at Cleveland and three years in the International. Prof. Stephen Orosz, head of the department, in his brief charge to his men emphasized the fact that those four students were in a sense the first fruits of the seminary, that they should do honor to the institution, and that they should put themselves in the hand of the Lord and follow his leadership and direction. At least two of the four who received certificates will continue their studies in connection with their pastorates under the supervision of the seminary in order that in the course of two or three years they may come back and receive the disploma covering the five years of the seminary curriculum.

Dean J. F. Detweiler, head of the Spanish-American department of the International Seminary located at Los Angeles, reports a prosperous year, that the students are carrying on splendid mission work in connection with their studies, and are showing marked ability in meeting the needs of the thousands of Mexicans in that great western country.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

When Rev. C. C. Earle became pastor of the Mount Pleasant Church, the congregations were small and discouraged and the church was deeply in debt. Now the congregations have increased, improvements have been made on the building and all debts have been paid. Mrs. Earle is corresponding secretary of the Women's Home and Foreign Societies of Pennsylvania.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Rev. John E. Briggs recently celebrated his fourteenth anniversary as pastor of the Fifth Church and the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ordination. During his ministry 2,000 persons have joined the church, making the enrolment 1,500 and two mission Sunday schools. Two residences in the rear of the church have been bought for the purpose of enlarging the Sunday-school plant. During the last twelve months 170 persons have united with the church.

Mississippi Valley

ILLINOIS

The Edinburg Church is making splendid progress under the leadership of Rev. George O. Douglas. The building is being repaired and a daily vacation school will be conducted again this year.

Rev. J. G. Little closed his pastorate of three years at Carlinville on June 17. During that time seventy-seven persons were added to the membership. He will attend the University of Chicago during the summer and will be available for supply work.

Minonk is prospering under the care of Rev. L. C. Taylor who succeeded Doctor Hilton a year ago. As the result of recent evangelistic meetings conducted by the pastor, there were twenty additions to the membership. The church has raised the pastor's salary and is making repairs on the property.

The church at Jacksonville has joined in the community daily vacation Bible school for the second time. It is reported that the attendance and interest are splendid. Rev. A. P. Howells is acting as principal of the intermediate department which is held in the Baptist church. The program committee of the Morgan and Scott County Association which met June 18 decided to put a short demonstration of a church vacation school on the program of the annual meeting at Winchester in October.

A council was called by the church at Chillicothe, June 12, to consider the ordination of its pastor, Mrs. J. R. Raycroft. Dr. D. O. Hopkins was moderator and Rev. B. F. Butler, clerk. Six churches were represented. Dr. E. P. Brand preached the ordination sermon.

Rev. A. W. Judd, whose wife is one of the Marsh family of preachers, recently resigned at Palmyra, and accepted a call to the pastorate of the Wood River Church. This gives Mr. Judd and his wife a great opportunity for future work.

Woman's Mission Society

The board met in regular session June 8 in the parlors of the North Shore Church, Chicago, with the president, Mrs. W. P. Topping, presiding.

The program committee for Woman's Day at the state meeting at the Oak Park Church, Oct. 15-18, announced "Our God is Able" as the thought for the year. Mrs. Clayton Eulette will represent the woman's work before the convention and missionaries Miss Louisa Carter, Central America, and Miss Nona Finney, Burma, will be on the program.

Baptist women are urged to attend the summer schools of missions at Geneva Lake, Wis., and Winona Lake, Ind. Two hour normal classes will be given this year. Miss Jessie Burrall, an outstanding leader, will teach at the Lake Geneva school.

The C. W. C. reported a 25 per cent increase in its work with 175 societies in the state. Their goal was $300, but $1,020 was raised.

The board approved of a plan to bring in money during the dull summer months when the treasury is depleted. Men and women are asked to give $5 and to ask five others to do the same. This applies on the church budget and counts on the New World Movement. Full plans will be announced later. "Might boxes" will be used again.

It was reported that two new circles and guilds had been organized.—Mrs. W. C. Rutherford, Secy.

OHIO

The First Church, Oberlin, after an eighteen months' interim, has called to its pastorate Rev. Charles H. Starrett, of Kenmore. Mr. Starrett has accepted and will begin his labors in this important college field before the opening of school in the fall. The church is preparing for a distinctive advance in its work under the leadership of its new pastor. For the past nine months Rev. Chester F. Ralston has acted as stated supply for the church, and will continue in this capacity until the coming of Mr. Starrett.

AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FIRST Church, Geneva, it was found that the past year had been the most favorable for some time. The Bible school showed a 40 per cent increase in attendance, the N. W. M. pledges are paid to date and there were forty-four additions to the membership. It was voted to redecorate the interior of the building. Plans are being made to enlarge the plant in order to meet the enlarging needs. Rev. Theodore G. Erler is pastor.

INDIANA

THE FOUR WEEKS' TERM of the daily vacation Bible school of the First Church of Marion, closed June 15 with a demonstration of its efficiency and a display of the craft work. There was a total enrolment of 180 with an average attendance of eighty-five for the four weeks. The interest in the school was splendid. Rev. David Leon Woodward was assisted by a corps of twenty teachers.

WISCONSIN

AS THE RESULT OF STRESSING EVANGELISM in the Sunday school, the First Church of Green Bay is receiving young people for baptism frequently. Twenty of them have united with the church since Easter and others are coming. Pastor Erickson and Mrs. Erickson were delegates to the convention in Atlantic City.

IOWA

ON JUNE 13, MISS SADIE HUSTON was united in marriage to Rev. J. O. Staples, pastor of the Centerville Church. Rev. D. E. Killoren of Allerton officiated. The bride is well known to the Baptists of the Southern Association having been prominent in public school, church and Sunday-school circles. Mr. Staples for several years was pastor of the Webster City Church and has been at Centerville for six years. At present he is also moderator of the Southern Association.

NORTH DAKOTA

REV. JOHN GERALD YORK closed his work as pastor of the First Church, Grand Forks, June 10. The hand of fellowship was given to nine persons. Mr. York's address will be Lima, N. Y., where he will be available for supply work.

MISSOURI

ON MARCH 18, 1913, steps were taken by the Webster Groves people to organize the Baptist work. There were twenty-three present at the meeting with Rev. C. M. Truex presiding. It was decided to start the work as a mission Sunday school meeting every Sunday afternoon. The following Sunday the school met in the hall of the Suburban School of Music with an attendance of twenty-one. However, interest began to develop and by June 1 the attendance had reached forty. It became apparent that organization was needed and on June 20, 1913, a council of the churches of the St. Louis Association was called to meet with the Webster Groves Baptists to advise in the matter of the formation of a church. Rev. S. E. Ewing presided. The result was an organization with a constituent membership of thirty-nine. Under the ministry of Rev. Joseph Saskwor the church prospered and in August of the same year the church called Rev. H. L. Reader as pastor. A building committee was appointed and on Sept. 7, 1914, ground was broken for the new edifice. On Feb. 7, 1915, the building was dedicated. The work continued to grow until by July, 1917, the membership numbered 250. Then came the war and things were halted. In the fall of 1922, the church decided that a new building was necessary and a building committee was appointed, with the result that on June 17, the new Sunday-school unit and remodeled church building were dedicated with appropriate services.

MINNESOTA

Commencement at Bethel Institute

The commencement exercises of Bethel Institute, St. Paul, were held the week of June 8-12; the Bethel Theological Seminary on the 8, in the Elim Swedish Baptist Church, Minneapolis. Three young men were graduated, two of whom have settled upon fields as follows: George Ferre at Lake City, Oscar Ekstrom at Fahlun and Mudhen Lake, Wis., and Carl G. Swanson has entered upon the work of the Gospel Missionary Union Society of Kansas City, Mo., hoping to do his life's work in South America. Scholarships were awarded to Mr. Ferre, Mr. Swanson, and to Emil Nylund, an under-graduate. Addresses were delivered by two representatives of the graduating class, by Dr. Arvid Gordh, the dean, and by Dr. Frank Peterson, president of the board of trustees. Diplomas and scholarships were awarded by the president of the school.

The commencement exercises of the academy were held June 12 in the academy auditorium, when forty-two graduates, including three from the music department, two from the expression department, and seven from the commercial department, received their diplomas. Prizes were awarded to twenty students, and included senior girl and boy scholarships in Hamline, Macalester, and Carleton colleges. The commencement address was delivered by Dean Arvid Gordh of the seminary, who for seven years was the first principal of the academy in its early days. The exercises were attended by over 500 people. All of the class with the exception of four were members of Christian churches. The majority have supported themselves in whole or in part by their own efforts throughout the school term.

The school closed a helpful and successful year from every point of view with the largest enrolment in its history, 316, and finances encouraging, which was due in large part to the aid received as a result of the New World Movement. Faculty changes are as follows: Prof. W. Danielson, who with Mrs. Danielson leaves for Assam in September to take charge of a school in Jorhat, leaves a vacancy as does also Mrs. Edna Peterson-Kent of Spokane, Wash. Miss Delpha Jacobson, from Minnesota University, is the only new appointee thus far.

The school will be represented at the World Alliance, the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Baptists of Sweden, and the annual convention of the Baptists of Sweden in July, by the president of the school; Rev. Frank Peterson, president of the board of trustees; and the following members of the board: Rev. Eric Carlson, Rev. Ragnar A. Arlander, and Rev. Arvid Edstam.

Ottawa University Commencement

The most successful year in the history of Ottawa University, the seventeenth in the administration of Pres. S. E. Price, was brought to a close on Wednesday, June 6, when fifty-one students received degrees and diplomas, thirty-eight in the college, twelve in the academy and one in the conservatory of music.

The events of the fifty-eighth commencement week began with the reception of the seniors and the faculty, given by President and Mrs. Price at their home on Wednesday, May 30. On Sunday, June 3, came the baccalaureate sermon by President Price, on the subject, "Spiritual Factors and Values." In the evening, Rev. W. E. Monbeck, '06, of Pullman, Wash., delivered the sermon before the Christian associations. On Monday, June 4, occurred the graduation exercises of the academy. Rev. C. F. Mathews of the First Church, Topeka, delivered the address. In the afternoon the contests in declamation and oration were held followed by the homecoming receptions of the Philalethean and the Olympian Literary Societies. Tuesday was given over to the annual meetings of the alumni associations and of the trustees. The trustees invited the members of the faculty to meet with them for the consideration of the affairs of the university. The state convention committee also was present at this session.

The commencement exercises were held on Wednesday at 10:30 a. m. Rev. Thomas J. Hopkins, '03, now pastor of the First Church of Adrian, Mich., delivered the comencement address. At the conclusion of the exercises, President Price, by action of the trustees, conferred upon Mr. Hopkins the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. Prizes to the amount of $160 were distributed among the winners in the several contests. One feature of this part of the exercise was the awarding of forensic emblems to twelve students who had represented the university in intercollegiate contests in debate. Prof. R. H. Ritchie of the department of English presented the emblems.

The annual statement made by President Price showed advance in all lines. The attendance during the past year was the largest in the history of the university. The endowment funds have increased and now total over half a million dollars, while the total assets are over $928,000. This amount includes trust and endowment funds, real estate, buildings and equipment.

The religious life of the university is strongly maintained. A period is set aside each day for religious exercises, in which members of the faculty, of the student body and frequently well-known speakers from outside, bring messages. Christian activity among the students is provided for by the Christian associations, the B. Y. P. U. organizations in the city churches, gospel teams and Sunday-school classes. In addition to these activities the curriculum has been enriched by a number of additional courses in the study of the Bible.

The trustees authorized the organization of a summer school as a part of the work of the university. This has been done under the direction of Prof. R. H. Ritchie. The school began its sessions on June 11 with a gratifying enrolment. The term will be eight weeks in length and the courses and credits will be given full recognition in the curriculum of the university.

Extension in buildings is proceeding slowly. The only new undertaking is the reconstruction of the old Science Hall. The alumni association is pushing a campaign to secure $25,000 to cover the cost of putting the building into condition for use by the conservatory of music. When completed it will be known as "Tauy Jones Hall." With the new Cook Athletic Field, the three tennis courts completed and given to the university by the class of 1923, and the constant attention given to the beautification of the campus, Ottawa University is now exceedingly attractive to the eyes of visitors as well as to its loyal students and alumni.

EASTERN WASHINGTON

THE CHURCH AT CLOVERLAND has had a remarkable revival. A short time ago it was composed of eight members. Rev. J. B. York was pastor. The congregation was discouraged but decided to undertake to win adults and heads of families. Evangelist P. H. Andrews assisted in a seven-day meeting and Rev. John R. George in a three-day meeting. As a result twenty-two adults were added to the membership and it is expected that more will unite soon. The church is now planning a building campaign.

Commencement at Linfield College

Each commencement at Linfield College reveals a steady growth in financial strength, in scholastic ideals and public approval. The enthusiasm prevailing during the closing exercises this year indicated anew a generous interest in the college of the Northwest. No previous year has brought as many visitors to the campus as this. The graduating class consisted of thirty-one members and had the distinction of being larger than any previous class. Two young men are applying for matriculation in a theological seminary, and some, both men and women, are awaiting appointment as missionaries. Thus the influence of Linfield College will be extended to touch many different communities and various classes of society.

The commencement addresses were of a high order. Rev. John L. Bogue, pastor of the church at The Dalles, addressed the graduating class of the preparatory department and inspired the members, as well as the general audience, to serve well the generation in which they are living. Pres. L. T. Pennington of Pacific College, a neighboring institution, was the speaker on Sunday morning before the Christian associations of the college. A large congregation listened with interest to his message based upon the words of Christ that "life consisteth not in the abundance of things a man possesseth," and "I came that they might have life and have it abundantly." The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by Pastor C. Oscar Johnson of the First Church of Tacoma. His hearers will not soon forget the development of his well illustrated topic "The Blueprints of Success," based upon Peter's words, "Add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." In his closing message to the graduates, President Riley urged them not to be afraid to attempt the impossible as they entered upon their life's work. The orations of members of the graduating class impressed upon the audience the maturity of their thinking, the thoroughness of their training, their appreciation of the demands which the present day makes upon them and their desire to enter with courage upon the duties before them.

The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred by the board of trustees upon Rev. Levi T. Pennington and Rev. C. Oscar Johnson. The former has for twelve years been the president of Pacific College, a Friend's institution at Newburg. He also holds many important positions in his denomination and his scholastic attainments, his administrative talent, his personal character and unfaltering faith make him well worthy of the honor given him by Linfield College. Doctor Johnson has for a number of years been the successful pastor of the First Church of Tacoma, Wash. Because of his fidelity to the gospel of Jesus Christ and his ability to lead his people to the accomplishment of things worth while in the kingdom of God, all feel that he is worthy of the recognition.

In making the commencement announcements, President Riley referred to the gratifying financial situation of the college. The report of the treasurer showed that all obligations were fully met, notwithstanding the fact that the budget adopted one year ago indicated a probable deficit of considerable proportions. The educational expenses far exceeded those of the preceding year, while there was a decrease in the administrative and general expenses. The total assets show an increase in the endowment funds during the year of $36,727.58. The item which brought greatest encouragement to the board was the report that the college had been able to fully meet the first condition of the General Education Board which required $400,000 in subscriptions on April 30, 1923. The board rejoiced also over the fact that the college is well on its way toward the second goal fixed by the General Education Board, which requires the $400,000 to be paid in cash by Nov. 1, 1925. There seems to be no question as to reaching this goal which will add $600,000 to the permanent endowment funds. All were greatly interested in the news that a friend of the college had offered the sum of $15,000 to be applied on a girls' dormitory, on the condition that an additional sum of $45,000 be raised by the college by July 4. The alumni association has made plans to raise a second installment of $15,000, and the college has inaugurated a movement to secure the remaining $30,000. The dormitory will meet a great need long felt by the administration as well as by the constituency.

Following a tradition the graduating class made a substantial gift to its alma mater during commencement week consisting of four desks and four chairs for the use of professors in their class rooms.

In retrospect of a successful year thus closed and with the prospects of further development along various lines, Linfield College is confidently laying its plans for a still better record during 1923-1924.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

SELMA: THE CORNER-STONE of the projected $100,000 edifice of the First Church was laid Sunday afternoon, June 3, in the presence of a large gathering representing not only the local community but many of the churches of the San Joaquin Valley. Dr. Geo. M. Lehigh of Porterville delivered the address of the occasion. It is hoped soon to have the basement ready for the use of the rapidly growing Sunday school. Rev. F. Carl Truex is the efficient pastor.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

THE FIRST CHURCH, REDLANDS, held a miniature Atlantic City convention June 14. Dr. V. L. Duke, president of the University of Redlands, who attended the convention, gave the key-note address. The meeting was conducted as was the Atlantic City meeting and the reports of the committees were paragraphs from the convention reports. Mingled with these were scripture readings growing out of the first national Baptist convention in Jerusalem. The church is now completing the raising of the first $50,000 toward the new $150,000 building. It has been found necessary to buy an adjoining two story building in order to house the growing Sunday school. During three and a half years, 544 persons have united with the church. Rev. S. Fraser Langford is pastor.

ON JUNE 24, TEMPLE CHURCH, Los Angeles observed the twentieth anniversary of its organization and at the same time celebrated the birthday of its first pastor, Dr. Robert J. Burdette.

Plan for Christian Citizenship Conference

The program built up by the executives of the National Reform Association for the Winona Lake Conference on world problems to be held July 1-8, has been so developed that fully one hundred speakers of national prominence will have part in the discussions.

Among the features planned will be a great Fourth of July celebration, in which the representatives of many different nationalities will participate. It will include a parade, fireworks, the singing of patriotic songs. speeches by governors and other public officials, concluding with an address by William Jennings Bryan.

There will be other special days, such as Education Day on July 3, and Governor's Day on July 5. Important conferences will be held each morning from 9 to 12 on such subjects as civil authority, morals and civics in the public schools, how to obtain patriotism among Christian nations, democracy and divine authority, world peace, the basis of international justice and law.

The members of the conference will be invited to take part in these discussions, as one of the main purposes of the association is to make this occasion a real conference, and not a convention, in the ordinary sense.

The conference will be free from ecclesiasticism and it will not discuss church creeds. It is planned to discuss the great world problems of the day and the principles of Christianity as they are related to industrial, social, civic and political questions.

Confucianist Scholar Found Christ

Mr. Stevenson, of the China Inland Mission, was once visited by a strong Confucianist scholar who was very proud of his learning and rank. He came to learn about western science but just before Mr. Nying left his house, turning to the New Testament lying on the table, Mr. Stevenson very naturally asked him:

"Have you also in your library the books of the Christian religion?"

"I have," replied the scholar; "but to be quite candid, I do not find them as interesting as your works of science."

This led to a conversation in which it appeared that Mr. Nying was sceptical as to the existence of God or the soul, and considered prayer manifestly absurd. Patiently the missionary explained, argued and illustrated the truth about the Lord Jesus Christ, but all without success. Then, led by the Holy Spirit of God, he said:

"You say there is no God, and that even if there were, he would never condescend to listen to our prayers; but believe me, if you go home tonight and take up that New Testament, and before opening it humbly and earnestly ask the God of Heaven to give you his Holy Spirit that you may understand it aright, that book will be a new book to you and will soon mean more than any other book in the world. Put it to the proof; and whether you pray for yourself or not, I will pray for you."

"Well, here is a strange thing," he thought. "Absurd as it seems, the foreigner was in earnest; and so concerned is he about a man he never saw or heard of till today that he will pray for me—and I do not pray for myself."

That night when alone Mr. Nyling took up the book in question with a feeling almost of amusement. How could any intelligent person imagine that a few words addressed to some unknown being, who might or might not exist, would turn a dull book into an interesting one, or make any change upon one's outlook upon life? Yet, incredulous as he was, he somehow wanted to put it to the test.

"O God, if there be a God," he found himself saying, "save my soul, if I have a soul. Give me thy Holy Spirit, and help me to understand this book."

Once and again as evening wore on, Mrs. Nying looked into the room, to find her husband engrossed in study. At length she ventured to remonstrate, reminding him of the lateness of the hour.

"Do not wait for me," was his reply; "I have important matters in hand." And he went on reading.

To make a long but interesting story short, I will conclude by saying that he was truly born again and experienced a wonderful new joy in his life. His aristocratic wife also found Christ and through his testimony and powerful preaching there were within a short time ten other equally remarkable conversions.—From "Hudson Taylor and The China Inland Mission."

Brooklyn and Vicinity

The young people of Brooklyn and Long Island are putting on a campaign to send 500 to Boston. The executive forces are urging the young people to go to Boston:

BECAUSE these will be meetings of great enthusiasm and spiritual power.

BECAUSE you will enter into fellowship with many other young Baptists from all parts of America.

BECAUSE matters of vital interest to New York Baptists are sure to be discussed and we should have a proper voice in the convention counsels.

BECAUSE we are always ready to learn how to do things better, and we can learn many things about young people's work at Boston.

BECAUSE leaders of rare ability will speak at Boston.

BECAUSE it will broaden the vision of those who go, and react in new life and vigor in our local societies.

BECAUSE it may mean the determination on the part of some to give their lives in deeper consecration for the service of God.

BECAUSE it will provide unusually attractive recreational features, and the trip can be made at a moderate cost.

BECAUSE Boston is rich in historical associations, and of compelling interest to every American. Many interesting side trips may be planned in and around Boston.

BECAUSE nearly one-third of the speakers on the program are from New York, and New York young folks should be there to support them.

By a vote of the Kansas City convention the by-law of the Southern Baptist Convention forbidding applause was repealed. It was impossible to enforce it. The president announced that this did not mean that the presiding officer was not under the necessity of preserving order. The repeal carried by a very heavy vote. John D. Mell, president of the Georgia Baptist Convention, writes in a recent issue of the Georgia Index on "Disorder in the S. B. C." He feels after attending these meetings for thirty-five years that there is a growing disregard for the rules of parliamentary law. He feels that the convention must stop applause. He said that the next thing to happen would be the applause or hissing of prayers.

OUR MUSIC CORNER

KNOWLEDGE OF ORGAN CONSTRUCTION

I would have the minister know something of the construction of a church organ. I was in the office of one of our largest organ factories two years ago when a church committee consisting of the pastor, a trustee and the organist called to purchase an organ for their church. A specification was given the builder and he was asked if he could build the organ. A few questions were asked by the builder and he had made some suggestions which the committee had not thought of—in fact knew nothing about—an estimate of $10,000 was given. The committee told the builder to use his own judgment and they signed the contract. If the minister had been instructed in organ building, his knowledge would have been of value to him. The organist was a good player but of the construction of the instrument he was ignorant.

Shortly afterward I was at the same factory, when a priest and two church dignitaries called to see about an organ for their church in the country. What a pleasure it was to hear the priest talk about the construction of an organ. He knew it from beginning to end. The specification was made out in proper form and after suggestions had been made by the builder, the priest accepted the changes, understanding thoroughly what had been arranged. I am told that music and organ building is part of the education given in a Roman Catholic seminary, and it is commendable.

I remember a number of lectures delivered at Columbia by the late G. W. Warren, organist and choirmaster of St. Thomas' Protestant Episcopal Church for thirty years. He explained the construction of the organ and the different results that could be obtained. The lectures were well attended and met with favor by ministers and organists.

There are times when old music appears in church services, and if the minister could tell his congregation the history of such music and how it came to be written, it would be of great interest. We should recognize the value of music teaching in our theological seminaries. With proper musical knowledge a minister could do great good in the home and the power and influence of the church would be extended. So much is being done today in our cities to improve musical taste that the church must do its part, and the ministers must be in accord.

From the lack of instruction in music when a student, a minister is often embarrassed, and all is left to the organist or choirmaster. I know of an organist of a church who would call on the minister Monday morning to arrange the music for the following week. The reply of the minister would be: "I know nothing about music, much to my regret; I leave it all to you." Martin Luther, believed "a schoolmaster ought to have skill in music, otherwise I would not regard him. Neither should we ordain young men to the office of preaching, unless they have been well exercised in the art, for it maketh fine people."—Augustus S. Newman in Musical America.

ENUNCIATION OF ENGLISH

The enunciation of English text (not to mention the fact of correct pronunciation) is the one big problem facing all American teachers and singers.

That there is a demand for the Americanization of music in this country is undeniable, and that the propaganda for it receives support is unquestioned. . . .

But all this interest and indorsement will fall flat unless the singers learn more about English enunciation than they now know, for, beyond question, the weakest point in both these ventures, and in most others we have had, is the fact that even though English was used the audiences "got" very little of it.

The usual excuses—bad acoustics, over-dressing of stage, overplaying of orchestra, unusual tessitura of the vocal score, awkward translations and bad original texts—have all been threshed out repeatedly, and indeed these are all things that have a vital influence in the matter.

But, admitting all that, it still remains true that not nearly so much of the English text is made understandable as should be the case, and, that being true, it follows that the singers are not yet studying the question as eagerly or as carefully as they should.

English text operas are coming, and song recitals in English will be the rule of the future instead of the exception.

It therefore behooves each individual singer to study the question of English enunciation as has never been done before.

There are today some American singers who pronounce English beautifully and understandingly, but there are far more of them who pronounce and enunciate Italian and French better than they do their own language.

This should be so reversed that every American will give such attention to his own language as to make himself as nearly perfect in it as it is possible for any language to be perfect in song.—Music News.

Every new generation will, in my judgment, produce new hymns. One hundred years ago missionary hymns appeared; then later Sunday-school hymns; still later evangelistic hymns. Now, hymns that deal with social service are appearing. They will increase in number; they will deal with the features of life as life is in factory and in shop, in alley and in avenue, in farm and in mine. We are entering upon a new realm of hymnology. The man or woman who can prepare hymns for this new period will be accomplishing much for the application of the gospel to phases of life that need to be sanctified and that hitherto have not been counted worthy of direct mention.

The Old Hymns

There's lots of music in 'em—the hymns of long ago,
And when some gray-haired brother sings the ones I used to know
I sorter want to take a hand—I think of days gone by—
"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand and cast a wistful eye!"
There's lots of music in 'em—those dear, sweet hymns of old,
With visions bright of lands of light and shining streets of gold:
And I hear 'em ringing—singing where Memory dreaming stands,
"From Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strands."
They seem to sing forever of holier, sweeter days,
When the lilies of the love of God bloomed white in all the ways;
And I want to hear their music from the old-time meetin's rise
Till "I can read my title clear to mansions in the skies."
We never needed singin' books in them old days—we knew
The words, the tunes of every one—the dear old hymn book through!
We didn't have no trumpets then, no organs built for show,
We only sang to praise the Lord "from whom all blessings flow."
An' so I love the good old hymns; and when my time shall come—
Before the light has left me, and my singing lips are dumb—
If I can hear 'em sing them, I'll pass without a sigh
To "Canaan's fair and happy land, where my possessions lie."

The Perpetual Crisis in the Christian Church

our church gives its preachers is the acceptance of the Westminster Confession as containing in its broad features the system of doctrine taught in Scripture. If, in addition, the standard contains some things not so clearly taught in Scripture, we have liberty under the guidance of the spririt. That is Presbyterianism.

"The curious thing about these five dogmas is that one is non-essential, and that three are certainly anti-scriptural. The doctrine of the Virgin birth, in which I believe without question, is not essential. The penitent thief, who never heard of it, went into heaven. Paul, James, Peter, John never mention it. Shall we conclude that they were heretics?

"The doctrine of inerrancy of scripture on all subjects is not taught in the Bible, but inferentially contradicted. One passage corrects the figures of another. Jesus in effect contradicted it in the Sermon on the Mount. 'Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time—but I say unto you—.'

"The dogma that the wonderful works of Christ were wrought by his own omnipotence is not scriptural. 'The Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works' The mighty works were tokens that God granted to prove that Jesus was the Messiah.

"Finally, the dogma that Christ's resurrection body was entirely changed from the body buried in the tomb, is unscriptural. The record of the gospels is against it. The risen Christ passed through closed doors and ascended, which the earthly body could not or did not do. The testimony of Paul is against this idea. 'There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.' 'Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God.' It is a great mystery, no doubt; but I firmly believe that the body with which Christ rose and now lives is a spiritual body.

"The third mistake has been the attempt to impose on the Presbyterian Church a pledge of total abstinence. This has nothing to do with prohibition. That is a matter of national policy to be settled on grounds of prudence and social welfare. Laws thus framed must be obeyed. But to say that the use of wine, per se, is a sin is to tell a lie and to contradict the Bible. If, per se, it is a sin, why does Paul advise the use of a little wine for the stomach's sake? If, per se, it is a sin, how could Christ not only use, but make wine? For the state to say: 'The saloon must go,' is lawful and doubtless wise. But for the Christian church to impose a pledge which would have excluded Christ himself, is to border on blasphemy. Any man who chooses to adopt total abstinence may do so with wisdom, propriety, and happiness. But I would sooner cut off my right hand than sign such a pledge forced on me by a church bearing the name of Christ.

"The present phase of the perpetual crisis between the closed and the open mind is in effect the same dissension that arose in Antioch, the old conflict between the law and the gospel."

Wanted—A New Idea

Have you an idea for a poster that you think would be of publicity value?

The publicity department of the Board of Promotion is seeking the best suggestion for a poster to be used in the churches next fall and winter. Have you a suggestion to offer?

Three posters have appeared in previous years entitled, "The New World Movement," "Plough On," "What Shall I Render Unto the Lord?" All three of them were widely distributed and received favorable comment. The present year is the last year covered by the New World Movement pledges, and the great task which the denomination at the Denver Convention set out to accomplish remains to be finished. The financial goal for the current year is $12,161,521.67.

In order to stimulate loyal cooperation, the payment of all pledges and the completion of the task, a new poster is desired for display in conventions, conferences, associations, church vestibules, Sunday-school class rooms, etc., and all Baptists are invited to submit suggestions.

The following conditions should be carefully followed:

1. The poster should be related to the close of the New World Movement campaign.

2. It must be brief with a minimum of reading matter and should preferably be based on one outstanding idea.

3. A picture or design or sketch adds attractiveness and if submitted should be in such form as to enable an artist to reproduce effectively the author's idea.

4. Suggestions should be submitted in the form of rough sketches, preferably 8½"x11" in size.

5. All suggestions should be forwarded to the committee not later than September 15. Send all suggestions to Mr. William B. Lipphard, 276 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

6. The name of the author and the accepted suggestion will be published in all the denominational papers.

The contest is open to every Baptist and any number of sketches may be submitted.

It will cost more than $8,500,000 to carry on the work of Columbia University for the year beginning July 1, according to the budget figures made public by President Nicholas Murray Butler. The budget is for the several corporations included in the educational system of the university, and the total is $8,628,203.08. The income will be almost sufficient to meet the appropriations.

Omnipresence

A THOUSAND sounds, and each a joyful sound;
The dragon flies are humming as they please,
The humming birds are humming all around,
The clithra all alive with buzzing bees,
Each playful leaf its separate whisper found,
As laughing winds went rustling through the grove;
And I saw thousands of such sights as these,
And heard a thousand sounds of joy and love.

And yet so dull I was, I did not know
That he was here who all this love displayed;
I did not think how he who loved us so
Shared all my joy, was glad that I was glad;
And all because I did not hear the word
In English accents say, "It is the Lord."

The Protestant churches of Lexington, Mass., hold union services from July to September. This has become the custom after several years' try-out. The first was a patriotic service in the First Parish Unitarian Church, Sunday, July 1, with an address by Rev. Edwin M. Slocombe. The other services will be held as follows: July 8, Hancock Congregational Church; July 15, Church of Our Redeemer (Episcopal); July 22, First Parish Unitarian Church; July 29, First Baptist Church, and from Aug. 5 to Sept. 2, inclusive, in the Hancock Congregational Church.

Rev. S. D. Ringrose, pastor of the Roger Williams Church, Providence, R. A weekly prayer meeting is maintained and on Tuesday evenings a club meeting is held for the young people of the community. Last year Mr. and Mrs. Ringrose visited every family in the village, and yet had time for fishing and mountain climbing. Mr. Ringrose has baptized 115 in the membership of the Providence Church in the past three years.

Pennsylvania has passed an anti-lynching law with teeth in it. The law provides that any person attempting to take from an officer a prisoner who has sought the protection of the court shall be punishable by a fine of not less than $10,000 and imprisonment for not more than ten years; that an officer in charge of a prisoner taken by a mob of three persons and lynched shall be subject to a fine of $5,000 or five years' imprisonment, and that the county where a lynching occurs shall be subject to the payment of $10,000 to the dependent famil, or the same sum to the state if there are no dependents. Pennsylvania has had only two lynchings in the last twenty-five years, one in 1899 and one in 1911—but the passage of such a law, in the words of the New York World "has set a sound example to other states where mob murders are not infrequent and where little or nothing is done to prevent them, either because of the inadequacy of the laws or the failure of the authorities fearlessly to enforce them."

The United States Lawn Tennis Association has received reports from seventy-five cities in the United States showing that in 375 parks or recreation centers there are more than 2,000 public tennis courts at the present time.

Funeral services for Rev. George Batcheler, editor of the Christian Register for many years, were held June 23 at his residence in Cambridge, Mass. The burial was at Mount Auburn Cemetery.

The Baptists of Denmark, through Rev. Augustus Broholm, have extended an invitation to Dr. and Mrs. Charles L. White, executive secretary of the Home Mission Society, and Dr. Charles A. Brooks, secretary of city and foreign-speaking missions, to attend the sessions of their annual conference to be held July 15-19 on the island of Bornholm, a bit of Danish territory in the Baltic Sea off Copenhagen.

Pointers for the Vacation Season

BLESSED is the man who is faithful on a committee.

Blessed is the church officer who is not pessimistic.

Blessed is the man whose calendar contains prayer meeting night.

Blessed is the man whose watch keeps church time as well as business time.

Blessed is the man who loves the church with his pocketbook as well as with his heart.

Blessed is the man who can endure an hour and a quarter in a place of worship as well as two hours and a half in a place of amusement.

P. S.—The above apply to women as well as men.

—The Courier.

When members of the Big Run Church, seven miles southeast of Indianapolis, gathered recently to observe the seventy-fifth anniversary of the organization of the church, there were present three women who have been members for sixty-nine years, and one who has completed her sixty-fifth year. They are Mrs. Jemima Maze, Mrs. Mary J. Kitley, Mrs. Margaret Moore and Mrs. Eliza Frye. Rev. E. W. Thomas is pastor.

The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon Dr. Gilbert N. Brink by Pomona College, Claremont, Cal., at the recent commencement. After Doctor Brink left the college, he rendered notable service in the Philippine Islands as district superintendent of education, afterwards becoming assistant director of education under Dr. David P. Barrows. After his return he was elected secretary of education for the Home Missionary Society, and then general secretary of the Publication Society. Doctor Brink has received the same degree from the Pacific School of Religion at Berkeley, and from Georgetown College, Kentucky.

Rev. Roy A. York, formerly pastor of the Baptist church at Iowa City, Ia., site of the state university, is holding a series of revival meetings in North Carolina.

The Boston Baptist Bethel City Mission Society, Rev. Charles L. Page, superintendent, is conducting seventeen daily vacation Bible schools, which began June 25 and will continue five weeks. These schools are open to all children, without regard to race or creed, between the ages of four and fourteen, and the sessions are in the morning from nine to twelve o'clock. Each school is provided with a principal and four assistant teachers.

Rev. Groves W. Drew, for twenty years pastor of Third Church, Philadelphia, ten years secretary of the Philadelphia Ministers' Conference and eight years secretary of the Philadelphia Association, is being sent to the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm by the three organizations and a few laymen, in appreciation of his services. He will also travel in Germany, Belgium, France and England.

Rev. K. I. Imai, a Baptist evangelist from Hawaii, is in this country at the invitation of the Japanese Ministers' Association of California. He is studying methods of church activity. Twenty years ago he studied in the Baptist Seminary at Yokohama, having been for many years a Buddhist priest, and became a Baptist preacher. Mr. Imai will return to his work in Hawaii.

F. Erdmann Smith, head of the department of education of William Jewell College, is filling a six weeks' engagement with Marshall College, Huntington, W. Va. Mr. Smith has been making a study of the organization and administration of Baptist higher educational institutions with regard to the distribution of powers within the organization.

A six weeks' intensive course in religious education is being conducted at the University of Pittsburgh, July 2-Aug. 10.

An interesting fact, hitherto unknown to many, has been brought to light by the Near East justice committee. Americans are contributing millions of dollars for the relief of refugees from the Near East, the major portion of whom are either in Greece or on the neighboring islands. Their number is so large that they have increased the total population of Greece nearly one-fifth. The Greek government is hard pressed for money, and it is impossible for it to care adequately for these refugees. And yet the government of the United States stands legally indebted to Greece for the sum of $33,000,000! Under the Three Power Loan, the United States, Great Britain and France agreed to advance to Greece a sum of approximately $50,000,000 each to cover a share of its expenses in the military and naval operations of 1918. As the powers themselves were hard pressed financially, it was decided that their assistance to Greece should take the form of credits which would enable it to raise money temporarily. No payments have been made since Sept. 24, 1920. The chief reason for this peculiar condition appears to lie in the fact that the United States has no diplomatic relations with Greece and therefore has no method of transacting governmental business with her. The committee makes the interesting observation that had Greece been paid the money owed

Important if Baptist Work is Important

Mr. Charles Reynolds, of Waukegan, Ill., writes: "Enclosed please find order and check for THE BAPTIST to be sent to Waukegan public library—a gift from the church. We just ordered Missions and it was an oversight that both journals were not ordered at the same time. We feel that it is very important to have both magazines in our public library." It is important if the work they represent is important. Often a local community will get an entirely different impression of the scope of our Baptist work by wise publicity. Too often the sole impression comes to outsiders from the strength or weakness of the local church.

Killam's Kollum

No Two Infallible Folk on Earth

A certain paper, not long ago, was praised for its independence and courage. The subscriber said: "We need more papers which have the nerve to speak the truth at any cost." Good! The fool editor patted himself on the back. Then something happened. The same editor had occasion to call into question a policy of a certain board. The subscriber who so recently praised was now indignant. "A church paper has no right to take sides. Its business is to be impartial and neutral. Cancel my subscription." It was done. And a note forwarded to the brother in which this paragraph appears:

"You liked us when we agreed with you, and we are sorry to lose you. But you lose more than we do. For you have reduced by one the number of those who are permitted to question your unfailing wisdom. When you dismiss all the others, as you will in time, you and the pope will be the only two infallible folk on earth."

And even then there is sure to be further reduction, for no two infallible folk can occupy the same earth at the same time.

The Past Good—The Present Better

Ye Dear Editor:

In recent weeks this pastor hath read much about the impossibility of the denominational papers competing with the daily press.

Now tell us, ye scribe, where in the files of the past is it recorded that such denominational papers were printed as Missions, THE BAPTIST, the Watchman-Examiner, et al, and were more widely circulated, and more generally read than right NOW? When in that same past were godly women, mighty men, and enthusiastic young people better equipped and more competent, than right NOW?

After the dust of extremists hath settled and their thunder hath ceased to annoy, tell us just when in the past was the "liberal foam" so thin or the "traditional sediment" so negligible as right NOW?

After all, just when, if ever, have Northern Baptists had more reason to "Thank God and take heart," like unto the apostle of old, than right NOW? When in that same past were Baptists more generous, better informed, more devout, than right NOW?

Is it not great to have the joy of working with Jesus, and being rated as a Baptist, in the spring of the year of our Lord 1923? There is one pastor who delighteth to be identified with the great host of God's people—commonly called Baptists.

Yea, verily,

M. E. Bollen.

Fresh from the Field

it, recent history in the Near East might have been vastly changed.

The First Church, Vancouver, B. C., has extended a unanimous call to Rev. J. J. Ross, pastor of the Ruggles St. Church, Boston. Doctor Ross has the call under consideration. This field presents a splendid opportunity for service.

Washington and Lee University of Lexington, Va., recently conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity upon Rev. John Henry Day, pastor of the Memorial Church, Philadelphia.

Gypsy Smith, Jr., will conduct a series of evangelistic meetings in Wilmington, N. C. during the month of October. He is now holding a meeting in Meridian, Miss.

Baptist membership in New Orleans has increased over 1,500 per cent and the contributions from the churches have increased more than 400 per cent since the establishment there five years ago of the Baptist Bible Institute, according to the annual report of Pres. B. H. DeMent of that institution.

W. T. Ewing, a wealthy negro of Haywood, Cal., left his entire estate estimated at $10,000 to Tuskegee Institute. He was born a slave but went to Alaska just prior to the gold rush, where he staked out claims and a few years later made $40,000 in ninety days. He invested his money in property at Fairbanks, Alaska, and later in Oakland, Cal.

Herman E. Perry, president of the Standard Life Insurance Company, one of the largest successful negro enterprises in the country, gave $10,000 to the Meharry Medical College.

The new $325,000 church and community house of the Abyssinian Baptist Church (negro), New York City, was dedicated June 17. Dr. Robert R. Moton, principal of Tuskegee Institute, spoke in the afternoon and Dr. Charles S. Morris, Boydtown, Va., preached the dedication sermon in the evening. The new buildings are considered the most modern of their kind owned by American negroes. The auditorium seats 2,000, and the lecture hall, 1,000. In fall classes will be opened for domestic science, Christian education, stenography and typewriting, civil government and physical and beauty culture, and an employment bureau will be started. The church was founded in 1808 and is the third oldest negro Baptist church in this country.

The largest single Bible order ever placed by any organization in the United States has been given by the American Bible Society to a firm in New York City. A million and a half volumes of Scripture portions, consisting of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, the Book of Acts, and the Book of Proverbs, in English and Spanish, constitute this order. The books are to be uniform in size, sixty-four pages each, with a separate heavy cover, and will be sold throughout the United States and South America for one cent each. Before the first deliveries are made, advance orders to the number of 800,000 have been received.

The "Farthest North" Junior Christian Endeavor Society on the American Continent is at Barrow, Alaska. The meetings are held at three o'clock, Sunday afternoons, but since the first of December it has been dark at that hour. So it has been necessary for the children to carry lanterns.

The Southern Baptist Convention has recently endorsed the establishment of a theological seminary for negro Baptists at Nashville, Tenn., and authorized an appropriation of $300,000. The site and buildings of St. Cecelia Academy, a Catholic girls' school at Nashville, Tenn., has been purchased for this enterprise.

The Renewal of Youthfulness

"Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things; so that thy youth is renewed like the eagles."

THE one whom God revives and inspires never becomes old. Our moral natures wane if we do not use the means for their renewal. There are many causes for wasting our spiritual force—the materialism of the world; the spirit that makes selfishness the law of life; the mystery of pain in the world; the fever of our overwrought civilization; the friction of daily toil. The Christian religion alone has in it the promise of renewal. God alone renews the youth of his people. It is the decay of faith which disintegrates and destroys in the life of individuals, communities and nations. Renewal of youthfulness, therefore, is to be found in greater nearness to God. We need all the sources of strength he has placed at our command. Cultivate your soul! In prayer, study, church, service, lies not only the secret of your strength, but your going on to the perfection of the future life. Heaven is the home of perpetual youth. Oh, for new baptisms of freshness and vigor! We are too stale when we should be vigorous. "Like eagles"—what does that mean? The bird which is the strongest and most noble of the air, full of energy, fearless, majestic and soaring! To be transformed from a sparrow to an eagle, to leave the arid wilderness of the pelican to live among the stars, is enough to make any man say "Bless the Lord, O my soul."—Arthur T. Fowler.

Dr. John A. Earl, pastor of the First Church, St. Paul, will spend July and August in California. He will supply the pulpit of the Temple Church for Doctor Brougher, and will deliver lectures before the assembly at Long Beach. Doctor Earl has fully recovered from his attack of illness at Atlantic City, and writes that he is "as fine as a fiddle." Mrs. Earl and their son will accompany him.

Among those who are to take part in the Christian Citizenship Conference called by the National Reform Association at Winona Lake, Ind., July 1-8, are, Dr. James A. Francis of Los Angeles, Bishop William F. Anderson, Dr. Henry Chung, Korean Commissioner to the United States, Hon. Clinton N. Howard, Dr. Ernest D. Burton, Dr. Charles F. Wishart, and Dr. Charles K. Edmunds, president of the Canton Christian College, Canton, China. The admission is free to all; there is no gate or enrolment fee.

When Chaplain Frank C. Rideout left Fort Leavenworth, Kan., for two months' temporary duty with the reserve officers' training camps at Fort Snelling, Minn., the officers, teachers and pupils of the Fort Leavenworth Sunday school sent him a telegram expressing their appreciation of his services and their regret at his departure. The Sunday school has a staff of over twenty teachers, many of whom are army officers.

Rev. Daniel Bryant, pastor of the First Church, Corvallis, Ore., has issued a booklet on "Christ among our Sick" or "The Healing Ministry in our Churches." This will be mailed for 53 cents, including postage. At the Oregon Baptist minister's retreat, White Temple, Portland, last February, the subject of this book was one of the themes for discussion.

D. Howard Cadle has withdrawn as part owner of the Cadle Tabernacle in Indianapolis in which the meetings of the Northern Baptist Convention were held. This tabernacle was erected in 1920 in honor of his mother. D. L. Speicher and Walter H. Hansing, who with Mr. Cadle, owned the building, have purchased the latter's interest. The building will still be called the Cadle Tabernacle and will be used for its original purpose.

Writing in the "Atlanta Constitution," Dr. M. Ashby Jones, son of Robert E. Lee's chaplain, in commenting on the proposed monument in Washington to the memory of the "black mammy," said: "If we are grateful for what 'black mammy' did, our gratitude should find expression in a concerted effort to write upon the statute books of our state adequate legislation for the prevention of lynching and the safeguarding of 'black mammy's' children. . . I challenge the nobility of our southern people in some organized and adequate way to see to it that the mob shall no longer dominate southern civilization and humiliate us before the world. By our living gratitude to the 'black mammy' of yesterday and our loyalty to our fathers and mothers whom she crooned to sleep with her lullabies, let us swear that her children and grandchildren of today shall have a fair chance."

A statement recently issued by S. L. Smith, field agent of the Julius Rosenwald Fund, established by Julius Rosenwald of Chicago for improving the negro rural schools in southern states, reported that up to April 30, 1923 there have been built 1,700 Rosenwald schools and 49 teachers' homes at a total cost of $6,257,492. Of this amount negroes had contributed $1,600.677, or 25.6 per cent; white people $325.199, or 5.6 per cent; public funds $3,100.148, or 49.5 per cent; and Mr. Rosenwald $1,204,478, or 19.3 per cent. Of these schools 474 are one-teacher schools; 650 are two-teacher schools. There are also the following groups: three-teacher, 275; four-teacher 165; five-teacher, 56; six-teacher, 55; seven-teacher, 6; eight-teacher, 10; nine-teacher, 2; ten-teacher, 3; and 1 school each with eleven, twelve, fourteen and sixteen teachers.

What Is a Vacation?

THREE small brothers were noticed by a passing stranger. Tom and Dick were shouting and tumbling over themselves with exuberance, but little Harry was wailing in vociferous despair. To the stranger's sympathetic question as to the cause of his grief the small boy sobbed out,

"Tom and Dick have got a vacation and I haven't any."

"But why haven't you one, too?" said the bewildered stranger.

"Because I don't go to school!"

All vacation is no vacation. The weariest person is the person who never works. The most tiring thing in the world is idleness. And so the sad small boy was learning, what some older people never learn, that the very first requisite to a real vacation is that one should have it preceded and followed by terms of school or of some other task. Yet the most of us have a feeling that if we could but be permanently set free from our customary task it would be a little foretaste of heaven. Indeed, heaven itself is pictured by the most of the world as a place of idleness, peopled apparently by a set of glorified hoboes. We can scarcely criticize the poor woman whose life had been a round of ceaseless toil without respite and who is said to have requested that her friends place upon her tombstone the lines,

"Don't weep for me now, don't weep for me never;
I'm going to do nothing for ever and ever!"

but it is probable that even that poor creature after the first hundred years or so would have begged the privilege of scrubbing the golden streets or doing anything to save herself from the purgatory of perpetual idleness.

To appreciate a vacation fully one must have found the zest of his regular task. Some people never attain it, but groan under the anticipation of each day's duty, envying almost any one else his job, enjoying no part of his own job but quitting time. Clock-watchers get no great good from a vacation. The dread of the daily task that is waiting for him is a Banquo's ghost at his feast.

"What makes yer look so down-hearted, Bill?"

"Oh, it's this yere work. Nothin' but work, work from mornin' till night!"

"How long yer been at it, Bill?"

"I begins tomorrer."

Few men ever forget a meal through engrossment in work. Their recollective faculties may be somewhat impaired in the matter of debts and engagements, but they have hair-trigger memories when it comes to meal-time. Yet the big things of life have for the most part been done by men who sometimes forget, and often regret, the interrupting necessity of meal-time; and even those whose interest in their task has never yet caused them to be late for a meal may lose all consciousness of time when some exciting game is on, or when the trout or the bass are biting.

It all resolves itself into the question as to what is the engrossing interest in life to us, and that makes it a moral issue. It is so not merely because no one can make a success of his task unless he is genuinely interested in it, but also because of the great spiritual law that we become assimilated to the thing that interests us most. "Where the treasure is, there will the heart be also." One may have more than one interest in life. Besides his vocation he may have an avocation to which he devotes spare hours and the fond devotion of an amateur. By the way, that word does not primarily mean one who performs in a mediocre way but one who does a thing not professionally, for pay, but voluntarily—for the love of it.

And one may put himself whole-heartedly into his daily task with interest and enjoyment and yet feel that he has a higher interest and a deeper enjoyment in the affairs of the kingdom of God, which Jesus told us to put first. He may be like Hiram Golf the shoemaker, who was a first-class workman at his trade, but who declared that his real business was serving God while he "cobbled shoes to pay expenses."

It is so easy, too, to slump in one's vacation time, to sag down into mere idleness until the muscles grow flabby and the digestive processes go on strike, and one feels more wretched than when hard at work. Mind and judgment need to be used for vacation rather more even than for worktime, since the very processes of work tend to keep mind and body, nerve and appetite functioning properly and to keep us fit. Without holding ourselves to too rigid a schedule we should budget ourselves on our vacation days; make a business of replenishing our depleted resources of sleep, pure air, sunlight and exercise. We should renew our intimacy with those noble but neglected friends of ours, the trees, and we should cultivate the clouds and the stars, for which the factory smoke and electric glare of our city life have proved a poor substitute.

BUT we need not wait for vacation time and rural surroundings for that opening of the heart to God's beautiful world which is the essence of vacation and recuperation, and of a restful trust in God himself. "Consider the lilies. . . . Behold the birds of the air." The universal use of the automobile is bringing these privileges close to almost every home; and the parks and streams or lakes of our cities are the possession of the poorest.

And it is not difficult to make the summer one of the most profitable seasons for religious work. Large congregations, open-air services, delightful prayer-meetings, good supply-preachers, social outings of church and Sunday school, vacation school and assemblies, and sometimes evangelistic services make the summer a time of rare opportunity and use in the church. Take another look at the summer-time. It has unsuspected possibilities.

A Vacation

A CHRISTIAN should take a vacation each year whenever it is possible to do so, but Christianity must not take any vacation; it must be on its most particular task ceaselessly.

Some time last summer we heard of a minister on a vacation who during the holiday did all sorts of questionable things that he would not dream of doing when at home and at his normal tasks. When one of the visitors at the summer resort chided him for his delinquencies he passed it off with the laughing remark, "Oh, well, a fellow must have a vacation once in a while."

He was taking a vacation from Christianity. That is a dangerous practice, and we are glad to say he was an exception to the general type of ministers.

Every minister should be assigned by his church a period of some weeks when he would be expected to absent himself from his regular routine work. If possible he should seek new surroundings and mingle with strange people and do some new things that are healthy and wholesome so as to get a complete change of environment. He can do all this, yet in all of it he can be true to his profession as a Christian man and minister of Jesus Christ.

We know several city ministers who spend their vacation periods in the hay or harvest fields back on the old boyhood farm. In the fall when they come back to their arduous tasks in the crowded cities, they bring strong bodies and healthy minds. One of them said last year, "To my church I brought back in my heart a spirit of revival, for I always conduct a service on Sunday afternoons under the trees on the lawn and my only brother was wonderfully converted at the last we held."

That sort of a vacation would not suit others, but whatever is done during the period of relaxation should result in the refreshment and strengthening of the mind, body and soul of the individual. This applies alike to the laity. When any one does things that raise a sense of guilt in the conscience, the vacation has been a failure and not a success, for it has added to the burdens of life.

The rank and file of the church membership should take a vacation if it can possibly be arranged. A real vacation does not consist of idleness, but in a change of occupation. The only time any one should be idle is when he is asleep and then if he sleeps properly he is far from the idle use of time. The best way to get rested is to get tired doing something different from the usual tasks. Yes, by all means take a vacation from your daily work, but not from your Christianity.

We who call ourselves Christians must not be desecrators of the Lord's Day, or be un-Christian in our play, or think that we can take a vacation and leave our Lord out of it.

Readers, if your minister cannot afford to take a vacation, make it possible for him to take one during the summer. The extra money you put into this will come back to you in many ways during the remainder of the church year because in new scenes and among other people your pastor will surely learn more about God and his fellowmen and he will bring back this added knowledge and use it to enrich all the members of the house of God.

Play

PLAY is part of the Christian's program. It is also a phase of life to which a good steward of God's manifold mercies must allot a portion of time each day; first, in order to secure and then to maintain a well-balanced life. We all remember the old adage, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," and there is truth and good philosophy in it, which many a Christian man and woman needs to remember. We usually work hard when we play and it is in the change of occupation that we find the relaxation and then the rest that is needed. When we really give ourselves to play we usually forget our worries and that is a very helpful thing to do, for it is worry that kills and worry is not Christian.

Most of us go out into the open to play and there we fill our lungs with fresh air and in consequence a new stream of better blood courses through our veins. What is play to one person would be work or even anguish for another. We have a friend who in all his spare time plays in his garden patch and with spade, shovel, rake, lawn-mower and a garden hose he finds one of life's greatest sources of joy. To us such a use of our play time would be weary work, but one day the friend caught us rushing around a tennis court and he at once said, "That is not play but hard work." It is a good thing we do not all think or play in the same manner.

We must not use too much time for play and we ought never to forsake the worship of God in order to play. Americans have a great and wonderful country in which to find the sort of play spot they desire and need. We ought to use its many advantages properly in order to be the sort of people who can do in business realms, in the home circle, in our student experiences, and also in our church work the things that will produce a nation that is righteous. We can do this by teaching every one about Christ's happy, helpful living and thus, as he blessed the children at play in the street, he will bless us as we both play and work.

"Shall the Main Question Now Be Put?"

In a plea for cooperation in keeping before his readers the main question, Editor Phelps of the Michigan Christian Advocate says:

"Everybody knows that this is our bishop's favorite text, but it is also the platform of the area and the Advocate.

" 'The main question' is to find the will of God and to help others to find it, and along with this to get the inspiration and help to do it. Moreover, we are seeking the will of God for the nations as well as for individuals.

"The Advocate's only boast is of an honest effort to keep on the main track and not go puffing and snorting down every tempting sidetrack.

"Some weeks ago the Advocate had an article on the premillennialists in Methodism. Reactions came in every mail, from New York to Oregon. One Portland brother insists that the editor should resign forthwith and another man insists on canonizing the editor. We decline both invitations, refusing to be switched from the main issue of exalting Christ. There are lots of interesting folks on this siding, but the main track for us!

"Last week brought an insight into the evolution controversy that has been precipitated by Mr. Bryan. This aimed at helping our perplexed readers. . . .

"Our bishop insists that Mr. Bryan is not living up to his declaration that he "is more interested in the Rock of Ages than he is in the ages of rocks," because he is actually giving his life to combat the testimony of the rocks.

"Help us to live up to our vow about the main question. . . .

"The most subtle temptation of all is to be content merely with talking about the main question and to make that a substitute for all that is before us.

"The bishop moves that the main question be now put and the Advocate heartily seconds it."

Was Eighteenth Amendment "Put Over"?

1. The constitution of the United States provides specifically the way in which amendments may be made:

(a) Proposed by the national senate by two-thirds vote.

(b) Proposed by the national house of representatives by two-thirds vote.

(c) Ratified by both the senate and the house of three-fourths of the states.

The eighteenth — the prohibition amendment — was adopted in exactly the way preceding amendments were adopted.

2. The United States senate, Aug. 1, 1917, proposed the prohibition amendment, 65-20.

3. The United States house of representatives, on Dec. 17, 1917, proposed the prohibition amendment, 262-128.

4. The congress which proposed this was elected, with the amendment as the dominant issue, November, 1916, five months before the United States entered the war.

5. From Jan. 8, 1918, to Jan. 16, 1919, thirty-six states (the necessary three-fourths—prohibition effective one year thereafter) ratified the amendment with a combined vote of 4,086 to 829.

6. Since ratification by the necessary thirty-six states, ten more states have ratified, with a combined vote of 1,016 to 416.

7. The only states that have not ratified are Rhode Island and Connecticut.

8. The movement that resulted in the eighteenth amendment began in 1851, when the first state adopted prohibition—seventy-two years ago.

9. When the United States entered the war, twenty-six states had voted "dry," and over 85 per cent of our area, inhabited by more than 60,000,000 people, was "dry" territory.

10. No other amendment of the federal constitution was ever discussed so widely and continuously through so long a stretch of years, and no other amendment was ever adopted so overwhelmingly.—Federal Council Bulletin.

Dr. Doremus Scudder and the World War

"WHEN the war opened I was a pacifist and opposed all preparations by our government for fighting. In Hawaii in 1915 this was also a local issue in our legislature, and at public legislative hearings I took a decided stand against preparedness.

"But the war propaganda finally got me and I came to feel it the duty of our nation to enter the conflict in order to end war and help democratize the world. I was unwilling to take this stand and remain at home safe while our soldiers were being killed. So I tried to secure a chaplaincy, but was refused because of age. I did, however, succeed in getting a Red Cross appointment in Siberia as director of the department of civilian relief. I felt that after many years spent in Hawaii the chances at my age of surviving the rigors of that climate were not good, an expectation not at all justified by what soon proved to be the wonderful healthfulness of the Siberian winter.

"But what I saw in Siberia, what issued at Versailles in treaty and league making, and the rest of the after-war history with all the illumination as to how warfare through propaganda deceived and even yet, nearly five years after the armistice, continues to deceive, what untold burdens and suffering lasting far beyond its continuance war causes, its inability to serve as a democratizing factor, and its power to rob a free people like ourselves of not a few guarantees of liberties, have convinced me that I was wrong, that a part of the blood-guilt of the world is mine and that I owe every possible effort I can muster to help atone for the greatest crime in human history.

"I am one of the millions in all lands who have sworn 'Never Again' and who are dedicated to absolutely unrelenting opposition to the war-spirit with all its abhorrent family of crushing taxation, preparedness, so-called defensive measures, provocative tariffs and restrictions upon the free intercourse of peoples through prejudice of race and nationality."

The Vagabond

Text: "Now all the Athenians and the strangers sojourning there spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing." (Acts 17:21)

By H. G. Weston Smith

THE text is in parenthesis, indicating that it is a comment wholly aside from the narrative itself, and yet throwing light on the narrative from an angle which the author considers important. A fellow minister had occasion to make mention of this passage and called the attention of the rest of us to the order in which the two words "tell" and "hear" are placed. "Now all the Athenians and the strangers sojourning there spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing." It was a matter of vanity with them—mere mental gymnastics. They were interested in anything that might have some chance of marking them as devotees of "the different." They sampled everything, but had no regular diet. They considered everything—and, above all, talked about everything—but did not relate themselves to any working institution, and indeed had no interest in even tentative conclusions. They were open-minded—which was a good quality; but they made no contribution to the life of their age in the way of actual deeds. Each day they went to the usual loafing place and greeted "the gang" with the usual "Well, have you heard anything new today?" And then they would talk it all over. Sometimes they would think it all over; but always they would talk it all over.

A Group of Samplers

It was in an atmosphere of mere curiosity that this idle group of samplers of everything under the sun listened to Paul's fine and tactful sermon; yet there must have been some real good in the mental attitude which he found, because the record says that some followed after him while others were at least passingly interested.

Has it ever occurred to us that these Athenians may be quite closely compared to what we know as beggars? This should not necessarily mean that we must forthwith condemn them. A beggar is not always wholly bad. Still, had these Athenians pictured themselves as beggars even of the better variety, loafing around, and hailing every religious or philosophical passerby for "a handout" of his religious or philosophical pabulum, we may well suspect that they might have become ashamed of themselves and determined to take upon themselves a more dignified responsibility.

A clear distinction should be made between the pilgrim and the mere vagabond. The pilgrim may ask for something to help him on the way even as his less worthy vagabond friend does; but the pilgrim has this quality to his credit: he is headed for a definite place. The vagabond, however, has upon his face no vision of the land toward which he journeys, because there is no land, and furthermore he does not care particularly that there is no land. He simply rambles on, living from day to day upon the charity of the people he passes. He has nothing to promise in return unless it may chance to be a bit of poetry or a story—a poor piece of literary exaggeration from his knockabout life. The pilgrim, on the other hand (if that term has not been wholly spoiled by reference to it in moving-picture and elsewhere) has the redeeming feature that he promises something. At a definite time in the future he will show that he was worthy; because he is going to a definite place with a definite ideal, and as soon as he can get there he will begin to realize the ideal. Judging from our experience, however, the pilgrim is not much in evidence in the throng of those who touch our lives and try to "touch" our pocketbooks. We do well to be fairly suspicious.

The most business-like pursuit of the vagabond is to have no pursuit. And indeed he pursues nothing so consistently that he often develops a certain business-like genius in going about it. He has his regular routes of travel and follows the marked trails. In the summer he moves northward and does not fear going far away from the railroads and the city centers; in the winter he moves southward, like other birds; or, failing to reach far enough southward for the warmth that a houseless man needs, he goes to the cities where he may avail himself of the almshouses and jails. It is a sort of business with him, and he goes about it with a grim purposeless purpose.

FLOWER in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies,
I hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower—but IF I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.
—Alfred Tennyson.

"Boston Mary"

Josiah Flint in his "Tramping With Tramps," tells of a character outside of Boston, known to trampdom as "Boston Mary." There she lives, or did live a few years ago, in a little old shack of a house set back a short distance from the road, and keeps a hotel for all of trampdom. She was a tramp herself before she settled down to this established occupation. The knights of the road who pass that way may always come to her house, at any time of day or night, and for ten cents or for nothing find a roof under which to sleep and a fire at which to make coffee. She is a very withered and weather-worn character; but she is of good honor and is always treated with honor by those who come, be they male or female. She is always unafraid of any one, has no dealings whatever with the established community life about her except in the cases of the most urgent necessity. To many of the vagabonds she gives the night of lodging in exchange for a part of the collection of "handouts" they may bring.

Of those who pass her way some are criminals and even have the ghosts of murders haunting their lives; but they nonetheless show a fine chivalry toward Boston Mary. Some are possessed of strong personality and intensely interesting because of the experiences they have had. Some are simply lazy, worthless fellows who are sometimes honest—if it is not too difficult—and nearly always harmless. Others are of the poetic type.

And there is a most appealing picture presented by these poets of the road. They have actually worked out a philosophy of life and sometimes cast it in poetry which they will sing to the one whom they wish to charm into giving them a bit of food and the shelter of a barn or a house. Here, for example, is one such little poem:

"I asked her 'Is Aladdin's Lamp
Hidden anywhere?'
'Look into your heart,' she said,
'Aladdin's Lamp is there.'

"She took my heart with glowing hands,
It burned to dust and air
And smoke and rolling thistledown,
Blowing everywhere.

" 'Follow the thistledown,' she said,
'Till doomsday, if you dare,
Over the hills and far away.
Aladdin's Lamp is there.' "
—"Follow the Thistledown."
(Vachel Lindsay)

And they have a certain fairly well fixed rule of life, according to the word of one of them.

"These are the rules of the road:
(1) Keep away from the cities.
(2) Keep away from the railroads.
(3) Have nothing to do with money and carry no baggage.
(4) Ask for dinner about quarter after eleven.
(5) Ask for supper, lodging and breakfast about quarter after five.
(6) Travel alone.
(7) Be neat, deliberate, chaste and civil.
(8) Preach the gospel of beauty."

In other words, this type of vagabond is a clear descendant of the old traveling minstrel who sang and recited and brought news before the days of cheap (and poor) sheet music and scandal-spreading newspapers. He gives something in return for what he receives; but oh, how much more he might give, and how much more he might get, so far as that goes, if he were but a part of some real and great establishment of organized society!

How Does He Become?

And what makes the vagabond? How does he become? Doubtless there are almost as many ways in which vagabonds are made as there are dusty knights of the road; and each might truly have his own charming story to tell. Usually, from some angle, the matter of habit or training has been a determining element. Temperament may have its influence, but temperament has been directed in some way by some environmental influence and the result has been something God did not intend.

The great city is a maker of tramps. Edward S. Martin, in his little book, "A Wayfarer in New York," speaks of the metropolis as "a frontier city situated about halfway between London and San San Francisco." Being such a frontier city and having such a continually changing population there is a strong tendency to cut loose from every relationship except those few that are imperative, and even to cut down upon those which are regarded as "imperative." Yet, says he,

". . . there is hardly any better place to work in, provided one has learned to work to good purpose, and can learn to maintain continuous good health under the nervous strain of New York life."

The "provided" is just the difficulty, however, for many do not learn to "work to good purpose." The scattering of attention in every direction, the stimulation to the indulgence of so many appetites that are not good, and the simple fatigue that comes under the nervous strain with many, in not only New York but every city in the world, often is more than a naturally weak character can endure and the result is a moral and social surrender. A bit of charity unwisely administered even in a crisis often teaches one how to be a pauper. Sometimes the discouragements simply crowd about one's head until he loses heart and runs away from everything; and, forgetting all that has held him to a settled and productive life, he becomes an aimless wanderer.

But it was not with a view to studying the tramp, as we know him, as a direct social problem, that we began. This is important and should have our attention; but what we were thinking of was really the analogy furnished us in the tramp.

Vagabondage Far-Reaching

Vagabondage, as a matter of fact, reaches into many relations of life: We began with Paul, as he was speaking to the idle Athenians who "spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing."

These Athenians were intellectual vagabonds. Some doubtless were very harmful. Others were intellectually gentle and mildly kind, but all in all, gray or colorless — social zeros. Still others would perhaps be classed high as intellectual minstrels, who told or sang a pretty intellectual yarn in return for the "some new thing" that was given them. But their chief characteristic was trampishness.

And we have enough intellectual vagabonds today: samplers of all sorts of "isms." They are overproud "liberals" who glory too much in the fact that they are broad and tolerant, and so far as they are concerned have a religion of "their own." They are, on the other hand, sensational reactionaries who regard themselves as a sufficient denomination, and so waste their lives in riotous discussions of doctrine, while the world waits in great need for the real light of Christ. They may be those who are in the class room and who, because they are searching for the truth and find it rather evasive, are not willing to take any tentative position and proceed. They have no theology because they are not willing to have anything to build it on. As George W. Northrup suggested, they build their theology on what they don't know and their basis is too broad. What the intellectual vagabond needs is relation to something. He must construct something that will be valuable until something else comes

I will lift up mine eyes unto the mountains: from whence shall my help come?
My help cometh from Jehovah, who made heaven and earth.
He will not suffer thy foot to be moved; he that keepeth thee will not slumber.
Behold, he that keepeth Israel will neither slumber nor sleep.
Jehovah is thy keeper: Jehovah is thy shade upon thy right hand.
The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night.
Jehovah will keep thee from all evil; he will keep thy soul.
Jehovah will keep thy going out and thy coming in
From this time forth and forevermore.
—Psalm 121.

along that will be more valuable. This he does not always do.

And then there is the economic vagabond. You go by his store, and he catches you. He sells you something that is not what he has said it is. He says: "Well, what do I care? I'll get this fellow this time even if he never does come back." He does not depend upon building an institution which will become a part of society upon which society can depend. He merely takes what he can get by trick and by talk from the people who are so innocent as to give him his "handout." He is a tramp. He should be socially and legally dealt with. He is a parasite.

And then there is the moral vagabond. He looks with pity upon himself because he has not the strength of self-control. He must depend upon his family to carry him along morally. He must be indulged at home in order that he may not go to the dogs publicly. His wife must pamper him; or her husband must pamper her. Otherwise no one knows what will happen. He is a pitiable victim of circumstances, and cannot stand alone. His church must endure his weaknesses and encourage him, for the poor man belongs to the dependent class. Now, we are not condemning the moral vagabond. He should be encouraged and helped. The poor tramp should not be put down further than he is. But if he has the possibility in him he ought, by all means, to learn to take some moral responsibility, and not expect his moral character to be continually nourished by the charity of others.

One perhaps should not conclude without mentioning also the religious vagabond. In reality this includes all the rest, but we are thinking of "religious" in more nearly the commonly accepted sense. He is the one who goes about from this church to that searching for something to eat, but never relating himself to an institution that will instead of feeding him and giving him a night's lodging, give him a chance to establish himself in a teaching and ministering position himself. The cities and the smaller communities as well are alive with religious vagrants wandering aimlessly about holding out upturned palms and pleading with quavering voice: "Have you something today for a poor homeless man out of work and hungering for a song and a prayer and a sermon?"

What this "hungering" man needs is not merely a prayer and a song and a sermon. He has too long been contented with a mere sandwich handed him in the auditorium of the church. What he needs most is to put his shoulder right under the work; relate himself to some constructive religious enterprise in the form of a church and stay by that institution and help work out the program.

And so with this matter of vagabondage in general—every person who is not definitely related to an institution that is striving to work out the problems of society in a constructive way must remember that he is either a pilgrim or a tramp. If he is a pilgrim and has a clear picture of the land toward which he journeys, there may be some excuse for his dependence upon his friends for support. If he cannot show to himself this clear picture, then he must face the fact that he is a mere vagabond; and unless he is contented with this sort of relationship to society he must begin to produce something by actually giving of himself. It is a question of choice between merely receiving or honestly giving. And who, after all, receives so much as he who freely gives?

Give and Take

By Howard A. Vernon.

IT'S a curious thing to see
How life deals with you and me.
Never thought of it before
Till I stood in my back door
Yesterday, and saw the trees
Leafless in November's breeze.
In the forest, field and brake,
Nature plays at give and take.

Gives the foliage of the spring,
Gives the summer bird to sing,
Gives the flower of field, and then
Comes and takes them back again.
Strips the tree, and leaves it lean,
Robs the meadow of its green,
Song-birds, one and all, forsake,
Nature plays at give and take.

Life is pretty much that way,
Gives with one hand, day by day;
Showers me with her bounties fine,
Youth, and health, and friends, are mine;
Gives the cup of pleasure, too,
Gives me work that I can do.
But the years bring loss and ache—
Life, too, plays at give and take.

Heavy are the drafts of time
As we toward the sunset climb,
Friends grow fewer with the years,
Strength of body disappears,
Light of eye begins to wane,
All my struggle is in vain;
Day by day, asleep, awake,
Life plays on at give and take.

Yet the game is good to play,
Tho it's sometimes hard to pay—
Good to have the bird's sweet song,
Tho it doesn't linger long;
Good that I should have the flowers
For a few brief golden hours.
I am richer for all time
To have had these gifts sublime.

All that life has given me
I shall hold in memory
Things of priceless joy and worth
Are beyond the reach of earth.
They may seem to vanish far,
But they're mine still—where they are.
Memory's hold can never break,
Life may give, but cannot take.

The Baptist World Congress at Stockholm

Notes on the European Continental Delegations

BY J. H. RUSHBROOKE

FROM the mainland of Europe, excluding Scandinavia, nearly 250 delegates will probably attend at Stockholm. They will come from twenty-four countries, or, if Russia should be represented, from twenty-five.

The European delegations furnish a living picture of the various races amidst which Baptist work is carried on in Europe. The variety already appears in the representation of particular countries. For example, Czecho-Slovakia will include in its delegation Czechs, Slovaks, Germans and Magyars. Jugo-Slavia again will include three racial groups, and Roumania four. The Polish delegation represents German-speaking, Polish-speaking and White Russian churches. The fact that in each of these countries a single Baptist union includes all the Baptists in the land, furnishes already a remarkable demonstration of the undying influence of the denomination.

When Europe as a whole is considered the variety is yet more impressive: Latin, Teuton, Scandinavian, Mongolian, Slav, with every subdivision of these great families, are included among the Baptists, and all will be found at Stockholm.

The Swedish delegation will, in the nature of the case, be by far the largest. Three of the members are very well known to British and American Baptists—Doctor Bystrom, editor, politician, social reformer, scholar and linguist; Principal Benander, successor of the venerated Doctor Broady as rector of the Bethel Seminary, in which capacity he is rendering most conspicuous services; and the Rev. K. A. Moden, whose charming personality and business capacity have made him an ideal secretary for the congress.

There is one note of interrogation—will Russia be represented? We hope so; it would be an enormous loss to the congress if our largest group east of the Atlantic should send no delegation. The matter depends on the decision of the Russian government. Some time ago, I approached that government with a request that passports should be granted, and also submitted copies of the program. The list of those whom the Russian brethren desire to send is also in the hands of the authorities, and I earnestly hope the political complications which have arisen since the applications were submitted will not prevent the attendance of our brethren at Stockholm.

Unless the Russians come in full numbers, the German delegation will be the largest, from outside Scandinavia. We shall miss faces familiar at past congresses—J. G. Lehmann, Carl Mascher, Gustav Gieselbusch— but the Rev. B. Werts and Editor A. Hoefs will be there to represent the veterans; while the Rev. F. W. Simoleit has acquired for himself a unique place in the affection and respect of American and British Baptists. We note also among the rising hopes of our German brethren Editor C. Flugge of Cassel, and Principal Neuschafer of Hamburg. A dozen others might well be named.

Roumania stands next in respect of the strength of its delegation. The Rev. C. Adorian, who through these difficult years has most courageously faced his government on behalf of his persecuted brethren, will lead the main body; the Rev. G. Darabonc is the capable leader of the Hungarian minority in the land. Even if no delegates should appear from Soviet Russia, Russians from Bessarabia will be included among the Roumanian visitors, and Germans like Mr. Schuller. Roumania is one of the numerous lands in which the original Baptist impulse was received from the country of Oncken.

Hungary will be strongly represented. Here too the composition of the group will remind us that, although the post-war Hungary is far more homegenous than that of past years, there are still minorities in the land. Slovak and German members, as well as Magyar, will represent the Hungarian Union. The best known of those who will attend are Principal Udvarnoki and Mr. A. Csopjak; while the Rev. M. Baranyay, secretary of the union, and formerly a student in Regents Park College, is rapidly acquiring leading influences as a preacher and organizer.

From the newer lands along the Russian border will come fascinating groups of men—and women. Poland will send its German-speaking veterans, and accompanying them will be representatives of the Slavs with whom the future of the land rests, such as Mr. Dziekucz-Malej, who has suffered seriously at the hands of drunken mobs during the past year, and Mr. Bortkiewicz.

Latvia, owing to its comparative proximity to Stockholm, will send a large deputation. The Lettish Baptists are rivalling the English and American by chartering a ship, though a very much smaller one. A distinctive note of the Latvian delegates is their youth. Indeed, all may be said to be young, for Principal Frey, who leads the group, is as young-hearted as his companions.

The neighboring country of Esthonia will send as fine a group of zealots for evangelism as Europe anywhere possesses. The Rev. A. Podin is already well known to us, but I venture to think that names like those of Mr. Lipstock and Miss Tabea Corius will in coming years be no less familiar.

Special personal interest attaches to certain other groups. From Italy comes a company of literary men, including Signori L. Paschetto and P. Chiminelli, who are among the brightest ornaments of Baptist scholarship. Baptist success in Italy is not to be judged by mere numbers; the influence of such men as these is pervasive. The familiar voice of Doctor Whittinghill will also be heard in Stockholm.

Spain and Portugal are other Roman Catholic lands in which there is now a very definite awakening, and from these —as well as from the older Latin mission field of France—will come small but strong delegations.

The representatives of Austria and Finland stand for countries in which our progress has been slow; those of Holland, Bulgaria and Czecho-Slovakia for lands in which just now Baptists are displaying remarkable energy. There is no more capable group of young leaders than the half dozen who will attend at Stockholm to represent Czecho-Slovakia and will be led by Doctor Prochazka, rector of the Prague Seminary.

There are two aspects of our European enterprise on which a special note may be added—the women's work and the young people's. Nearly all the larger delegations include some capable women workers. Frau B. Gieselbusch (nee Scheve) will represent the well-developed German deaconess' enterprise, while Mrs. Kolator of Prague and Miss Wenske of Poland, both excellent speakers in English, will have singularly interesting reports to present of orphanage and hospital work. The women of Esthonia, Latvia, Roumania and Hungary are also well represented, and the special gathering in Stockholm at which Mrs. Stadling of Sweden, presides should furnish a remarkable opportunity for pooling experience and gathering inspiration.

As to young people's representation, never has a Baptist congress been so promising. From all countries in which a special organization of the young exists delegates have been chosen to represent it, and where there is none, delegates have been commissioned to gather hints as to the lines on which organization should be undertaken. The Rev. E. E. Haywood is to be congratulated upon the fine list of names that has reached him in response to his approach to the young Baptists of the continental lands.

Trail's End

I used to think old age a desert land,
A place of broken dreams and faint desires,
Of vanished friendships and of lonely days—
The banked gray ashes of life's early fires.
But now, as lightly down my footsteps go
Into that valley which they say is drear,
I find the banks are blue with violets,
And all the Spring-time birds are singing here!

I used to think my heart would be so sad
'Twould spill its tears to see another smile,
But I am still a child of Laughter Town,
Gay as the friend who walks with me my mile!
I learn Soul is as ageless as the dawn,
That all love's messengers around me sing
So walk serenely in a pleasant path,
Fall is the gentle replica of Spring.

As to Observing Sunday

By Robert E. Speer

It is a very common thing to hear people, both in and out of the church, ministers as well as others, speaking disapprovingly and contemptuously of the old-fashioned observance of the Lord's Day. They say it was dreary and enslaving, galling to children and irksome to all, joyless and gloomy and repressive. Very probably it was thus with those whose religious life was formal and lifeless, and who refrained from that from which others refrained, but who had nothing positive or vital with which to fill the day. I do not believe that anyone, who grew up in a true Christian home in which the old ideas prevailed, can have any sympathy with this modern abuse of the old-fashioned observance of Sunday. To be sure, the games and employments of the week were laid aside. The family gathered over the Bible and the catechism. There was a quiet calm through the house. Innumerable little things marked the day as distinct. And probably it ended with a rare walk with the father at the sunsetting, and some sobering talk over what is abiding and of eternal worth. But all this is repugnant to the idea of today, and one hears a great deal about a free and Christian use of Sunday, as opposed to the old Puritanic notion.

Puritan Principles

Now the poorest way to win condemnation of the old fashion of Sunday observance with many is to call it Puritanic. They prefer a thousand fold the Puritanic temper to the loose, lawless, flabby habit of mind and life which this day approves. Doubtless the Puritanic cast of mind was often hard and stern, but it had principle in it. It did things because they were right, not because they were easy, or it refused to do things not because they were hard, but because they were wrong. Those who call it somber and joyless speak ignorantly. The best memories of many men today go back to fathers who were as iron in their devotion to right as right, and who led the family to church on Sunday mornings, and stood at the head of the home as some patriarch of old, high priest of his household.

Our day is for laxity and easy-going self-indulgence. Going to church regularly is trying. Quietness is tiresome. Meditation is altogether too difficult an intellectual exercise. Weighty and uplifting conversation is work. Men admit that the old way of spending the day begat strength and self-discipline and solidity of character, and they are thankful for having had homes where these prevailed, and they look forward apprehensively to the future of their children whose Sundays are destitute of all such influences; but nevertheless they have lost the religious life and the grip on great realities which alone would enable them to do for their children what their fathers did for them.

Necessity of the Holy Day

But far more is to be said than merely that the old fashion bred a more worthy and solid habit of life. One thing that is not to be overlooked is that God commanded the observance of one day in seven as peculiarly a sacred day. No talk of the sacredness of all days or of the supersession of the Old Testament law by the gospel should lead us to regard the law of a Lord's Day as abrogated. The sacredness of all our wealth does not abolish God's special claim upon some specific part of it, and the gospel has not superseded the moral law. A holy day is as much needed now as ever, a day that shall bear witness to our religious faith and provide for the irrepressible needs of our religious nature, that cry daily, but that need their own day as well as a part of every day. Of course the idea of a holy day may be abused. As the late Professor Everett, of Harvard, said, "There are in all such observances a right use and a wrong use. The day or the place may be sacred in either of two senses; it may be set apart for religious and moral opportunities, or it may be considered sacred in itself; I may go to church feeling that I have now to my credit one good deed more, or I may go because I recognize another opportunity for higher thought and nearer relation with God. The test of the observance is whether the day or the thing set apart casts a shadow on other days and other things, or brightens them; whether it tends to make the rest of life profane or to make all life more sacred. We must remember, however, that it is better to have one day holy than to have no day at all holy. If one day is holy, the divine power has at least so much foothold in the world, a beginning from which to spread."

God wants the worship of the Lord's Day, and he wants us to have the indispensable blessing and comfort of it. We ought to stop one day out of seven from our regular work and do some special service. We need the day for reading, for rest, for fellowship, for human comfort, for those duties for which a special day must be set aside or they will never be done; for the study of our Bibles, for steadying meditation, for prayer, for forgiveness for our misdeeds and shortcomings and for preparation of heart for better living. Six days of work, however we may strive to keep ourselves above our work, drags us down right effectually into it, and when Saturday evening comes the young man is in want of a spiritual retoning. The Lord's Day breaks over the world with its quietness, and rightly used, it is as the pool by the Sheep's Gate after the angel's troubling. We go down into the waters and come out whole.

Deadening Influences

But all this depends, of course, upon our use of the day. There are some things that are deadly in their power to spoil it. One is the Sunday newspaper. I pass by all that may be denounced as immoral and defiling in it. There is harm enough in its simple secularity, in its want of moral uplift. The facts are more powerful than any denunciation. Look at the men who feed their minds and souls on Sunday with this food. They miss the calm and holy peace, the inflowing divinity of the day. A second thing that will spoil the day is sport. It is not the day for it. The movies, baseball, golf, bicycling, driving—any sport simply kills the religious use of the day. A quiet walk with a friend, or a book, with the heart on Christ, and the thoughts upon what is noble and enduring is as helpful today as when Cleopas and his friend walked with the unknown Saviour to Emmaus, with glowing souls.

Church Attendance

As to church attendance, doubtless many excuses can be found if men go to hear other men talk, or to be entertained, or amused. It casts suspicion on a man's sincerity, however, if he stays away from church on the ground that it is not religiously helpful to him, and spends his morning with the newspaper or on the golf links or in bed after a night out. And the end of church attendance is not to hear a sermon. It is worship, and the opportunity for reverent thought and prayer with fellow-worshippers. Those men forget this, who sneer at the quality of the sermons preached, or perhaps it has been so long since they have heard a sermon that they really forget what it is like. The wisest man can learn something from the poorest preacher, and can pray in the dullest church; and the experience of strong men and strong races has testified in all ages to the power of worship in the church to help character and to feed reverence. Furthermore, there is a great deal of foolish talk about poor preaching. It is better than the news-

Rules for Killing a Church

1. Do not come.—Ps. 42:4.
2. If you do come, come late.—Ps. 84:10.
3. If too wet, or too dry, too hot or too cold, do not think of coming.—Ps. 122:1.
4. Do not imagine that the front seats are intended for you—people might think you were conceited.
5. Come bound to find fault.—Ps. 100:4.
6. Do not, for the world, ever think of praying for your pastor or the church.—II Thess. 3:1.
7. Do not encourage the pastor, but tell his faults to others.—Gal. 6:1. If his sermons help you, do not let him know it; it might make him vain.
8. If you see a stranger in the audience do not offer to shake hands or ask him to come again. People might think you were bold. —Heb. 13:2.
9. Let the pastor do all the work. —Isa. 41:6-7.
10. If he does not visit as often as you think he should treat him coldly. He has nothing particularly to do and he could come oftener.—2 Tim. 2:15; Acts 6:4.
11. Never speak to another about Christ. Your pastor should do all that kind of work.—Jas. 5:20; Daniel 12:3.

papers, more thoughtful, more earnest. A country preacher's sermons are superior to the country editor's writing or to the country lawyer's speeches as a rule, and the city preacher's sermon can be as favorably contrasted with the editorials in the city newspapers. Even in poor sermons there is good. "I don't see how you can stand it, to sit and listen to such preaching, professor," was said once to a great teacher who was also a great preacher in his own denomination, Ransom Dunn, who was laid aside on account of ill health and obliged to listen to inferior men. "They all say some good things," he replied, "and the text is all right and I can think of other things on the subject." The truth is always the truth and no man can wholly obscure it. We can have no excuse if we do not get good from every attempt, however poor, to set the truth forth. It is our fault as much as the preacher's if we fail. But apart from all this, surely God is to be publicly honored and acknowledged of men, and no brilliancy or stupidity of preachers can justify us in neglecting openly to thank God for his preservation and goodness and all the blessings of this life.

Practical Application

The practical questions regarding the observance of the Lord's Day settle themselves easily for us when we have begun to look at the day in this spirit. We will read good books, poetry and prose, the biographies of true men and the thoughts of prophets. We will not allow ourselves to study on Sunday if we are students, and we will keep the day as free as possible from all secular duty. "There is no doubt in my mind," writes a student in a western university, "as to whether I ought to study on Sunday, or not; I do not believe in it. When I get through studying Saturday night, I know that I'll not see the inside of those books until Monday morning. Although I like my work, it is a relief to know that that principle is a law to me. Even if for no religious principle, I think that a fellow ought to have that let up in his work." We will do no unnecessary work and will spare others. We will not ride on railroad trains if we can avoid it. We certainly will not do it on long journeys, and where railroads are only a form of local transportation, like street cars, we will reduce our use of them to a minimum. There was something both pathetic and admirable in the sight of venerable John G. Paton refusing to use even street cars on Sunday in his visit to America, and keeping his appointments by long walks, sometimes having even to run between engagements. It is far better to have even such rigid principles than to be lax and dissolute.

This view of the Lord's Day is as far as possible removed from a hard legal observance of it. That observance is better than none; but this is better than that. This conceives Sunday as a physical and spiritual necessity, a "day of rest and gladness," when the life rebathes itself in the atmosphere of God. To say that all our days should be spent thus sounds well, but it is for the most part simply an excuse for spending none of them so. Just as set times in each day are necessary for Bible study and prayer, so a set day in each week is necessary for the emancipation of the soul from care, for a renewing of the springs of life within, for cleansing and quieting of thoughts and new empowering.

We are not called upon to judge others in this. Each man stands or falls to his own Master. And others have no business judging us. Our contention is simply that the Sabbath was established for man, that he needs it, and that its best use is a religious use; that the man who secularizes the day is secularizing his life, and losing one of its finest supports and noblest blessings. Sunday golf, newspapers, and all that sort of thing, are bad and weakening in their influence, and they are pathetic evidence of the trend and taste of the man who thus abandons his birthright, and forgets what it is to be a son of the God who worked and rested, but did both as God, and who expects his sons to be like him.

A "Sermon"

By President Harding

EN ROUTE to Alaska President and Mrs. Harding were greeted by a large crowd at Colorado Springs. It was Sunday morning and the president said he wished he could preach "a sermon."

"I tell you, my countrymen, the world needs more of the Christ; the world needs the spirit of the Man of Nazareth. If we could bring into the relationships of humanity, among ourselves and among the nations of the earth the brotherhood that was taught by the Christ, we would have a restored world: we would have little or none of war, and we would have a new hope for humanity throughout the globe.

"There never was a greater lesson taught than that of the golden rule. If we could have that one faithfully observed, I would be willing to wipe out the remainder of the commandments.

"I should like to say further that if we are going to make of this America of ours all that the fathers sought, if we are going to make it true to the institutions for which they builded, we must continue to maintain religious liberty as well as civil and human liberty. As you remember, we builded on the foundation of civil liberty, and we capped that with the stone of human liberty, and the third fundamental was religious liberty. The United States never can afford to deny religious freedom.

"One more thought: I should like to have America a little more earnest and thoroughly committed in its religious devotion. We were more religious a hundred years ago, or even fifty years ago, than we are today. We have been getting too far away from the spiritual and too much absorbed in our material existence. It tends to make us a sordid people. The world war lifted us out of the rut.

"We found ourselves consecrated to the defense of the republic and fighting for our ideal of civilization, and we in America were put on a higher plane. But when the war was ended we started to drift back, thinking only of our selfish pursuits. I tell you, my countrymen, that we can never be the ideal republic unless we have great ideals to pursue and know something of the spiritual as well as of the material life.

"That is one of the reasons why I have been so zealous in the last few weeks in trying to have our country committed to something more of international helpfulness, so that it may be ready to play its part in the uplift of the world and in the movement to prevent in the future conflicts among the nations.

Ideals and Digging for Dollars

"When we have this ideal to pursue we are going to be a better people than we are when we occupy ourselves merely in digging, digging, digging for the dollar. There is something else in life than that, my countrymen, to think about. I do not underpraise the desirability of material good fortune. I should like to have material good fortune be the portion of every man and woman in America, but I do not choose material good fortune alone.

"One of the troubles with the world today is that it is torn with suspicion and hate. Europe is in a condition of feverish restlessness and is feeling the effects of the poison engendered by old time passions, envies and rivalries, so that one people will not trust another. Would it not be better if somehow we could bring into the lives of those nations the spirit of him whom the Father gave for the salvation of men and exerted ourselves to spread brotherhood and new trust and new confidence among peoples, so that they may live in that fraternity which tends to solidify and cement together mankind?

"I should like more of fraternity among ourselves in the United States. I should like more of fraternity among the nations of the world, and if we apply the golden rule, about which none of you will dispute, for we all believe in it and admire it—and the only trouble is we do not practice it as we believe it—if we could bring the golden rule into every phase of American life we would be the happiest people in the world.

"There would be no injustice to complain of, there would be no more hate and no rivalry, there would be no industrial conflicts, but human beings would live among their fellows as they would like to be lived with. That would bring a state of blessedness to mankind."

Out in the Fields with God

THE little cares that fretted me
I lost them yesterday,
Among the fields above the sea,
Among the winds at play.
Among the lowing of the herds,
The rustling of the trees,
Among the singing of the birds,
The humming of the bees.

The foolish fears of what might happen
I cast them all away
Among the clover-scented grass,
Among the new-mown hay,
Among the husking of the corn,
Where drowsy poppies nod
Where ill thoughts die and good are born—
Out in the fields with God.

Will India Become Christian?

The mind of mystic India is moving today toward Christ and his vicarious suffering.

BY SHERWOOD EDDY

FOR the last two months we have been having meetings in India from Calcutta to Bombay, and from Cawnpore in the North to Travancore in the South. I am writing at the Syrian Christian Convention where 30,000 are gathered for a week in the largest Christian conference in the world. But here as elsewhere in India the religious and political stand out as the two great issues. First and last India is always fundamentally religious. Mr. Gandhi himself is a religious saint who has strayed into politics. That is the source of his power over the people. We are witnessing at present a mass movement of the mind of educated India toward Christ. This is largely due to Mr. Gandhi's leadership. In the last generation there was a mass movement among the outcastes to better their condition by accepting Christianity. This is a movement of the educated, not for their own interests, but the accepting of the Christian principle of vicarious suffering exemplified by Mr. Gandhi for the emancipation of India. The recent census shows that during the last decade, while the population increased only 1,2 per cent, the Christian community gained 22.65 per cent. The increase of the Indian Protestant community has been much greater. Nearly a million Christians have been added during the last decade, but the present movement is characterized not so much by baptized converts among the outcastes as by a new spiritual attitude on the part of the non-Christian communities.

Gandhi's Inspiration

Mr. Gandhi states frankly that he got his idea of turning the other cheek in passive resistance from Matthew 5:39, and that he derives his chief inspiration from Jesus. Probably no living man has so vividly and dramatically exemplified the spirit of vicarious suffering before the whole world as Mr. Gandhi. Mr. F. B. Myer of London, after a long conversation with him is reported to have said, "Mr. Gandhi, I look on you as a Christian and as such I give you my hand." The Bishop of Madras wrote, "I see in Mr. Gandhi the patient sufferer for the cause of righteousness and mercy, a truer representative of the crucified Saviour than the men who have thrown him into prison and yet call themselves by the name of Christ."

We are witnessing today the remarkable spectacle of a vast nation, or subcontinent of 320,000,000, whose leaders have in principle repudiated physical force and accepted vicarious suffering as their national program.

When the Christian evangelist, Mr. Stanley Jones, asked Mr. Gandhi what could be done to naturalize Christianity in India instead of making it the foreign exotic religion of the conquering race identified with the evils of western civilization, Mr. Gandhi suggested four things that are needed: 1. "That all Christians should begin to live more like their Lord and Master Jesus Christ. 2. That they should practice Jesus' way of life without adulteration or compromise. 3. That they should emphasize love as the central principle of Christianity. 4. That they should study the religions of the people whom they seek to benefit, not to find the evils in them in order to hold them up to ridicule, but to find the elements of the good, the true, and the beautiful in order to discover a more sympathetic approach to the people of India." This was indeed good advice.

The leaders of India in their very soul are seeking to repudiate western civilization. The burning of foreign cloth was a sample of that repudiation. At Vizagapatam are the graves of two Europeans who were both killed in a duel. The natives, to appease the spirits of the departed, ingeniously made an offering on their graves of a whiskey bottle and a cigar box as best calculated to appease their departed spirits. This is characteristic of the impression of materialism which the West has made upon the East with its terrific invasion of modern industrialism, conquering imperialism, and the exploitation of whole races for the white race, as in East Africa or in the Dutch Indies. While nearly all the British press in India has defended its right to drink and ridiculed America's breaking of her dry law, Mr. Gandhi and the Indian press have stood for prohibition. After his tour through India in 1921 when he made a study of political and social conditions here "Pussyfoot" Johnson said, "There is a man, sent of God, who is called Mahatma Gandhi . . . In two years, by sheer personal influence he has caused a greater diminution of the use of intoxicating liquors than has been accomplished by any other in the history of the world during his lifetime."

> UNITED STATES! the ages plead,
> Present and past in under-song;
> Go, put your creed into your deed,
> Nor speak with double tongue.
> Be just at home; then write your scroll
> Of honor o'er the sea,
> And bid the broad Atlantic roll
> A ferry of the free.
> Ralph Waldo Emerson.

The Hindu doctrine of Karma left each soul solitary to suffer its own punishment, beyond the reach of any possible help from God or man, but Mr. Gandhi and his followers have adopted Jesus' principle of vicarious suffering and the cross of Christ as their most sacred symbol. Indians believe him to be in prison today not because of Karma, because he deserved punishment for his own sin, but vicariously for India's freedom. Said one Hindu, "Is not Mr. Gandhi Christ-like?" He turned unconsciously to Jesus for his highest standards of life. Said another, "We think him an incarnation of Jesus Christ," thus identifying his highest ideal with Christianity. The magazine of the Arya Somaj, long the bitterest foe of Christianity, now hails Mr. Gandhi as "this modern Christ." Mr. Natarajan, the editor of the Social Reformer, said, "Mr. Gandhi has turned the eyes of India to the cross." On another occasion he said to Mr. Gandhi, "It is difficult to know where our Hinduism ends and where our Christianity begins." "That is so," replied Mr. Gandhi. The important point to notice is "Where our Christianity begins." In a word, for the first time Christianity is becoming theirs and is becoming naturalized.

There is no tendency whatever on the part of educated India to be baptized and to put on boots and trousers or to eat beef, or to identify themselves with the institutions of the conquering white race, or the practices of materialistic western civilization, or to copy the war-torn nations of Europe. If baptism means this they will not have it. But in all earnestness and humility they are seeking to appropriate the spirit of Jesus. They realize that "Jesus came to give religion, and not a religion;" and this universal spirit of religion they claim. As one Hindu said, "There is growing up in India a Christian cult apart from the Christian church." Another Hindu remarked, "Apart from Jesus no one else is seriously bidding for the heart of the world. There is no one else in the field." The iron system of caste and ancient customs are still holding India within the outward bounds of Hinduism. An Oxford graduate who is here with us in India heard one of his Hindu students, who had defended nationalism in a debate say, "Caste is the last trench that we are holding against Christianity. Were it not for caste almost every student in this hostel would be a Christian before tomorrow." As Keshub Chunder Sen well said, "None but Jesus! None but Jesus! None but Jesus deserves this precious diadem of India and none other shall have it."

The Mind of India

Truly the mind of mystic India is moving today toward Christ and his vicarious suffering. Perhaps this can best be understood by quoting from Mr. Gandhi himself and his final word to India at his trial, before he went into his six years of silent imprisonment, thus removing the one man loved and trusted by the impoverished masses of those 320,000,000. In his final statement to the British judge at his trial, he said in part: "I should explain why from a staunch loyalist and cooperator, I have become an uncompromising disaffectionist and non-cooperator . . . My public life began in 1893 in South Africa. I discovered that I had no rights as a man because I was an Indian. But I was not baffled. I thought that this treatment of Indians was an excrescence upon a system that was intrinsically and mainly good. I gave the government my voluntary and hearty cooperation. When the existence of the empire was threatened in 1899 by the Boer challenge, I offered my services to it and raised a volunteer ambulance corps. When the war broke out in 1914 between England and Germany I raised a volunteer ambulance corps in London. I was actuated by the belief that it was possible by such service to gain a status of full equality in the empire for my countrymen. The first shock came in the shape of the Rowlatt Act, a law designed to rob the people of all real freedom. I felt called upon to lead an intensive agitation against it. Then followed the Punjab horrors beginning with the massacre of Jallianwalla Bag and culminating in crawling orders, flogging and indescribable humiliations. I discovered, too, that the plighted word of the prime minister to the Mussalmans of India regarding the integrity of Turkey and the holy places of Islams was not likely to be fulfilled. . . .

"But in spite of the forebodings, I fought for cooperation and for the working of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. But all that was shattered. The Khilafat promise was not to be redeemed. The Punjab crime was whitewashed and most culprits went not only unpunished, but remained in active service and continued to draw pensions from the Indian revenue and in some cases were even rewarded. I saw, too, that not only did the reforms not mark a change of heart but they were only a method of further draining India of her wealth and of prolonging servitude. I came reluctantly to the conclusion that the British connection had made India more helpless than she ever was before, politically and economically. A disarmed India has no power of resistance against any aggressor. . . . .

"She has become so poor that she has little power of resistance in famine. Before the British advent, India spun and wove in her millions of cottages just the supplement she needed for adding to her meager agricultural resources. This cottage industry, so vital for India's existence has been ruined by incredibly heartless and inhuman processes, as described by English witnesses. Little do town dwellers know how the semi-starved masses of India are slowly sinking to lifelessness. Little do they know that their miserable comfort represents the brokerage they get for the work they do for the foreign exploiter, that the profits and the brokerage are sucked from the masses. Little do they realize that the government established by law in British India is carried on for this exploitation of the masses. No sophistry, no jugglery in figures, can explain away the evidence of the skeletons in many villages present to the wayfarer's eye. . . . . In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, justice has been denied to Indians as against Europeans in the courts of India. This is not an exaggerated picture. It is the experience of almost every Indian. . . . .

"I am satisfied that many English and Indian officials honestly believe that they are ministering one of the best systems devised in the world. They do not know that a subtle but effective system of terrorism and an organized display of force on the one hand, and the deprivation of all powers or retaliation and of self-defense on the other, have emasculated the people and induced in them the habit of simulation. This awful habit has added to the ignorance and the self-deception of the administrators. . .

"The average Englishman is haughty. He does not understand us, he considers himself to be a superior being. He thinks that he is born to rule us. He relies upon his forts or his guns to protect himself. He despises us. He wants to compel cooperation, i.e. slavery. Even him we have to conquer, not by bending the knee, but remaining aloof from him, but at the same time not hating him nor hurting him. . . . I have no personal ill-will against any single administrator. Much less can I have any disaffection towards the king's person. But I hold it to be a virtue to be disaffected towards a government which, in its totality, has done more harm to India than any previous system. India is less manly under the British rule than she ever was before. . . .

"I believe I have rendered a service to India and England by showing in non-cooperation the way out of the unnatural state in which both are living. In my opinion, non-cooperation with evil is as much a duty as is cooperation with good. Non-violence implies voluntary submission to the penalty for non-cooperation with evil. . . . I am here, therefore, to invite and submit cheerfully to the highest penalty that can be inflicted upon me for what in law is deliberate crime and what appears to me to be the highest duty of a citizen."

In China during our last tour, some 3,000 Confucian students and non-Christian young men rose publicly to confess Christ as Saviour. The situation in India is utterly different. Hindus are averse to baptism, the Christian church and western civilization, but the mind of educated India is moving toward Christ. The middle wall of partition is breaking down. Unseen, the kingdom of God is coming. Some day we may see a great, visible ingathering. In the meantime, the kingdom comes, but not with observation.

An Adventure to the Antipodes

By George E. Burlingame

TO have discovered in one vacation experience the British Empire, the Pacific Ocean, the Polynesian race, Sydney Harbor, Botany Bay, Waikiki Beach and the Stars and Stripes, might be accounted sufficiently satisfying. To have traveled first-cabin, in exclusive quarters, upwards of 15,000 miles of ocean, at a total cost of $150 for passage, may be considered quite incredible. To have witnessed equatorial sunsets in mid-ocean, to have skirted the borders of the Antarctic, to have clasped hands with retired cannibals, to have trailed through far-spreading waters the course of the adventurous Cook (remote antecedent of Cook's Tours), to have encountered the lissome kangaroo and the industrious platypus in their native habitat—may be considered interesting. To have passed from midsummer to midwinter in twenty days, to have passed from today to tomorrow and then back again, to lose the Dipper and find Canopus and Magellan's Clouds—may be accepted as diverting.

May Day, some ten or more years ago; but the memory of that day, and of the ninety days which followed, is vivid and exquisite to this hour. An hour ago we were moored at the dock in the harbor of San Francisco; now we are treading the deck of a British steamer headed toward the south pole. We are on British soil, embraced in the British Empire.

For twelve days we steam southwestwardly, a plodding Australian boat; and in that twelve days we never sight a single craft. We have picked a big ocean, and we have a lot of room. The first cabin includes a few Australians returning from business trips to the States; a talkative and rather quarrelsome German trader; some young fellows going out from England to the colonies; and an eminent British Ambassador, who with his wife and her secretary, is visiting the British possessions in the South Seas. America has had few finer friends than the late James Bryce, a kindly, gracious, Christian gentleman. He played a good game of deck quoits; and to have talked with him of politics and of books, as we watched a tropical sunset or lounged on the deck, was an experience to be treasured.

Sunday noon, on the twelfth day, the captain pointed out a faraway bank of white cloud on the horizon, and said, "Tahiti." It was sundown before we pushed cautiously through the gateway of the reef and docked at Papeete, chief town of the Society or Tahiti Islands, a French possession. A few days later we sighted the "two-horned Ikurangi," a magnificent mountain peak which dominates the little island of Rarotonga in the Cook Islands, in the jurisdiction of New Zealand. We were below the equator, and white flannels had displaced winter wraps, while we had ice-cream instead of beef broth at quartering time.

"Smelling Land"

The captain had talked of being able to "smell land" twenty miles away. It sounded like a seaman's yarn; but after you have once caught the odor of copra, and have learned to recognize that characteristic smell of the tropics, you too can smell land. Even now, passing by chance along a wharf in a seaboard city, and suddenly coming alongside a ship just in from the tropics with her cargo of copra, the memory of gleaming white coral reefs and tall waving palms and brown-skinned men piling up their load on a boat's deck, flashes vivid and alluring. Small wonder that the South Seas ensnared Stevenson, and called to Jack London, and laid their resistless spell on artist and sailor, dreamer and adventurer! Beauty of ocean waters, beauty of slender and stately palms, beauty of glistening white beaches, beauty of submarine life in plant and fish, beauty of mountain and sky—why, these alone are worth what the trip cost!

Windy Wellington was running true to form when we docked before day on a nasty wet morning at the end of May. A week later we rounded the southern tip of South Island (N. Z.) and looked the South Polar winds in the face while we fought our way across the Tasman Sea to Hobart Town, the rendezvous for the polar expeditions of Scott and Shackleton and Amundsen. Boreham, now famous the world over as an essayist, was then pastor in this remote seaport town, and was charmingly generous with hot drinks and printed sermons and fraternal interest when the traveler called at a late hour while the ship worked its cargo.

There are three harbors in the whole range of the seven seas: just three. Of course there are others with which mariners and traders make out; but three stand preeminent. Rio de Janiero, the writer has never seen; but its fame is without question. San Francisco Bay, in range, depth, security and beauty, is superb. But Sydney Harbor! How can one impart even a quiver of interest comparable to the charm and loveliness of that spacious haven sheltered by the majestic Sydney Heads which face each other a mile apart and form the gateway to probably the most beautiful and attractive harbor in all the world! Two hundred miles of coast border the quiet waters which lie behind that narrow gap; and the greatest city in the southern hemisphere waits here to welcome swift mail boats from London and Cape Town and Auckland, and sturdy freighters seeking cargo of mutton or wool or grain bound for the Thames or the Mersey; light craft also which cruise among the islands for fruit and guano and copra.

Sydney in June—midwinter there—is California at its best, save for the occasional rains. Two weeks among its cordial people, its lovely parks, its rich libraries, its splendid museums, served but to shape a resolve to go again and stay longer. The return trip included a day at Auckland, and a brief stop at Suva, chief port of the Fiji Islands, now a part of the empire. A century ago the Fijians, fierce blacks, were in ceaseless warfare, and practiced cannibalism. The things I recall most vividly are a native feeding a power press at the Methodist mission, which was printing a new translation of the gospel for a heathen tribe on a neighboring island; and a group of children of a dozen or twenty races playing in the doorway of a church building. Smart Fijians, great tall alert fellows, wearing British uniforms, patrolled the streets and wharves (which needed little patroling) as the embodiment of Britain's authority and of peace and order—and their grandfathers had been cannibals!

Northward day after day, until the great peak which rises out of the heart of Oahu slowly lifted from the sea, and in a few hours we were entering the harbor of Honolulu. We were 2200 miles from the California mainland—2200 miles from the North American continent. As we drifted slowly toward the mouth of the harbor we saw a little cutter bounding over the waves to greet us. To most of the passengers and crew it was a thing of casual interest, a step in the procedure of landing. . . . A flag fluttered from the staff of the cutter; and it had stripes of red and white and a blue field of stars! It was Old Glory, coming to meet a prodigal child of New England and Ohio and California, homeward bound after weeks of roaming beyond the equator! "O, say can you see?" Our flag! and suddenly the truth dawned, that America was not 2,200 miles away, at the far continental shore, but here, at the Port of Honolulu, in the Hawaiian Islands. This was America! this was the Homeland! And as that glorious flag flashed its radiance and beauty in the tropical sun of that August afternoon, a wanderer from the antipodes felt the glad tears come in a flood of joy and gratitude for the stars and stripes, and for America the beautiful, over whose harbors and fortresses and capitols that dear banner waves. Near to my heart lay the little silk flag given me by a thoughtful friend at my sailing. Oft had I looked at it, held it lovingly, kissed it, in faraway lands and seas. Now it seemed to cry out in kinship with that swift-moving flag coming to us across the waters; and even so my heart, urged by the heritage of generations of loyal ancestors, felt its kinship with the nation which even here at the center of the island world has established its authority and proclaimed its ideals and set up its government. I had found much in my travels: now I had found my own country, in a new and memorable appreciation of the priceless heritage of my fatherland.

Back to Christ

By Newton N. Riddell

VITAL Christianity is more than a confession of faith conformity to the ideals of Jesus. It is Christ manifesting himself in and through those who receive him. "God gase unto us eternal life and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath the life: he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life." The Lord's statement, "I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you," implies vital relationship as vine to branch. Christ on the cross is our Redeemer and Justifier. Christ in heaven is our High Priest and Intermediary. Christ indwelling us in the Holy Spirit is our eternal life, our righteousness and the source of all the attributes of Christian character. It is by his presence with us that he makes effective in us what he accomplished for us on Calvary. Any creed that leaves Christ outside of the believer, or the believer outside of Christ, is fundamentally unscientific, unscriptural and incapable of producing Christian life experience.

The New Creation

Jesus Christ is personally present in the Holy Spirit. He seeks to indwell all who will receive him. When one turns from sin and accepts him as a personal Saviour, he cleanses the heart and generates a new divine spirit in union with the receptive human spirit, thereby producing a "new creation," which is divine-human, God and man made one in spirit, life and attributes. When a Christian, through faith and consecration, opens his heart, Jesus comes in the Holy Spirit to abide within and to share his life, love, strength, wisdom and righteousness with the disciple. Thus, by regeneration and Christ's incarnation, man makes the transition from the Adamic state, in which all are subject to the law of sin and death, to the in-Christed state, in which all partake of the one indivisible, everlasting, divine life. This is not dogma; it is spiritual biology, provable by anyone who will comply with the laws and principles involved. "Hereby we know that we abide in him and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit."

Doctrinal Foundations

"Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ our Lord." The early Christians received him, and went forth in the power of his Spirit, preaching the gospel, healing the sick, the Lord working with them. Primitive Christianity was distinctly a manifestation of Christ in and through his followers. The supernatural was ever in evidence. When the church began to substitute doctrines about Christ for Christ himself, division and decline in spiritual power followed. Protestantism was founded on the infallibility of scripture as interpreted by fallable minds; hence the multiplication of sects. In the present crisis, conflicting doctrines are destroying faith, and causing the disintegration of denominations. This fermentation will continue its destructive work until Christians see the fallacy of propagating Christianity on the basis of doctrines, and return to the true foundation of experiencing "Christ in you—the hope of glory." Vitally related to him, united in him, they shall all be one in life, love, motive and purpose, serving the Spirit in demonstrating the truth, realizing the life, and Christianizing mankind.

Climbing the Coast

By Charles L. White

I

THE Coast Line railway from Los Angeles runs through fertile valleys which can easily support the abundant population that will surely some day live in this favored land. And as these valleys fill with those millions, the home mission problems will multiply.

On our train is a party of eighteen or twenty missionary executives of a great denomination. I talked with one of these alert missionaries about the mass movements in India and Africa and his present perplexing labors.

A lieutenant of the army lately come from abroad sits opposite. By my side is a man who proves to be a foreign missionary from India and knows our strong leaders in that land. Standing in the aisle is a Jew, a silent but eager listener.

II

We have just passed over one of the most dangerous parts of the road, threading along the mountain sides, which are channeled as deep ravines. At the station above, a truck of a coach ahead had dropped an important fastening and two hours were lost and possibly many a life time saved by repairing it.

III

At last the stars come out one by one. The skyline stretching from Mt. Shasta to Mt. Hood was clearly etched against the eastern horizon. Beyond it toward the Mississippi River have toiled for ninety years thousands of home missionaries who have seen their labors extend the frontiers of faith.

IV

On Thanksgiving Day, a candidate for our work in Spanish-speaking lands, told me of the long years his father had roamed on foot and horse-back over the western plains in summer's heat and winter's deep snows, across swollen streams, in blinding blizzards, ministering to the scattered but resolute souls that built up the great west.

V

Between the mountains and the western coast our home missionaries were among the first in the field, first in faith in God, first in faithfulness. The villages clustering on the mountain sides, the towns in the valleys and the cities by the lakes are what they are because the messengers of Christ crossed the mountains and plains and preached the gospel.

A Little Journey to the Throne of Happiness

By H. F. Huse

IT was away from town and the crowd. It was out of the black coat and the starched collar into a soft shirt and under an old hat. It was into the recesses and silences of the deep woods, where the groves were God's first temples, to a humble one-room lodge by the pondside, where mountains screened the rising sun, and glorious hilltops reflected the last rays of setting sun. It was tramping ,fishing, berry-picking, rowing. It was communion with nature, and God who by his spirit transformed the primeval chaos into the world of order and beauty, sun, moon and stars; mountain, hill and valley; forest, field and flower. It was away from man and the confusion of tongues to the company of birds and creatures, wild and near wild; the flock of ducks fleeing with fright the approach of man; the fox that startled me more than I startled him; the click of the reel, the splash of the waters, and the fish for my lady's dinner; the woodland paths and occasional sight of deer; the drinking from birch cup, or, better still, on hands and knees burying the lips in the bubbling spring on the mountain-side, and getting up, thanking God for the sweet nectar, and that other spring that Christ digs in the heart of the Christian.

It was the quiet hours with the Book neath shade of pines. And on four Sundays it was the tramp of miles to the road, and telling to the company at the wayside chapel about him who said "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me and ye shall find rest unto your souls."

My Best Vacation

By J. H. Hollingsworth

PLACES I have visited — Mountain Lake Park, Deer Park, Oakland, in Maryland. All very fine for recuperation. Have also visited Cedar Point, Martha's Vineyard, and other lake and ocean resorts, but have found nothing just like the White Mountain region. While sojourning in the vicinity of Boston, I found myself torn down and sick with overwork.

I left ocean resorts galore, took the train for Lake Winnepesaukee, and the Weirs. The Winnepesaukee is the most beautiful lake I know of, with its 365 islands and the White Mountains lifting up their majestic heads in the distance. I was glad to leave the dusty train, for the "Mt. Washington," a seaworthy boat on the lake. The boat lifted anchor, (if it had one), and was soon plowing crystal waters that glistened and glittered in the sunlight like a great bed of diamonds. Leisurely we wound our way around among the islands; until finally, our destination was announced, and I was directed to a brand splinter new cottage, whither neither man or monkey had ever crept or slept. There was the scent of the new pine lumber everywhere, and on retiring the odor was wafted on the mountain air to my cot. I breathed deeply, and slept sweetly, and when in the morning the sun came over the hilltop to tell us it was day there was at least one preacher who had met with a marvelous physical transformation. The Baptists of New Hampshire were holding meetings there; so I went to meeting, I went fishing, I went swimming, I also climbed the hills, until I was hungry, and I found the very best of food for the inner man, served by pleasing girl graduates, at an excellent hotel hard by.

I was so taken with the place that I went home, got my family of five, rented a furnished cottage, and spent the month of August there. We heard Baptist preaching, Universalist and Unitarian preaching and got some good out of it all. Health and strength fully returned and we had the time of our lives. That, good friends, was my most pleasant, and profitable vacation.

Next to Nature

By W. P. Lovett

ONE of the best vacation trips I ever took was a canoe cruise among the maze of islands in the North Channel, which runs from Georgian Bay to the St. Mary's river, Canada—a section of Lake Huron. Eight of us, in four canoes, outfitted inexpensively at Little Current where we got our canoes, after going there by steamer from Detroit.

We had small "pup" tents, easily set up, good for sleeping shelter but not bulky, and broke camp nearly every day. We spent most of our time paddling easily among the islands, of which there are so many, in so many bays, that one must be careful not to get lost. Fishing was so good that we got tired of the sport, and the diet. The country is an ideal sportsmen's paradise, with camping places on every island—made by nature—,rugged scenery, some wild game, such as deer, on the mainland, and stories of bear, etc., in season. We climbed rocky heights, stuffed ourselves with blueberries, visited an Indian village, and met Indians daily as they drifted about in their fish-boats.

The trip was absolutely safe, because there was little open water to cover and all the young men were good swimmers. We had bad weather, with rain, often enough to furnish variety, and were flooded out of one camp; we left things as they were, found shelter in a deserted lumber camp for the night, and the next day got things perfectly dried out in the warm sun, with no loss whatever, but with an addition to our experience. In my judgment the real vacation is the one that gets a man next to nature, sleeping on the ground, filling up with pure air, pumped in by vigorous exercise, plus eight or ten hours of good sleep every night.

"The Juciest Fruit"

By Amandus N. Sorensen

THE most enjoyable vacation that ever came my way was in 1912 when the Lincoln Baptist Church of Blue Earth County, Minnesota, gave me a leave of absence covering three months, for the purpose of going to Europe. I left the United States two months after the "Titanic" sank, on the steamer "Oscar II" for Copenhagen where I spent fourteen days with my sister seeing the Danish capital. From there we journeyed through Denmark up to Aalborg where I spent some time with my other two sisters and father, who was then eighty-six years of age. I then took a journey to Stockholm, Sweden, where I, with much profit, spent seven days seeing the Scandinavian Venice. Leaving for London, we crossed the North Sea with fear and trembling and much internal disturbances. We reached old London where we saw the greatest and most interesting old things that we had yet seen during our eighteen days' stay there. From there we journeyed to Southampton, leaving on the majestic "Olympic" by way of Cherbourg, Fance, arriving in New York on the sixth day after having fair weather and a delightful trip. In New York we abode eighteen days, seeing the greatest things we have ever seen belonging to the new order of things.

I shall ever be grateful to Lincoln Church for granting me this vacation which is the juiciest fruit of all my days off, so far.

The Water Route

By A. D. Gue

MY vacation is a restful period to which I look forward with grateful thanksgiving to him who grants all good things in life. My wife and myself (being good Baptists) are strong for the water route, hence we generally spend our vacation on the rivers or lakes where we get a real rest, with nothing to do but eat, sleep and enjoy the beautiful scenery along the rivers leading from the city. This, together with the meeting of so many good people and the reading of good literature, is the most restful as well as the most pleasant one can imagine.

Last year we took the trip to Cincinnati, a round-trip lasting eight days, and we felt like new people on our return. In 1921 we took the round trip to Zanesville, Ohio, and in 1920 to Charleston, W. Va. Excellent accommodations are provided by the boats making these trips and for those seeking a real rest, they will find no better way of getting it than by making one of these trips.

The First the Best

By S. E. Lyon

A vacation is an absolute necessity to prove your ability to overcome obstacles. Let the ordinary routine of work go on and the wheels seem to be greased, but allow a vista of cessation from labor to arise, and a hundred difficulties loom high. We spent ten minutes and a kettle of hot water, on a June day, starting a balky Ford that had been put in perfect repair the day before. Variations of this were staged at conspicuous points in the journey.

A vacation is necessary to prove your everlasting patience with your friends. One of ours insisted that we occupy a particular hotel, as superior to our own selection. For three nights we awakened every half hour, fearing a modern "Bertha" had collided with the lower story—Only an "interurban" crashing on its brakes!

A vacation is necessary for fresh sight and illustrations. We visited a snake zoo and found inspiration in seeing how even snakes play "follow the leader." When a patriarchal rattler wreathed himself into graceful circles and reared a defiant head, a dozen meek followers rattled in harmony. But even snakes can create a spirit of gratitude—we are thankful the evolutionists pulled us past the snake stage before he displayed life-sized portraits of our ancestors.

A vacation may be necessary, to quicken appreciation of one's faith, in contrast with modern systems. We were informed at a theosophical center, that the soul—between its hundreds of incarnations—stopped for a little breathing spell, in a place the church calls heaven. How precious to know it is an eternal abiding place with a swift angelic transportation!

P. S. It was the best vacation because it was the first!

"The Tribe of the Helpers"

Volunteers in Service to Their Foreign "Neighbors" in Chicago and Vicinity

By Gertrude deClercq

"The ways of the world are full of haste and turmoil;
I will sing of the tribe of helpers who travel in peace."

It is Monday evening over back-o-the yards, and as the teachers draw near the field house at Davis Square Park, there is a "sound of revelry by night." The doors burst open, and several girls rush out, with greetings and offers to carry "teacher's package," "teacher's handbag" and "teacher's umbrella." Although it is the Lenten season and raining, on the second floor of this community house are gathered more than seventy Polish and Lithuanian girls, ranging in ages from four to fourteen years, the majority of them representing Catholic homes. A happy hour is spent in sewing, amid laughter and chatter. Then the work, marked carefully, is put away, and the children come together into the assembly room for the closing exercises. They join heartily in the singing of "America, America, God shed his grace on thee;" they listen attentively to the story of "Saint George and the Dragon," they name the "dragons" in their own lives and repeat the words—"Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." While it might seem that little can be accomplished by this weekly contact with these Slavic girls in a community that is solidly foreign in customs, language, ways of living and—shall we say it?—religion, it is the leaven that leaveneth the whole lump. This is only one of four such schools, under the general direction of the Christian Americanization Department. A second is held each week at the Czecho-Slovak Baptist Church, another at McKinley Park, and a fourth, recently organized, at the Polish Baptist Church. And who are the "helpers" who are traveling the "way of peace" into the hearts of the children in these schools? Volunteers from the Englewood Baptist Church, the Austin Church and the Guild of the First Baptist Church.

"I hear the children crying in the night—
The little children: 'God of Stars and Sun,
We do not like the darkness; send down light,
From where there is so much to where there's none;
Fireflies and flowers we love, and all things bright,
But in our heart it's dark; Dear God-send light!'"

What a joy it is to these helpers who have an opportunity to bring sunshine and brightness into the hearts and lives of the children!

"He that turneth from the road to rescue another, Turneth toward his goal."

A call comes over the telephone, on Saturday morning, from the South Chicago Neigborhood House. "Please get two or three people to come out to our sewing school this afternoon. We have no one to help us." Consternation reigns, as Saturday is a busy day with the housewife and this is rather short notice. But knowing the exigencies of the case, and relying upon the consecration and faithfulness of our volunteer workers, three of them are called up, although one has company and another has promised some needed repairs on her husband's clothing, they gladly "turn from the road" to help in this emergency.

On Sunday afternoons, we catch a glimpse of members of the "tribe" as they teach in the Sunday schools at the Roumanian Baptist Church, the Polish Baptist Church, the Chinese Evangelical Church, the South Chicago Neighborhood House and in the Chinese Sunday schools held in four of our Baptist churches. These volunteer workers are all busily employed six days of the week, and on the seventh are ready to help these men, women and children to find the way of peace. God alone can measure the influence on his people "back home" of the Chinese boy, who was baptized on a Sunday evening and left immediately afterwards for China.

"He that taketh up the burdens of the fainting Lighteneth his own load."

Words that are graphically descriptive of the splendid service of one of our volunteers. For a year and a half she visited three Austrian women in the country, missing but one week, with all sorts of storm, heat and cold to combat, along with bad roads, and she walked to the homes of her Austrian friends over a mile and a half each way. On pleasant days she would find one of these Austrian women sitting in a cemetery about a Lutheran church. Upon inquiring, Marie explained that she came there in her homesickness and loneliness because it reminded her of her old home where all the churches were surrounded in this manner. It was also Marie who gave her American teacher a dollar saying, "This is for God, you give it to him; you know him better that I do." And now, through the loving friendship of this Christian woman, Marie, (as well as the two other Austrian women) has learned to know God, too.

Armenia! The very name arouses sympathy! About twelve years ago, two young men came from that country to America, locating in a village near Chicago. With limited funds at their command, they started a rug-cleaning business, which later developed into the selling of oriental rugs. They studied the English language and became citizens of the United States, and when war was declared they were among the first to volunteer for service. One was accepted and served in front lines in France for over a year. Hearing of the terrible sufferings of members of their family, these brothers sent their savings to Armenia to bring one widowed sister, her two boys and a niece to America. More than a year later they brought six other members of their family. Those relatives had all been prosperous, but they were driven from their beautiful homes by the enemy, the homes burned, their valuables stolen, the husbands murdered and the women made slaves. One of the young girls lived in a basement for four years cared for by a Greek friend who protected her from the enemy. How did we come in touch with these Armenians? Word came to this same consecrated volunteer, a member of the Baptist church in Wilmette, that one of these Armenian families was being held at Ellis Island and about to be deported; with the aid of their congressman, she and her husband succeeded in having the family admitted. The gratitude of the Armenians knew no bounds! Not only because of their freedom, but more especially because of the friendship of American women, who are teaching them English, bringing them comfort and contentment; in every way taking up the burden of these, who have horror on their faces and tragedy in their souls, having seen their loved ones massacred, and worse. The families now attend the Baptist church with their two English teachers and even though they do not understand the sermon, they know they are in the house of God with Christian friends.

Remarkable has been the record of the Morgan Park Church, where a half dozen of the volunteer workers have visited their friends in the foreign homes uninterruptedly, week by week, for three years, bringing to them the English and American ideals, comfort and joy, and a knowledge of the "better country that is heavenly." At various social occasions held at the church the foreign friends are welcome guests. Every Sunday an automobile is sent to gather up eleven children, Italian and Polish, who are brought to Morgan Park

WHO IS THE SOME ONE?

Some years ago I read a good article in The Standard in regard to child dedication. Many of our members are in favor of such a service. I wish you would write an article or get some one to do so explaining the scripture for such a service. The neglect of such a service has been a serious mistake. One lady, a Baptist, told me her mother was a Baptist but took her children to a pastor of another denomination in order to have them dedicated.

SOMETHING FRIVOLOUS

Saturday afternoon and the good wife, all too weary, asks me to read her something frivolous while she shells the peas. I snatch up your issue of June 23, and calling for full steam ahead, I read from your Open Forum the communication headed: "Doubts that Pentecost was Outpentecosted." As I read the last word, the paper is violently ravaged from my grasp and thrown on the floor. I look up inquiringly. Dulcet tones explain: "I didn't mean something merely funny; I wanted at least a gleam of intelligence in it."

Is there any publication which suggests a proper pose (and poise) for those who listen to the varied discourse of our denominational press? An early answer will be appreciated by an appreciative reader.

DOES IT PAY?

Yes, it does pay! A recent editorial in The Baptist asked the question concerning B. Y. P. U. of A. conventions. If you as a layman had been on the platform at the convention last year at St. Paul and seen the 335 young people come forward from all parts of the immense hall, pledging themselves for the first time to consecrate their lives to full time Christian service, you would say it paid one hundredfold. Their faces were serious with a calm realization of their pledge. A business man can appreciate and respect the seeming sacrifice that all are gladly making. After them came 120 more young men and women to reconsecrate their lives for full-time service, having pledged themselves previously and now many are in college or seminary in preparation.

As also quoted, tithing and daily devotion have been a principal part of B. Y. P. U. activities. How intensely practical and real these two things are, and how essential, in lives of our young people! How much more efficient our denomination would be if the older folk were equally sincere. If so, our denominational program of $100,000,000 would be 80 per cent paid up instead of 40 per cent at the end of the fourth year.

The B. Y. P. U. of A. has made wonderful progress in the last eight years and should be commended for it. They are constantly broadening their program. The conventions have given a lifelong inspiration to tens of thousands of our young people and our denomination must depend on our Life Service League for its future ministers, missionaries and full time workers and should cultivate this fertile field. Yes, our conventions do pay.

VOWING AND DOING

There has just come to my notice a copy of the "alleged" oath of the "murderous Knights of Columbus." If such an oath is to be taken seriously Protestants certainly have reason to tremble. But I have also before me another oath made "in the presence of God, angels, and this assembly" which has been taken by some 8,000,000 of people in the United States. These 8,000,000 of people covenant to walk together in Christian love, to give cheerfully and regularly towards the expenses of the organization, to be zealous in their efforts to get other people into their organization, to avoid all gossiping, to be just in their dealings, and exemplary in their deportment, to maintain family devotion, to settle disputes by mutual conference instead of by law, and to keep in active touch with the organization by at once uniting with another branch of it should they remove from the place where they have had their membership.

When Satan first heard of this compact his blood ran cold. He knew that these millions of people with these plans and this solemn agreement meant the end for him. But he has been waiting for years and as the end has not come yet he is beginning to suspect that their contract was merely a form which they had little intention of putting into practice.

And this other agreement to murder Protestants has been in effect for a good while, if it exists at all, but the murdered Protestants are not sufficiently numerous to do great credit to the sincerity of the oath. It does not compare favorably in effectiveness with the murder propaganda in Germany which has killed its hundreds. I am living among Knights of Columbus but I am not fearing for my life, and I suspect that the other gentleman referred to is not at all more afraid for his business than I am for my life. Seemingly the liars are not all in one camp.

Beyond

It seemeth such a little way to me,
Across to that strange country, "The Beyond;"
And yet not strange, for it has grown to be
The home of those of whom I am so fond;
They make it seem familiar and most dear,
As journeying friends bring distant countries near.

So close it lies that, when my sight is clear,
I think that I can see the gleaming strand;
I know I feel that those who've gone from here
Come near enough to touch my eager hand.
I often think but for your veiled eyes
We should find heaven right round about us lies.

I cannot make it seem a day to dread,
When from this dear earth I shall journey out
To that still dearer country of the dead,
And join the lost ones so long dreamed about.
I love this world, yet I shall love to go
And meet the friends who wait for me, I know.

* * * *

And so for me there is no sting to death,
And so the grave has lost its victory;
It is but crossing with a bated breath
And white, set face, a little strip of sea,
To find the loved ones waiting on the shore,
More beautiful, more precious than before.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox

"CHILLED!"

One of the things about The Baptist which we greatly admire is the Open Forum page where any man may shoot at the editor if he wishes to. That illustration on page 646 entitled "Chilled" is a splendid illustration if it were only true. For if a Wyoming man has a new Ford car that gets chilled going up a hill, he ought to be proud of it and put it in a museum. Usually the pesky thing going up hill gets as hot as a volcano. We conclude that the editor does not drive a Ford or his keen eye would have discovered something strange in that paragraph. He probably drives a Pierce-Arrow and was more interested in the sharp point of his good illustration than in the framework of its setting.

To the Japanese

BRAVE little people, of large aims, you bow
Too often and too low before the Past;
You sit too long in worship of the dead.
Yet have you risen, open-eyed, to greet
The great material present; now salute
The Great Future, blazing its bold trail
Through old traditions. Leave your dead to sleep
In quiet peace with God. Let your concern
Be with the living, and yet unborn;
Bestow on them your thoughts, and waste no time
In costly honors to insensate dust.
Unlock the doors of usefulness; and lead
Your lovely daughters forth to larger fields
Away from jungles of the ancient sin.
But oh, the sorrow of the undertone,
The wail of helpless weeping in the dawn
From lips that smiled through gilded bars at night.

A Japanese Student's Walking Trip

BY REV. STEPHEN W. RYDER, OF TOKYO

ONE of the many good features of the Japanese school system is the educational walking trip. Two of these trips are taken each year to some spot of great natural beauty or to some place of historic interest—in Japan, the latter usually includes the former. Places of historic interest are carefully marked with tablets and monuments setting forth the historic associations. This side of the educational system keeps vividly alive in the mind historic personages and occurrences. Mr. Hoffsommer recently took a group of about fifteen students from Meiji Gakuin on one of these walking trips and kindly invited me to join the company.

Winding our way along the narrow streets of the water-front we boarded a little coasting steamer for Uruga—about half a day's journey. To produce new sensations, this vibrating craft was as good as some of the latest mechanical shockers of Coney Island. It was enjoyable until it began to rain; then, if it became less pleasant, it became more interesting. The whole company of about seventeen crawled into the little dry-goods-box-like cabin, about eight feet long, five feet wide and four feet high. The reader may work out the simple sum, how many layers seventeen men would make in a box of this size. But everybody was in holiday good humor, and an occasional song threatened to drown the loud-complaining machinery, though the throbbing of the engine served for the strokes of a baton. Every one seemed glad to get off at Uruga and stretch his limbs, even though it was raining. Some of us, too hopeful of the weather, had come without umbrellas, but that was not a serious matter in this land of bamboo and paper, and I was soon equipped with a good artistic parachute at an outlay of seventeen and one-half cents.

This department is conducted by Miss Margaret T. Applegarth. Communications to her may be addressed in care of THE BAPTIST.

A short walk from Uruga brought us to the part of the seashore where Commodore Perry is said to have first landed. Here the Japanese have erected a monument. It seems significant that a memorial of this kind should have been built by the Japanese to commemorate the beginning of their intercourse with America. A tea-house nearby is kept by an old man who saw Commodore Perry when he came in 1853.

After a day's tramp through the rain it was very refreshing to leave our shoes and wet garments at the door of the inn, don the kimono furnished guests by the innkeeper, and then take a plunge into a Japanese hot bath—the bath par excellence. The tubs are built much higher than ours, so that the bather can sit and have the water up to his neck. Then at an inn the bath is often large enough for from two to five to go in at once. This is not as bad as it may appear, because the Japanese are scrupulously clean and scrub themselves thoroughly with soap, and usually with a scrubbing brush before entering the bath. Arriving at our rooms, we find hibachi of charcoal glowing cheerfully, and the maid serves us with tea and cakes. It is customary to serve meals individually in the room, since the bed and blankets are stowed away in a closet during the daytime, to be taken out at bedtime and spread on the clean matting floor. But we arranged to take dinner all together. This was easily done, because the dividing walls of the apartments are sliding doors of cardboard or thin wood which can be readily removed. So we all sat down on zabuton (cushions) and after prayer, kept the chopsticks busy. Three maids in the middle of the circle were also kept busy filling the students' bowls with rice from the great wooden tubs.

After the regular course was over the maids brought on tea, persimmons tied up in clusters, and a great variety of fancy cakes. Then the students played some games of a novel nature, in which Mr. Hoffsommer took a helpful part, and in which the writer entered somewhat cautiously. Each student assumed a different pose to that of the man on his right. When this game is played quickly, as it should be, it is a very striking exhibition. Some of the students were very good at juggling chopsticks and cups. The most comical game was one in which two fellows sat down facing each other, each with a pair of chopsticks, and a single bowl placed between them. Tapping the bowl with the chopsticks, each proceeded very calmly to pinch the other's nose with the chopsticks. The one who laughed first was the loser. This was done so deliberately and with such serious faces that it was exceedingly amusing.

Rice is grown nearly everywhere in Japan, even in positions and soils where other crops would probably be more profitable. We walked through many rice fields, both dry and wet (lowland and upland rice, I suppose it should be called), and succeeded in getting a series of pictures that show how the rice is handled. Many women work in the fields, some digging with great, heavy hoes. They remind me of Mr. Markham's "Man with the Hoe," but instead of bearing the weight of centuries, these lively damsels appear happy, and often sing at their work in a manner to delight the heart of Carlyle.

Throughout our trip we found by the roadside little images of wood or stone, sometimes set up by the trunk of a tree, sometimes on a little eminence, with a tiny house built over them to protect them from the weather. Most of these images have little bibs tied about them, and sometimes an offering of coin or other nature laid before them. The country people, especially, seem religious, but when we see them bowing and praying to such images of wood and stone we pray that the time may soon come when they may learn of the true God.

My Lord Bag-O'-Rice

A Japanese Fairy Story

ONCE upon a time there was a brave warrior, called My Lord Bag-o'-Rice, who spent all his time in waging war against the King's enemies.

One day, when he had sallied forth to seek adventures, he came to an immensely long bridge, spanning a river just at the place where it flowed out of a fine lake. When he set foot on this bridge, he saw that a Serpent twenty feet long was lying there basking in the sun, in such a way that he could not cross the bridge without treading on it.

Most men would have taken to their heels at so frightful a sight. But my Lord Bag-o'-Rice was not to be daunted. He simply walked right ahead,—squash, scrunch, over the Serpent's body.

Instantly the Serpent turned into a tiny Dwarf, who, humbly bowing the knee, and knocking the planks of the bridge three times with his head in token of respect, said: "My Lord! you are a man, you are! For many a weary day have I lain here, waiting for one who should avenge me on my enemy. But all who saw me were cowards, and ran away. You will avenge me, will you not? I live at the bottom of this lake, and my enemy is a Centipede who dwells at the top of yonder mountain. Come along with me, I beseech you. If you help me not, I am undone."

The Warrior was delighted at having found such an adventure as this. He willingly followed the Dwarf to his summer-house beneath the waters of the lake. It was all curiously built of coral and metal sprays in the shape of seaweed and other water-plants, with fresh-water crabs as big as men, and water-monkeys, and newts, and tadpoles as servants and body-guards. When they had rested awhile, dinner was brought in on trays shaped like the leaves of water-lilies. The dishes were water-cress leaves—not real ones, but much more beautiful than real ones; for they were of water-green porcelain with a shimmer of gold; and the chop-sticks were of beautiful petrified wood like black ivory. As for the wine in the cups, it looked like water; but, as it tasted all right, what did its looks signify?

Well, there they were, feasting and singing; and the Dwarf had just pledged the Warrior in a goblet of hot steaming wine, when thud! thud! thud! like the tramp of an army, the fearful monster of whom the Dwarf had spoken was heard approaching. It sounded as if a continent were in motion; and on either side there seemed to be a row of a thousand men with lanterns. But the Warrior was able to make out, as the danger drew nearer, that all this fuss was made by a single creature, an enormous Centipede over a mile long; and that what had seemed like men with lanterns on either side of it, were in reality its own feet, of which it had exactly one thousand on each side of its body, all of them glistening and glinting with the sticky poison that oozed out of every pore.

There was no time to be lost. The Centipede was already half-way down the mountain. So the Warrior snatched up his bow, a bow so big and heavy that it would have taken five ordinary men to pull it—fitted an arrow into the bow-notch, and let fly.

He was not one ever to miss his aim. The arrow struck right in the middle of the monster's forehead. But alas! it rebounded as if that forehead had been made of brass.

A second time did the Warrior take his bow and shoot. A second time did the arrow strike and rebound; and now the dreadful creature was down to the water's edge, and would soon polute the lake with its filthy poison. Said the Warrior to himself: "Nothing kills Centipedes so surely as human spittle." And with these words, he spat on to the tip of the only arrow that remained to him (for there had been but three in his quiver). This time again the arrow hit the Centipede right in the middle of its forehead. But instead of rebounding, it went right in and came out again at the back of the creature's head, so that the Centipede fell down dead, shaking the whole country-side like an earthquake, and the poisonous light on its two thousand feet darkening to a dull glare like that of the twilight of a stormy day.

Then the Warrior found himself wafted back to his own castle; and round him stood a row of presents, on each of which were inscribed the words "From your grateful dwarf." One of these presents was a large bronze bell, which the Warrior, who was a religious man as well as a brave one, hung up in the temple that contained the tombs of his ancestors. The second was a sword, which enabled him ever after to gain the victory over all his enemies. The third was a suit of armor which no arrow could penetrate. The fourth was a roll of silk, which never grew smaller, though he cut off large pieces from time to time to make himself a new court dress.

The fifth was a bag of rice, which, though he took from it day after day for meals for himself, his family and his trusty retainers, never got exhausted as long as he lived.

And it was from this fifth and last present that he took his name and title of "My Lord Bag-o'-Rice;" for all the people thought that there was nothing stranger in the whole world than this wonderful bag, which made its owner such a rich and happy man.

How the Rain Came

By Charles Irwin Herring

IT was a bright summer morning. Little White Cloud sailed along quite alone under the broad blue sky. He had watched the sun rise in the east, and saw the long shadows flee away before him. He had listened to the morning songs of the birds and enjoyed them very much. For a good while he had been sitting on his carpet of gold, looking about him and watching and waiting. Presently he noticed that the birds had quit singing, the trees were not waving their branches at him, the little lake beneath him was not rippling a smile to him and the broad green fields of wheat had stopped billowing below him. The cows were standing or lying in the shady places in the pastures; the sheep had trotted off to the green woods; and the farmer was resting his team in the furrow. All the world, as far as Little White Cloud could see, was very still. He wondered what could be the matter that every thing had become so quiet. He leaned over on his elbow and listened to see if he could hear what the long rows of corn were murmuring to each other down in the big field. Presently he made out a hoarse whisper which sounded like praying. It said, "Dear Little White Cloud, the sun is very hot, and the ground is very dry. We are all so thirsty, we are choking for a drink. Please send us a good rain as soon as ever you can."

Then Little White Cloud sat up on his golden carpet and set out a radio call for help everywhere under the broad blue sky. Another little cloud heard this call for help. He set off in his silver-winged aeroplane to see what Little White Cloud wanted. He flew up to where Little White Cloud was sitting on his carpet of gold and said, "What is wanting here to day?" Little White Cloud answered him,

"Listen to the corn rows as they pray
Please send us a rain, right away!
For we are choking here today."

"Ah me!" said the second little cloud, "Two little clouds can't make a rain for the big fields. So he lifted his trumpet to his lips and blew an invitation to other clouds. A faraway cloud heard the invitation and came rolling up on his breeze chariot. "What is wanted here today?" he shouted. Little White Cloud answered him,

"Listen to the corn rows as they pray,
Please send us a rain, right away!
For we are choking here today."

"Ah me!" said the cloud from far away, "Three little clouds can't make a rain for the big fields."

So they all raised their trumpets to their lips and blew another invitation. Big Black Cloud heard their call. He mounted himself on the wings of the West Wind, and dashed away to see what was wanted. He was so big that he covered all the sky as he flew. The world grew dark beneath him. He flew up to the three little clouds and shouted to them, "What is wanted here to day?" Little White Cloud answered him,

"Listen to the corn rows as they pray,
Please send us a rain, right away!
For we are choking here today."

Big Black Cloud was still for a little while, and he heard that prayer. Then he spoke in his voice of thunder and gave the farmer sitting on the fence fair warning. The farmer drove his horses away to the barn. His wife closed the house windows, and the birds flew to their nests. Then Big Cloud spoke again in his voice of thunder, and bade the rain drops to fall.

Summer Contest

Dear Young Reserves:

All sorts of hints and suggestions have been in my mail lately, showing very plainly that you are all on tip-toe to see what our new contest is to be, for every July we have something special, and this year it is to be a short story about some imaginary (or real) boy or girl in Japan! The following simple rules should be observed:

1. Write on one side of the paper only.

2. Have name, address and age on your story.

3. The story should be about 500 words in length.

4. Mail not later than Aug. 1 to Miss Margaret Applegarth, in care of The Baptist, 417 South Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

There will be two first prizes, one for the best story written by a boy and another for the best story written by a girl. Stories will be judged on the basis of their interest and of their truthfulness to life in Japan. Haven't you a little plot in mind this very moment—a little plot which is simply aching to get itself down on paper? You will find an article on Japan in last week's Chimney Corner, as well as in this present number. Others will follow soon, which may prove suggestive to young authors!

Young People's Work

Topic for July 22

WHAT IN PRESENT-DAY SOCIAL LIFE WOULD CHRIST APPROVE? WHAT WOULD HE DISAPPROVE?

I Cor. 10-23, 24, 31-33; 11:1

"All things are lawful; but not all things are expedient.
All things are lawful; but not all things edify."
"Let no man seek his own, but each his neighbor's good."

A pretty difficult subject! It is hard to know just what Christ would say to us moderns if he were here. There are some things in present-day social life which have scant mention in the scriptures or directly in the Master's teaching. Some are not mentioned at all. Well, what are the young people to do?

There is only one safe ground. Study the life and character of Jesus. From such a study young people will find the most attractive character the world has ever produced. They will find that while he did not deal specifically with some of things in our present-day life, he did lay down great fundamental principles of right living and right thinking. We have the scriptures in which we find certain instruction and guidance. Probably our greatest difficulty is that we are not willing to acknowledge any other authority than ourselves in matters of religion and morals.

Christ would approve of everything that squares with the great principles as noted above. He would approve of the joyous, good times of the young people—their hikes, socials, games, athletics, parties of the right sort, etc. I think he would approve of their dramatic clubs, debating societies, and of every other form of amusement of a wholesome, healthful and helpful nature.

Christ would disapprove of everything that does not square with his ideals of purity, honesty, sincerity, justice. There are a good many social functions which young people attend to which I do not think Christ would go if he were a young man now. He would most certainly pass by and condemn that which mars beauty of life and nobility of thought. He would not stoop to those things which would lower his ideals of purity and mar his conscience. Christ was every inch a man in all of his relationships. He is for us ever and always the supreme example of what young people ought to be.

Alberta Special

The Baptist young people of this province are planning to hold their first Provincial Convention on July 28-29 at the Baptist Assembly Grounds at Gull Lake. This convention will immediately follow the closing of the summer assembly program.

Our camp grounds are situated ten miles west of Lacombe, which is on the main motor road between Calgary and Edmonton. I have been asked to write you and give an invitation to any of our B. Y. P. U. friends in the United States who may be taking an auto tour up this way at that time, to join us.

Any visitors from Baptist churches south of the line would be welcome at the assembly meetings also. We have eleven acres for camping purposes and also accommodation in our own huts and tents for any who may not be carrying their own camping outfit.

Hoping to have the joy of greeting some of our brethren from your country.

PERCY H. ROBERT.

Abington Association, Pennsylvania

The B. Y. P. U. of the Abington Association held its second annual field day on June 16 at Brooks Athletic Field, Providence Road, Scranton.

The events started promptly at two o'clock with an interesting baseball game between Calvary Church of Taylor, Pa., and Peckville Church of Peckville. Immediately after there were several races. The advertising committee was on hand with a few advertising stunts. A loving cup was given to the society attaining the highest number of points, the cup having been held by Calvary Church of Taylor last year.

Here and There

PITTSBURGH BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE have elected Mr. L. E. Van Kirk as their new president. The annual business meeting of the association was held in Shady Avenue Church on Apr. 6.

TENNESSEE EIGHTH ANNUAL B. Y. P. U. State Convention was held at Memphis, June 12-16. The key-note was "Christ Preeminent."

HAROLD I. MCKEEVER, retiring president of the Pittsburgh Association, suggests the following goals for the new year:

1. At least fifty representatives at Boston.
2. At least 250 representatives at Ridgesentatives at Ridgeview Park.
3. At least twelve new local organizations—five senior, four junior, three intermediate.
4. At least 25 per cent gain in our total B. Y. P. U. membership through a general campaign.
5. Special stress given to Daily Devotions League, and to Baptist Tithers League.
6. A repetition of the B. Y. P. U. Institute of Feb. 24, 1923.
7. A continuation of our educational and research programs.
8. One or two new Group Unions.
9. 2,000 subscribers to B. Y. P. U. Bulletin.

MARYLAND B. Y. P. U. ORGANIZATION has given 647 B. Y. P. U. awards during the past year. There are 389 who hold the B. Y. P. U. diploma for the study of the B. Y. P. U. Manual.

INDIANA YOUNG PEOPLE have just closed their campaign in the interest of the Baptist Observer, the state paper, securing 1,596 renewals and 1,341 new subscriptions. The goal was 2,500 new subscriptions. Pittsford B. Y. P. U. won the trip to Boston with 299 points, while Sullivan takes second place with 188 points; Tuxedo Park third with 141 points; Gary fourth with 108 points.

GEORGIA BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION Twenty-ninth State Convention was held in Atlanta, Georgia, June 19, 1923. Dr. F. A. Agar of the Northern Baptist Convention was one of the speakers.

WASHINGTON, D. C., YOUNG PEOPLE, under the leadership of John Ruthven, have planned an inviting trip in connection with the Boston Convention. They will visit the Thousand Islands in the St. Lawrence River, Montreal, Quebec, and New York.

THE BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE OF CENTRAL Iowa Association are publishing a paper entitled, "B. Y. Organ." The introductory number carries a number of news items of the young people in the state. The subscription price is 35 cents per year.

MINNESOTA YOUNG PEOPLE have asked for the release of "Dick" Hoiland, their president, in order that he might devote his entire time to preparation for the assembly which meets at Mound on Lake Minnetonka.

NORTHEASTERN OHIO YOUNG PEOPLE'S Convention was held at First Church, Akron, Apr. 13-15. Dr. George Platte Knox and Rev. C. M. Eddy of Denison were among the speakers.

CALIFORNIA-NEVADA VOLUNTEERS have just sent out the Broadcaster giving news about the young people who are planning to enter some form of Christian service. It is indeed a newsy sheet and the plan is to be heartily commended.

National Essay Contest

The American Legion is promoting an essay contest among the boys and girls in our schools. The subject for discussion is "Why America Should Prevent Immigration for Five Years." The scholarship prizes are: First prize, $750; second prize, $500; third prize, $250. Information as to rules and regulations covering the contest may be secured from the National Americanism Commission of the American Legion, Indianapolis, Ind.

Preparation for Church Membership

After Decision Day, What?

Not all of those who come forward or sign cards on Decision Day are ready for church-membership. Some may be too immature and others not yet persuaded of their duty to be baptized and to unite with the church. Those who come from non-Christian homes are likely to have very vague ideas about the church and what it stands for. They all need instruction in what it means to be a Christian.

No man is admitted to membership in a fraternal order of any standing until he has been thoroughly instructed in the aims, ideals and history of the organization and learned some of its elaborate ritual. Membership in the Christian church is not hedged about with secrecy and ceremony, but is a great and solemn step whose seriousness every new member ought to feel. Too often in the past we have taken for granted the young Christian's knowledge of his duty and responsibility to the church.

Many pastors, realizing this, now make it a part of the year's work to gather together the Sunday-school scholars who have signed cards or otherwise shown an interest in the Christian life, and give them instruction in what it means to be a Christian and what is involved in church-membership.

The Pastor's Class

Name. This group is known by various names, such as the Pastor's Class, Young Disciples' Class, Young Converts' Class, Training-class for Church-membership.

Time. It should meet at some hour other than the regular Sunday-school hour, probably on a week-day at the close of the public-school session.

Members. Doctor Gilkey says, "Except in cases of unusual maturity I have advised children under twelve to wait another year before joining the class." On the other hand, many leaders urge that many children of nine or ten, brought up in a Christian home, understand the step they are taking and should be included in the class.

Leader. The pastor is the logical leader of this class but if for any reason he cannot do it, the workers' conference should seek out some man or woman to whom can be entrusted this very important follow-up work without which the evangelistic effort is not complete. It may be that a teacher of a junior or intermediate class or the superintendent of the junior young people's society may prove to be the right leader.

Class Organization. It is very desirable to establish the class as a regular order in the minds of boys and girls, and to make them so heartily enjoy the class that they will ask for its repetition each year. It ought to include the boys and girls who have joined the church and can be made to feel a responsibility for their friends who are not Christians. These young Christians will be a great help in building up a loyalty to the class and in making its program interesting. The class ought to be more than a lecture or catechizing period. It ought to have its own social life and spirit of service. Use the same name each year so that it comes to have a definite meaning for all, and carries its own loyalties. Have some one write a class song set to a hymn tune that youngsters enjoy singing. Always have a delightful social occasion, which may be called the pastor's party or the pastor's picnic. Above all make the regular class sessions very earnest and important, with registered attendance, a sincere devotional spirit, a straightforward appeal to conscience, and dependence on the spirit of God.

The Course of Instruction

It is unwise to attempt too much in this class. The few simple truths concerning what it means to be a Christian, what helps there are for us in the Christian way, why and how we are baptized, and what church-membership means are the essentials for such a course. Better results are obtained by holding four to six meetings and keeping to this one purpose than by prolonging the time and trying to cover a wider range of Christian knowledge and experience.

If sufficient interest is shown the pastor may find among the older members of this class the nucleus for another group with whom he can go more thoroughly into Bible study or Christian doctrine. This class has the one specific purpose of preparing the group for that next step which should follow up Decision Day and conserve its results.—William H. Main in "Church School Objectives," Judson Press.

International Sunday School Lesson for July 22

JOHN THE APOSTLE

Lesson: Luke 9:49-56; John 19:25-27; I John 4:7-8.

Golden Text: I John 4:16.

Introductory

John the apostle was a brother of James and the son of Zebedee, a fisherman. His mother, Salome, was a sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Jesus gave to these brothers the name Boanerges, meaning Sons of Thunder. John is frequently referred to as "the disciple whom Jesus loved." The Gospel of John, the First, Second and Third Epistles of John and the Book of Revelation are accepted as the writing of John the Apostle.

The Lesson

The dispute concerning greatness follows the return to Capernaum from Caesarea Philippi. Jesus' answer to this, with a child in the midst, was "He that is least among you all, the same is great." "And John answered and said, Master, we saw one casting out demons in thy name; and we forbade him." But Jesus said unto him, "Forbid him not; for he that is not against you is for you." The time of Jesus' crucifixion was approaching and he kept moving on toward Jerusalem, this time choosing the way through hostile Samaria, rather than the more congenial way east of the Jordan. Because of the known hostility of the country he dispatched messengers ahead of him as they neared a Samaritan village to secure a lodging place. But they refused to receive him because he was on his way to Jerusalem. James and John in indignation demanded: "Lord, wilt thou that we bid fire to come down from heaven, and consume them?" He rebuked them and they proceeded to another village. The next scene is that of the crucifixion where Jesus commends his mother to John's care. The last verse in the lesson is the keynote to John's character "Let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is begotten of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love."

Leading Thoughts

1. "He that loveth not knoweth not God"—how then has a Christian room in his heart for a particle of hate? 2. Love increaseth apace by being given. 3. The surest way to acquaint men with God is to show to them the love of God in our lives; that is something they cannot refuse to believe in.

---

Rev. W. F. Bostick, pastor of the First Church, La Porte, Ind., has solved the problem of diminishing Sunday evening congregations during the summer. Through the courtesy of the county commissioners he is allowed to hold meetings on the court-house lawn. After a short service, pictures are shown on a screen placed on the wall of the court house. The slides are of a religious nature and have an evangelistic message. The titles of two are suggestive, "The Stream of Life" and "A Maker of Men." The service begins at eight o'clock and Mr. Bostick is thus able to reach the automobile tourists returning home. His congregation averages 1,000. The pictures have proved so successful that they will be continued through July. Mr. Bostick secures his slides from the Temple Picture Corporation and United Artists Corporation of Chicago. At present he is preaching a series of "baseball" sermons on the topics, "Striking at the High Ones," "The Sacrifice Hit," "Dying on Third," "Reaching Home," and "Bawling out the Umpire."

Our Own Folks

A Baptist Semi-Centennial in Japan

By Charles B. Tenny

Four missionaries, representatives of American Baptists, landed in Yokohama fifty years ago. They immediately organized the First Baptist Church of Yokohama. But it was composed entirely of westerners; two of the four retired from active connection with the Missionary Union before the end of that first year; none of them knew the language of the people, and there was no Japanese Bible. But other workers came, Japanese were won, and the work which began so quietly—some would say insignificantly—has grown beyond the faith of any of those who first boldly committed themselves to the venture.

The one little church with no Japanese member has multiplied, Japanese members have been added, until now it is a vigorous, self-directing organization, a younger sister to the Northern Baptist Convention. A wee English night school of 1873, without charter or regulations has become a splendid group of Baptist schools sending out hundreds imbued with the Christ ideal. Two missionary families penned away in a "concession," forbidden residence elsewhere, have given place to a leaven of Christianity that is touching Japanese life intimately in unnumbered ways. Local receipts have increased from nothing to 100,000 yen last year. Our first woman to receive baptism is still living and was on the platform at our recent celebration. Many still remember how the first converts came one by one. Last year our additions numbered 500. We had hoped that Mrs. Ashmore, who, like Mrs. Nathan Brown, was one of the founders of our Japanese work, might be with us in our jubilee; but she fell asleep a few weeks ago; not, however, until she had celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of her arrival in Japan.

Our mission meeting this year was held in connection with the meeting of the Japan Baptist Convention. Joint commemorative exercises were held. As we reviewed the past we found manifold reasons for thanksgiving and ground for new courage. We surveyed the existing situation and faced the future in the light of the historic developments. Already Japanese Baptists have accepted the responsibility for the evangelization of their own people. We, on our part, clearly recognize that the mission is now only an auxiliary agency. But our relations are most cordial, we understand each other, and press forward to a common goal. The aid of American Baptists will be sought for a long time to come; but it is a matter for profound thanksgiving that such significant advance has been made, that the future is so promising. American Baptists from Atlantic City saluted Japanese Baptists. We thank you. Japanese Baptists celebrating their semi-centennial in Tokyo, sent greetings and thanks to American Baptists. We are two conventions but own one Lord; we live in different hemispheres, but are all brethren looking and working and praying for the coming of one kingdom, the reign of our Christ over all the world.

Dan Schultz

By Coe Hayne

Dan Schultz, labor evangelist of the Home Mission Society, whose death at his home in Philadelphia, was noted recently, was pastor of the Lorenz Avenue Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., when the great Westmoreland County coal strike began. Reading of conditions existing among the miners he felt it his duty to find out whether the newspaper reports were true. He found men and women living in tents pitched along the roadside in the month of March. With the rain often wetting their household goods and their bedding, cold and dampness increased the suffering that hunger brought. At this time the United Mine Workers of America were extending aid to the extent of about $2.50 per family, per week. The women and children for the most part were poorly clad, some of them being without shoes or stockings.

After viewing the field for one week, Dan Schultz returned to his church, told of the conditions found among the striking miners, and requested clothing. The church gave him the privilege of using all the time necessary to aid these people. He began to solicit clothing, shoes, food and money in different parts of the state, returning at frequent intervals to distribute the goods received.

During this period, the United Mine Workers of America made him chaplain of the convention, and nearly every local union in Pennsylvania pledged itself to assist him in supplying the needs of the strike sufferers. During this time it was Dan Schultz's privilege to speak to large congregations of men, women and children of different nationalities, concerning the church and its attitude toward the working man.

DAN SCHULTZ

On one Sunday afternoon he addressed over 9,000 miners and their wives and children, through interpreters. Among them were Slavs, Russians, Italians, Croatians, Hungarians, Poles, Lithuanians, Serbians, Scotch, Germans, Austrians, Bohemians and Roumanians. He spoke to these people on the subject of God's wonderful love to the children of men. It was the first time that many of them had heard this story. A prominent Catholic labor leader, who had introduced him at the beginning of the service, said, "It is my privilege to introduce a brother of Jesus Christ, who has proved himself thus by his work and sacrifice for our folks. Whatever Father Schultz tells us we believe, for we have confidence in him and his message."

During fourteen months Dan Schultz and his helpers collected and distributed over ninety tons of clothing, 38,000 pairs of new shoes, over $27,000 in checks and money. Contributions came from capitalists as well as from labor unions, socialistic organizations and churches. Just before the strike ended, a number of leaders of the American Federation of Labor met in the city of Pittsburgh for a conference. After passing a number of resolutions thanking the church of which Dan Schultz was pastor and also the denomination to which he belonged for the loyal support in the movement to supply the needs of the strikers, they passed a resolution requesting the Baptist denomination to call Dan Schultz out of the pastorate to devote his time entirely to the working classes of the United States. On Jan. 1, 1911, he began his remarkable ministry among them, working in coal fields, shops and factories of all kinds, preaching the gospel and living it. His work gradually broadened until at his death he was recognized as the field labor representative of the American Baptist Home Mission Society.

Wisconsin News and Notes

By Robert W. Shaw

Forward Move at Racine

Racine, a city of some 60,000, has four churches. The First Church with Rev. E. R. Hyde, pastor, has more than 650 members; Grace, formerly the First German, with Rev. H. F. Hoops, pastor, has about 225 members; and the Temple, formerly the Norwegian, has 150 members. Rev. A. N. Sorenson is the pastor. Besides these, we have a prosperous Italian Church of some 60 members which Rev. D. Raffone is leading.

On June 13, 225 members of these four churches met at a dinner given by Mr. W. F. Hilker at the Grace Church, and formed a city union or missionary organization for more effectively carrying on the work in Racine and its environs. Besides several of the local pastors who spoke, Dr. A. LeGrand, state superintendent, and Dr. D. W. Hulburt, who has charge of the work in cities in the state, also addressed the gathering. A committee has been appointed to draw up the constitution and by-laws and to set forth a plan of work for the newly organized body.

Changes in Associations

For some years the associations in Wisconsin have not been as conveniently bounded as they might have been. This has been due to the fact that formerly they were arranged according to railroad facilities, while now most people come by automobile. Last fall the state convention elected a committee to study the rearrangement of these bodies, and this summer the associations themselves are voting on the question. The plan eliminates the Dodge Association and creates the Green Bay, the Barron, and the North Central as new associations. The hope is that the foreign-speaking groups will gradually join these newly arranged bodies so that we may have strong associations in this state.

Some Notes

Rev. W. D. Wells has resigned his work at Sheboygan to take effect the last of August. Brother Wells has been in this state many years and is beloved by all. He has purchased a home in Sheboygan and will be available for supply work as far as his strength will permit.

The West Allis Church is contemplating beginning the building which it has had in mind for several years. It recently sold the parsonage property and will erect a new home for the minister on one of its large lots. During Pastor McMillan's stay with them, beginning about February 1, nearly thirty members have been received, most of whom have come by baptism.

Miss Maimie Passolt, missionary for the South Side Christian Center in this city, recently spent a week in Nebraska where she represented the work of the Woman's Home Mission Society before some of the churches in that state. She reports an interesting time.

Rev. W. C. Osburn, of Bangor, was recently married. The bride is a member of the Eau Claire Church.

Rev. George C. Alborn and his wife are celebrating their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary, and the Wauwatosa Church has sent them away for a couple of weeks' visit to the scenes of their youth in Michigan.

Vacation schools are on now in full blast. There is a large increase over last year in the number of schools in the state. There will be seven held in Milwaukee, out of twelve churches.

MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. William H. Rafferty of the graduating class of Newton Theological Institution was ordained June 19 at the Newton Center Church. Rev. F. B. Greul of Brookline was moderator, and Rev. A. J. Hughes of Needham, clerk. Delegates were present from the churches of the Boston West Association. Mr. Rafferty has been called to the pastorate of the church at Gardner and will begin work in the immediate future.

The summer supplies of the First Church, Cambridge, of which Rev. William D. Goble is pastor, are Rev. Walter E. Tanner, Rev. L. L. Henson, Rev. H. B. Williams, Rev. E. E. Powell, Rev. George Adams and Rev. C. P. MacGregor.

Since the beginning of the pastorate of Rev. Charles D. Piper, Nov. 3, 1922, there have been fifty-two additions to the membership of the Fifth Street Church, Lowell. The resident membership has been increased 30 per cent. As a result of the stewardship campaign and activities, 43 per cent of the resident membership are tithers. The outlook for the work is promising.

MAINE

The church at Harmony feels the loss of Deacon William G. Bailey, selectman of the town and member of the state senate. His ability was always at the service of the church and his wealth was administered as a Christian steward. A daughter and two sons survive him.

NEW YORK

During July and August this year, the following ministers will supply the Baptist Temple, Rochester: Dr. A. Ray Petty, Dr. John M. Moore, Rev. T. J. Bolger, Dr. Samuel Grafflin, Col. John T. Axton, Dr. C. Wallace Petty and Prof. Justin N. Nixon.

Rev. Franklin D. Elmer, pastor of the First Church, Hamilton, and his wife have started on an extended auto trip through the West for a study of American natural and social resources and conditions. They will visit plants of the coal, steel and lumber industries, agricultural section, educational institutions and churches. The trip will cover about 5,000 miles.

The Washington Heights Church, New York City, Rev. Harold Pattison, pastor, is looking forward to the celebration of its hundredth anniversary on Oct. 3. On the evening of that day there will be a banquet and many former members living in other cities are expected to return for that occasion. On Oct. 7 special anniversary services will be held morning and evening. Union summer services will be held with the Hamilton Grange Reformed Church. During the year there has been a steady increase in the membership by letter and baptism. A church visitor has been engaged. This year a Sunday evening forum service, patterned after the Ford meetings in Boston, was introduced. The popularity of these services has resulted in the plan to continue them during the coming year.

The Reformed Church of Harlem, the Mt. Morris Church and St. James Methodist Church of New York City will hold union summer services. The speakers will be Rev. A. A. Pfanstiehl of New York City, Rev. J. W. R. Sumwalt of Baltimore, and Rev. William C. Bitting of the Second Church, St. Louis.

Colgate Commencement

The commencement season at Colgate was characterized by favorable weather, a large attendance of alumni and friends, and much enthusiasm. President Cutten delivered his first baccalaureate sermon at Colgate University on Sunday morning, June 17. His subject was, "Equipment and Personality, its Inequality and Responsibility." The treatment was based upon the parable of the talents, Matt. 25:14-30. The general course of thought in this inspiring address was the essential inequality of mankind in ability, capacity, and opportunity.

The annual sermon before the theological seminary and the Baptist Education Society was preached on Sunday evening by Dr. Albert B. Cohoe, of Montclair, N. J., from the words of John 17:21: "That they may all be one." The speaker discussed the possibility of the union of Christians, not in reference to the old divisions into denominations but with a view to the division which at the present time often seems so wide and deep between the so-called conservatives and liberals. The presentation was unusually stimulating, having clearness of thought, breadth of outlook, sympathetic appreciation of the mental attitudes of men of diverse types, and devotion to Christ and his ideals.

The seminary day exercises were held on Monday morning. Excellent addresses were given by two members of the senior class; by Mr. J. B. Freestone on, "The Privilege Supreme," and by Mr. S. H. Miller on, "The Perpetual Benediction." The farewell address to the graduating class was given by Dean Vichert on, "The Topmost Note." The duty and privilege of accomplishing the work of the ministry on a high plane were presented.

Mr. F. J. Fitch, as a representative of the Eaton Hall Fellowship, presented some gifts to Dean Vichert as an expression of the regard of the students. He expressed the feeling of the student body and of all the friends of the seminary concerning the departure of Dean Vichert after eight years of self-sacrificing labor as dean and professor. This feeling was of deep regret, together with an appreciation of the high and permanent value of his contribution to the life of the seminary.

The commencement address on Tuesday morning was delivered by Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, well-known New York financier and recipient of the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from Colgate in 1911. His subject was, "The World We Live In." The opinion was expressed that the new world confronting the graduates of today will be found to differ in important respects from that which has gone before.

The number of degrees conferred at this commencement was the largest in the history of the university. There were 140 degrees in course. There was also one graduate from the seminary with certificate, and one graduate from the Italian department. Honorary degrees were conferred as follows: Walter Concemore Cramp, New York, D. Sc.; Thomas Cramer Hopkins, professor of geology in Syracuse University, D. Sc.; Charles Estill Dickerson, principal of Northfield Seminary, Lit. D.; Hobart George Truesdell, head master of Suffield School, Lit. D.; Wilbur Theodore Elmore, Lincoln, Neb., D. D.; Albert Henry Gage, director of religious education, Chicago, Ill., D. D.

The announcement was made during commencement that the vacancy in the chair of systematic theology in the seminary, caused by the resignation of Dean Vichert, had been filled by the transfer of Professor Anderson from the chair of New Testament interpretation. It was also stated that Prof. Thomas Wearing, principal of Woodstock College, Woodstock, Can., has been elected to the chair of New Testament interpretation, to assume his duties next fall.

The wise administration of President Cutten during the past year has had a most inspiring effect upon both college and seminary. The future, under his leadership, appears full of promise.

NEW JERSEY

THE NORTH ORANGE CHURCH, Orange, will be represented by five delegates at the World Alliance. On May 23, Rev. and Mrs. Richard J. Inkc sailed for Brazil where they will do missionary work and teach in the Rio College. The church now has six members in the missionary field, and in addition supports Steve, the missionary interpreter to the Hopi Indians. Sunday, June 10, the Sunday school observed floral anniversary. At this service, cut flowers and plants were sent by trucks to the neglected people at the hospitals and homes of New York City. This marked the sixty-sixth anniversary of the founding of the Sunday school. The school has had but two superintendents during that time. The board of deacons has arranged for the following supplies during the summer: Dr. Peter C. Wright, Dr. Clarence M. Gallup, Mr. Ralph C. Walker, Dr. A. Ray Petty, Dr. James McGee and Rev. A. A. Shaw.

ON RECOMMENDATION OF THE COMMITTEE on ordination of the West New Jersey Association, a conference was called June 19 at the Roadstown Church for the purpose of examining Harry F. Snyder of Vineland who has accepted a call to the Dividing Creek Church, and of Omar P. Goslin of Wildwood who has been called to be student pastor of Leland Stanford University of California. Mr. Snyder's ordination took place June 21. Rev. R. R. Thompson of Bridgeton preaching the sermon. The date of Mr. Goslin's ordination was not announced, but the preacher for the occasion will be Rev. Harold G. Phillips of Mt. Vernon. The evening session of the ministerial conference was made profitable by an address by Rev. C. W. Dannenbauer and by missionary John Dussman on furlough from India.

THE GOAL OF THE CHELSEA CHURCH, Rev. Thomas J. Cross, pastor, was reached at the last communion service when twelve new members were received, making a total of thirty-four since January. In recognition of the faithful work of Mr. Cross, the church is sending him as a delegate to the Stockholm meeting. He will also tour Palestine.

Peddie Commencement

Forty-five members of the class of 1923 received their diplomas from D. G. Garabrant, president of the board of corporators, at the fifty-seventh annual commencement exercises of Peddie school, held Monday afternoon, June 11, in the First Church of Hightstown. The exercises marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of the headmastership of Dr. R. W. Swetland. President Garabrant read resolutions in behalf of the board, eulogizing the administration which has witnessed such remarkable development in the life of the school. At the annual luncheon, held in Wilson Hall dining room, the graduates of the school presented Headmaster and Mrs. Swetland with a silver service and announced the establishment of a prize or scholarship fund in honor of the present head of the school. Hon. James A. Hamilton, '94, Secretary of State of New York, was elected president of the alumni body for the ensuing year.

At the commencement exercises, orations were delivered by William Homer Thompson, of Hightstown; Stuart Frary Arnold, of Hasbrouck Heights; and Lee Sneed Montgomery, of Sedalia, Mo., members of the graduating class. The commencement address was delivered by the Rev. A. Ray Petty, of New York City. Following the exercises, Headmaster and Mrs. Swetland tendered a reception to the students, alumni and friends of the school in their home.

Five new members were initiated into the Cum Laude Society, an honorary scholarship organization. Assistant headmaster, R. H. Rivenburg, who leaves Peddie next fall to become Dean of Bucknell University, and Secretary Starr G. Cooper presided over these exercises.

Prizes and scholarships were awarded by Headmaster Swetland as follows: New World Movement scholarships, Edwin F. Pierce and Richard Madden; junior declamation prizes, Harry Muecke and Edwin Forkin; Middlers public speaking prizes, Robert Breen and Henry Miller; Martha St. John lower school prizes, Harry Spaight and George Cilley; first year Latin prize, Harold Rue; Rogers music prize, Harold Rue; geometry prize, Robert Preston; Rennselaer polytechnic medal, Stewart F. Carter; Winters prize orations, Henry Miller, Stuart F. Arnold and Hugh R. Hamilton; Bushell prize, Dwight M. Bahr; Wyckoff honor prize, Stuart F. Arnold.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

REV. A. W. ANDERSON, pastor of the First Church of Easton, has been elected commandant of the state Soldier's and Sailor's Home at Erie. This appointment, with rank of captain, has been confirmed by Governor Pinchot. He is expected to take charge immediately.

PASTOR A. A. COBER of the Memorial Church, Williamsport, has gone to the First Church, Jeannette.

REV. E. C. BRUSH, of the Jefferson Church has accepted a call to the North Main Avenue Church, Scranton, and will begin his new pastorate, Aug. 1.

THE HARRISBURG ASSOCIATION was entertained by the First Church, Lebanon, June 5-6. Rev. J. W. Bradbury was elected moderator. A resolution was passed pledging every possible effort in meeting pledges to the New World Movement this year.

REV. C. C. WALKER was reelected moderator of the Bridgewater Association, at its meeting at Forest Lake, June 19-21. Every church but one was represented, and a fine spirit prevailed.

REV. NELSON K. CROSSMAN, has returned to the pastorate after serving two years as field secretary of the Chester County Sabbath School Association. He began his work with the Mount Pleasant Church, Ambler, on June 1.

REV. N. JOHNSTONE has resigned at Troy, to become pastor at Ulysses.

Bucknell University Commencement

The first week-end commencement ever held at Bucknell University ended with the commencement exercises Monday morning, June 11, closing four days of crowded activities. A class of 170 candidates was awarded degrees, eighty-seven in arts, sixty-two in engineering, one in biology and in home economics. Seven honorary degrees were conferred.

The outstanding event of the exercises was the baccalaureate sermon delivered Sunday morning by Pres. Emory Hunt in the newly reopened auditorium of the Baptist church. President Hunt chose as his topic, "The Divinity of Service" and impressed upon the graduates the great truth that the Christian life must center about self-sacrificing devotion to Christ's command to serve.

The exercises on Monday morning were distinguished by several striking features. Pres. John Hope, of Morehouse College, was presented for the degree of Doctor of Laws in appreciation of his service to the cause of progress as a leader of the negro race. James Simmons Swartz of New York City, was awarded the Doctor of Laws degree in recognition of his service in education and the business world. Mr. Swartz, who for forty years has been a member of the board of trustees, and for many years its chairman, has given liberally of his thought and material wealth to the college. The degree was conferred in his absence, because he was ill. Charles Way Harvey, of the class of 1900, was made a Doctor of Divinity in recognition of his work in China, where he has served for twenty years as secretary of the International Y. M. C. A.

Immediately after receiving his degree, Doctor Harvey presented the name of Charles Scull Keen, of the class of 1899, also a pioneer in Christian work in China, for the same degree, to be awarded posthumously. Mr. Keen had been selected by the trustees and faculty for this degree, but shortly before the commencement period word had been received of his unexpected death from typhoid at Shanghai, where he had been located since 1912 at the head of the school of languages, an institution which he had been instrumental in founding, and in which he had contributed notably to the simplification of the instruction in Chinese.

Harold Newton Cole, of Cleveland, O., of the class of 1906, was made a Doctor of Science in recognition of his contribution to medical science. Doctor Cole is associate professor of dermatology at Western Reserve, and is generally conceded to be one of the greatest specialists in his line in America. Adam Martin Wyant, an alumnus of Bucknell and the University of Chicago, was awarded the degree of Doctor of Laws. Mr. Wyant, whose home is at Greensburg, is a leading attorney of western Pennsylvania, and member of Congress from the thirty-first Pennsylvania district. The same degree was conferred upon Charles Bobb Witmer of Sunbury, federal judge of the middle Pennsylvania district.

Several interesting announcements were made at the commencement exercises. Two new prizes, the Decker prizes established by Oliver J. Decker of the board of trustees, to be awarded to the one attaining the highest scholastic standing for the four year course in arts, biology and home economics, and for the one attaining the highest standing in the engineering courses, were won by Frank W. Summerfield of Philadelphia and by Clair Halligan of Ephrata. The distinction of being graduated with highest honor was gained by members of the class for the first time in three years, four women and one man winning this coveted honor.

John T. Shirley, who headed the recent $500,000 stadium-gymnasium drive, and to whose business acumen and tact its success is largely due, was elected a member of the board of trustees. Mr. Shirley, who was a member of the class of 1909, is a business man residing in Pittsburgh.

A gift of land, valued at from $40,000 to $100,000, from President Swartz of the board of trustees, was also announced. The alumni association took a forward step in appointing a conference committee to take up with similar committees of the board of trustees and of the stadium commission, the appointment of a full-time alumni secretary.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

Rev. George E. Dawkins of Royal Oak, Mich., has accepted the unanimous call of the Bellevue Church and will begin his new work this month.

Rev. G. Morton Walker, pastor of the First Church, Meadville, recently received the degree of Master of Theology from Crozer Seminary. He has been elected president of the Union Ministerial Association for the ensuing year. During June four candidates were baptized. Rev. J. E. Creil, the church's missionary to the Congo, will be the summer supply.

DELAWARE

Dover: Pastor Charles A. Walker, while at the Atlantic City convention, was advised that during his absence the church had voted him a substantial increase in salary. Beside his wife and daughter, four members of the congregation attended the convention, one of whom was Rev. W. F. Stewart of Viola, for nearly twenty years a colporter of the Home Mission and Publication Societies. The work in Dover is prospering.

ILLINOIS

Rev. H. T. Duff of Flora will attend the World Alliance and will visit his parents in Ireland.

The Roodhouse Church, Rev. J. S. Brinkman, pastor, conducted a successful daily vacation school. The enrolment was 158 and the average attendance, 136.

Rev. J. W. Patterson of Alhambra has become pastor of the Hartford Church.

Rev. W. E. Stillson of Galena, Kan., has recently settled as pastor of the church at Troy.

The Ashland Church has called Rev. Minor Goodsell who recently graduated from Shurtleff College.

Belvidere: The accrediting of Rev. J. L. Marks as pastor of the South Church was recognized by a council which recently met at the church. Forty delegates were present. Rev. E. A. Gilmore of DeKalb was moderator, and Rev. F. G. Sayers of Freeport, clerk.

The First Church, Kankakee, recently closed a successful campaign to raise $50,000 for extensive improvements in its Sunday-school equipment. Dr. Myron W. Haynes conducted the campaign. Rev. Herbert Hines is pastor.

A council met June 21 at the LeMoille Church for the purpose of ordaining Herman D. Sorg. There were twenty-five delegates and pastors present from the churches of the Ottawa Association. Rev. Jacob Heinrich of the Northern Seminary, Chicago, preached the ordination sermon. Mr. Sorg recently graduated from the Northern Seminary and is under appointment by the Foreign Mission Society. He expects to sail for India with his wife in September.

Shurtleff College Commencement

Shurtleff, the pioneer college, celebrated its ninety-sixth anniversary on June 14. Many of the old students were back to honor it. On the evening of the 7, the public speaking department gave a dramatical recital. The conservatory of music held its recital on the evening of the 8.

Pres. George M. Potter delivered the commencement address on Sunday morning. He spoke on the theme, "Ye are the salt of the earth." His address was practical and full of inspiration. The unique feature of Wednesday was the annual spring festival given by the women of the college under the direction of Mrs. Wood. The alumni and many friends of the college attended the alumni banquet on Wednesday evening. Loyal Shurtleff alumni are returning in increasing numbers as their alma mater is nearing its centennial celebration.

The baccalaureate address was delivered by Rev. Charles Durden, pastor of the First Church of Galesburg. His subject was, "The Knights of the Open Road." Doctor Durden is a pleasing and forceful speaker. He led his audience into the great highway of life and left each one with the resolve to live a life of service.

Numerous prizes were awarded. The college honored two of its worthy sons. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon Rev. H. Q. Morton, class of 1903, superintendent of state missions of Arizona, and Rev. R. W. Hobbs, class of 1894, pastor of the First church of Lansing, Mich.

It was a great disappointment to President Potter and the board of trustees not to be able to dedicate the new women's building at this time. Delay in the delivery of material made it impossible for the contractor to have the building completed in time. The dedication will take place at the opening of school next fall.

OHIO

The Tenth Avenue Church, Columbus, Ohio, from which Dr. Vernon S. Phillips resigned last October, is still looking for a pastor. There is no dearth of applications, but it is a question of the right man for the place. Dr. H. O. Rowlands has been serving as pastor pro tem most acceptably for the past seven months.

MICHIGAN

Rev. John Estes recently began his sixth year as pastor of the First Church, Muskegon. During his pastorate, 210 new members have been added to the enrolment. Of this number, 112 were received by baptism. The contributions to benevolences have increased from $300 to an average of $1,000 for the past five years, and the budget for local work has been trebled. The pastor and congregation are looking forward to further advancement in the work.

After a pastorate of eight years with the First Church, Bay City, Rev. Frederick Allen resigned May 1 to accept the unanimous call to the pastorate of the Fifth Avenue Church, Troy, N. Y. Mr. Allen leaves the First Church in a prosperous condition. The congregation recently voted to spend $10,000 improving the edifice. The churches of Bay City united in a farewell service held in the First Presbyterian Church. Mr. Allen was recently honored by the University of Atlanta with the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Following the usual custom, the First and Fifth Avenue churches will unite for the summer. Among the supplies thus far announced are Drs. T. Sprague, A. T. Brooks, E. Scott Farley, E. R. Allen, A. Ray Petty and R. A. Ashworth.

The membership of the Beulah, Church, Detroit, has been growing rapidly. There have been ninety-eight additions during the six months of the pastorate of Rev. Herman Lang, making a total membership of 769. It is the goal of the church to have 1,000 members before 1925, though it is confidently expected that this objective will be reached by Jan. 1, 1924.

Kalamazoo College

Kalamazoo College held its sixty-ninth annual commencement on Wednesday, June 20. Fifty-four students graduated at that time. Mr. Merrill Curtis Hart, class of 1913, was given the honorary degree of Doctor of Science, and Charles MacCauley Stuart, president of Garrett Biblical Institute, class of 1880, was given the honorary degree of Doctor of the Humanities. Doctor Stuart also gave the commencement address on Wednesday morning. Over 200 attended the alumni banquet on Tuesday evening. President Hoben gave the principal address on that occasion. President emeritus Stetson presided at the commencement luncheon Wednesday following the exercises at the First Church. The baccalaureate service was held Sunday morning in the First Church, President Hoben delivering the sermon. All of the commencement functions were largely attended and there was a fine spirit shown.

This commencement marked the close of the first year of Doctor Hoben's administration as president and from every side it was evidenced that the record of the college in the past will be maintained and advanced under his capable leadership.

A few of the present faculty are leaving the institution: Dr. Lewis Thompson, of the department of physics, who is to be connected with the United States Government in the department of the Navy. Doctor Thompson, during the last few years, has been doing research work in the field of ballistics for the government while connected with the college. Coach Ralph H. Young of the department of athletics leaves Kalamazoo College to become head of the department of athletics of the Michigan Agricultural College at Lansing. Seven new members will be added to the faculty next year; among them Dr. Ernest B. Harper who will enter the department of education and psychology. Mr. Maynard Street will succeed Mr. Ralph Young in the department of athletics. He is a graduate of Carleton College, 1920, and has been in charge of athletics at the Shattuck Military Academy at Faribault, Minn. Mr. Thomas Vroegindeweij, a member of the senior class who has won a national reputation in the field of athletics during his student career, will be retained as assistant coach.

In the promotional department it was reported that in connection with the women's dormitory fund, the treasurer of the college holds $46,902.34. Unpaid pledges held by the business office amount to $12,155.91; unpaid pledges by churches reported to Miss Grant, $17,892.79; making a total of cash and pledges for the women's dormitory of $76,951.04. At the end of the college financial year, May 31, the endowment campaign stood as follows: cash in the hands of the treasurer, $78,130.93; unpaid pledges held by the business office, $138,808.29; making a total of cash and pledges of $216,939.22.

Registrations received thus far indicate that the college will have a student enrolment to a total of its capacity for the coming year. The academic and dormitory buildings are being cleaned and remodeled and the college is looking forward to a promising year. The next feature of importance to which the college is looking forward is the Michigan Baptist summer assembly to be held at the college July 27-Aug.5. Rev. Morgan Williams, state director of religious education, has prepared a strong program and anticipates a record breaking attendance.

KANSAS

A COUNCIL CONVENED AT THE FIRST Church, Parsons, June 19, to examine Albert H. Moore. W. G. Carey was moderator, and Walter E. Tanner, clerk. Rev. J. H. Hubbard preached the ordination sermon. Mr. Moore is doing special summer work under the state board of Tennessee.

AS THE RESULT OF SPECIAL MEETINGS held by Rev. R. H. Scise at the First Church, Kansas City, there were forty additions to the membership. Mr. and Mrs. John Imrie of Topeka conducted the song service. Rev. L. Bowerman is pastor.

AT THE REQUEST OF THE VALLEY CENTER Church, a council met June 18 to examine Leslie Henry Fisher. G. Garland Riggan was elected moderator, and P. W. Bryan, clerk. Rev. P. W. Bryan preached the ordination sermon. Mr. Fisher has for a number of years been a member of the Schuessler evangelistic party in which he rendered effective service.

IOWA

CONTRACTS HAVE BEEN LET for the new $75,000 meeting house of the First Church, Council Bluffs. Work began June 18. Rev. J. Frederic Catlin was elected president of the ministerial association for the coming year. He recently preached the baccalaureate sermon at the high school commencement of which class his son was a member.

Rocky Mountain States

IDAHO

REV. AMANDA PATEY recently accepted a call to supply the church at Wilder for the summer. She will be available for evangelistic services or the pastorate in the fall.

EASTERN WASHINGTON

DURING THE THREE YEARS THAT REV. CHAS. MCHARNESS has been pastor of the Liberty Park Church, Spokane, the church membership has been doubled, the Sunday-school attendance has increased 80 per cent and a Sunday-school building and recreational hall has been constructed. The church recently granted the pastor an extended vacation. He will visit Palestine, Egypt and the Mediterranean countries.

Pacific Coast

OREGON

THE VETERAN MISSIONARY, REV. W. E. WITTER, and his wife were present at the meeting of the Rogue River Association, held at the First Church, Grants Pass. Mr. Witter delivered several addresses on home mission work. He also spoke at Hugh, an outstation of the Grants Pass Church.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

SAN DIEGO: On June 17 a new Mexican chapel was dedicated under the auspices of the Mission Society. This is the fifth Mexican mission in San Diego and immediate vicinity carried on through the efforts of this society. Rev. Frank O. Belden, pastor of the White Temple, presided. Addresses were delivered by Rev. E. R. Brown, A. B. Apra, F. L. Blowers and L. P. Valentine. Services in this mission were begun about ten months ago. The cost of the building and lot was about $4,000, $1,000 of which was paid or pledged at the dedication.

Commencement at Redlands

The University of Redlands conferred degrees on thirty-three seniors Wednesday, June 20. Twenty-nine had completed the liberal arts course and four received the Bachelor of Music degree from the College of Fine Arts. In addition to the degrees conferred on the graduates, two honorary degrees were awarded. The University of Redlands has seldom given honorary degrees, believing that such recognition should be accorded only to men of extraordinary achievement. The degree of Doctor of Laws was awarded Burton B. Wilcox of Pasadena, and that of Doctor of Divinity to Rev. John Alexander Frye of Riga, Latvia. Doctor Wilcox has for more than thirty years been a leader in the activities of the Y. M. C. A. on the Pacific coast. For ten years he was state secretary for California and is now foreign secretary of the international committee. Doctor Frye is president of the Lettish Theological Seminary at Riga. He has translated the New Testament into the Lettish language and is regarded as the key man in Baptist work among the Letts. Dr. S. W. Cummings of the university, who is now making an evangelistic tour in the republic of Latvia, was authorized to confer the degree.

Friends of the University of Redlands agree that this has been the best year in the history of the institution. Pres. V. L. Duke announced the addition of three new members to the faculty, making possible an enlargement of the work offered in the departments of philosophy, education, economics and physical education. Two new buildings are to be ready in September; Melrose Hall, the new dormitory for men, and the second wing of the Fine Arts building. President Duke also announced that the General Education Board, commonly known as the Rockefeller Foundation, has offered the university $133,333 toward a $400,000 addition to the endowment fund. An arrangement has been made with Stanford University whereby a student may take three years of premedical work at Redlands and on the subsequent completion of one year in the medical school at Stanford receive the B. A. degree from the University of Redlands. This understanding also applies to the nursing course offered by the Lane Hospital affiliated with Stanford University and to the engineering courses at the California Institute of Technology at Pasadena.

Eleven members of the class of 1923 plan to enter the teaching profession. Three of the eight men in the class will enter the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary at Louisville, Ky.: Cecil Axworthy, who was recently licensed to preach by the First Church of Redlands, Jesse Smith and Fred Wight, who have also been licensed by Baptist churches. Other members of the class will do graduate work at Harvard University, Prince's School of Business at Boston, the University of California and the University of Washington.

The commencement exercises began Saturday evening, June 16. Rev. O. P. Gifford, known for his keen wit and telling aphorisms, preached the baccalaureate sermon on Sunday morning at the First Church. On Sunday evening Dr. Burton B. Wilcox delivered the address to the Christian associations. He convinced his hearers of the urgency of the present world task of Christianity.

On Tuesday evening the only formal social event of commencement week was held at Knoll Hall on the campus. This was the annual reception of President and Mrs. Duke to the friends of the graduating class and of the university. The attendance of many former students, of parents and friends of the graduates, of members of the board of trustees and especially of Dr. J. N. Field, made of the occasion a delightful reunion. In the receiving line with President and Mrs. Duke was Dr. David Starr Jordan, chancellor emeritus of Stanford University, who delivered the commencement address Wednesday morning.

The fourteenth commencement of the University of Redlands was held at the First Church at 10:30. Doctor Jordan spoke on the subject, "Is War Eternal?" He effectively disposed of the psychological, historical and biological arguments usually advanced in support of the theory that warfare is a necessary element in the development of the race. He pointed out the futility of war from every point of view and showed that the real progress of humanity has come about by the diffusion of intelligence and through the devotion of great men to the cause of Jesus Christ.

President Duke before conferring the degrees told of his experiences at the national capitol while enroute to the Northern Convention which had deepened his conviction that religion must play a vital part in the solution of public as well as personal problems.

The annual university luncheon immediately after the commencement exercises was attended by more than 150 alumni and friends of the graduates. Especially gratifying to the friends of the university were the remarks of Mr. George Gardner Brown, president of the student body. Speaking for the class of 1923, he said that the members of the class had in their four years of college learned to put first and foremost in their lives a determination to stand for the ideals of the Christian life.

Obituary

Albert Loughridge, LL.D., son of Poultney and Maria Mitchell Loughridge, was born June 12, 1845, in Mahaska County, Ia. After a brief illness he died at their home, 1433 Court Street, Salem, Ore., June 9. The funeral was held June 11, conducted by Revs. J. C. Tibbits and Ward Willis Long, who were assisted by the local G. A. R.

When 16, he enlisted in Company F, Fourth Iowa Cavalry, serving throughout the Civil War; entered Iowa State University 1867, graduating in 1871 with A. B. In 1899 his alma mater gave him honorary LL.D. In 1874 he married Elizabeth Griffith, who survives him. At that time he was Professor of Latin in Central College, Pella. In 1875 they went to India, finally opening a new station at Hanamaconda. Ill health necessitated his wife's return in 1881. He continued alone until 1885, as her health still forbade returning. In 1887, he accepted the chair of Latin in Iowa Teachers' College, Cedar Falls. Here he remained with distinction until 1898, when he became president of Bishop College, Marshall, Tex. In 1901, Mrs. Loughridge's health being improved, it was determined to return to India. But an attack of influenza unfitted her for service and she returned in 1904. In 1905 he took final leave of their chosen field. Since then he has taught two years in Des Moines College, and one year in Linfield College. For five years past, their home has been in Salem. His services were in demand for sermons, missionary and patriotic addresses. His convictions were clear and strong. He was a remarkable conversationalist, with a wide range of information made available by a splendid memory. He was cheerful, modest, unassuming, a wonderful friend, the most loyal and efficient layman I have known in my pastoral experience. "There is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel."

"I am enclosing some correspondence which Professor Soper of Evanston sent to me. I can think of no better way to cement the search for the data desired than to publish so much of this information as you will see fit to do in one of the early numbers of The Baptist."

Francis C. Stifler.

To Dr. Ned Soper,
Evanston, Ill.

Dear Friend:

I do not need to tell you that the writer is interested in Loo Choo, for you know that. However, at this time we are much stirred up over Doctor Bettleheim who was here in 1846-55.

I might cite you to Cary's "History of Christianity in Japan" and you can brush up on the man's work. However, we are all troubled because we know nothing of him after about 1855. True, some suggest that he went to Chicago and polished up his gospels, etc., and published same in Vienna in 1873, I think. But we can get nothing else. The Baptist folks say that he died poor in Chicago. They located this it seems when probing into early Baptist history. Why? Because Doctor Brown used B———'s translation. That is the connection.

Note, he was a Jew—a Hungarian Jew. His wife was English and that he had in Loo Choo two pretty daughters. Was he with the Episcopal folks? Who could have been in America—in Chicago—to aid him in Japanese when the Iwakura Embassy went in 1872? (Arrived in 'Frisco, Jan. 15, '72.) Note the Embassy handed Mayor Medill of Chicago the sum of $5,000 as a contribution to the sufferers of the great fire of 1871.

What I would like to get is a short sketch of his late life, telling where he is buried (—and why not try for a print of his grave?) and of his labors in America. Some suggest that he did considerable appealing for his work in Loo Choo. Your large library will give you other facts and suggest some ways of inquiry. I do not know of any Jewish organization in Chicago in those days, possibly you do. We know that Liggins and McWilliams came to this land first, but some Japanese say Bettleheim was the first Protestant missionary to come to what is known as "Japan" of this generation. He came seventy-seven years ago and we plan a big eightieth anniversary dendo movement in his honor.

Yet, as shows, we lack some needed facts. Can you help us?

Missionary of M. E. Church.

to Sunday school. One Polish girl was baptized Easter Sunday, a tribute to almost three years of constant service of one of the volunteer workers. Three Italian girls have made decisions and plan to be baptized in the near future. The success in this church has been due in a large measure to the faithfulness of the volunteers, their vision and initiative.

Around the supper table at the Oak Park church on Thursday evening are gathered from twenty to thirty young women who have come to America during the past two years from the Central European countries. The women of the church have helped in making these newcomers feel at home. Besides these monthly suppers, a number of the homes of the church members are open to these girls, where they are welcomed for a social hour and a cup of tea. Bibles have been given to each one and regular instructions. Many attend the regular church services. The influence of Bible reading has been far reaching. Several have sent Bibles to their homes in the old country. One young woman has written to her brother, a university student, to look up the Baptist church in Vienna, and has urged him to attend. One of these New Americans was baptized into the church on Easter Sunday, four others have made decisions for Christ and several asked for prayers. At a recent meeting, these girls contributed $30 toward Baptist mission work. The majority of these young women (if not all of them), will be a credit to our country and an honor to the Master because the members of the Oak Park German church have held out a hand to them in Christian friendliness, as Christians and American citizens. Surely "he that turneth from the road to rescue another, turneth toward his goal, and shall arrive in time by the footpath of mercy; God will be his guide."

The helpers are only representative of the whole "tribe"—more than 188 women and young women in thirty of the Baptist churches in Chicago and vicinity, traveling up and down the streets of the city, with its 800,000 foreign born and more than a million more of foreign parentage, in an earnest effort to interpret Christ and America.

Learn to Live, Straight Talks, by Daniel A. Poling. New York: Fleming H. Revell. $1.50.

"The Patience Of the Strong;" "A Man's Fight" and "The Price Of Peace" are some of the sixteen different subjects carefully treated in this book. Doctor Poling writes as he talks—straight from the shoulder, yet with that bright and cheery presentation of principles which avoids the dogmatic. In a most remarkable manner he has been able to inject his own personality into this work thus making his splendid practical Christian ideals living issues to the reader.

Chronology of the Bible, by Philip Mauro. New York: Doran.

A volume of useful information about the Bible, for there is congested into it what can be found in parts and fragments in Bible helps of various kinds. If by "chronology" the author means the sequence of events in Bible contents with dates as incidental only according to the custom of Hebrew writers in marking time we agree with him that Bible chronology is a record of the revelation of "vital truth concerning the divine purpose", but if he means the "Asher Chronology" with a few emendations, then we demur to the inspirational sacredness of the Asher arithmetic. Very few indeed will accept Mr. Mauro's antedeluvian chronology and the immediate post-deluvian calendar of time. However, notwithstanding the dimness of those records of years they are convenient in fixing the sequence of mountain-peak events in the history of the human race. The possessor of this book will find a most convenient and helpful vade mecum in studying Bible times and history; doubtless from the establishment of the Hebrew monarchy the chronological records are fairly reliable.

What It Means to Be a Christian, by Edward Increase Bosworth. Boston: Pilgrim Press. $1.25.

This book states the vital truths of Christianity in the untechnical language of every-day life. Here the essence of the historic evangelistic message is translated into simple speech for the man of today. The author has succeeded in putting these truths in a form that will make the way to the Christian life clear and urgent. Professor Bosworth has been the New Testament professor in the Oberlin Graduate School of Theology for over thirty years, and dean during the past twenty years.

He Opened to Us the Scriptures, by Benjamin W. Bacon. New York: Macmillan.

To those who desire to know the spirit of the progressive or modernistic school of theolgy, which, while novel in its treatment of inspiration, holds on to the central principle of divine inbreathing, here is a book informing and illuminating. The author freely says, "The New Testament supplies not the finished product but the ferment out of which must come the next great secular development of religion, the advance from letter to spirit." It is the human response to divine inspiration that is here dwelt upon and "private interpretation," which is regarded as narrow and merely textual, that is sought to be avoided. God's ever-living voice to the changing world in scripture is the conception of the author. His treatment is at least worthy of discriminating consideration.

OUR MUSIC CORNER

CONDUCTED BY WILLIAM LESTER

THE ORGAN

I happened to attend a recital given in a small but famous church in New York. There was presented with flawless technique, and registration almost impeccable in taste, a program which did not include a single number that could be denied positive musical value, and yet scarcely fifty people were present and none of these I think, members of the musical profession. At the end I was impelled to recall a recital given two or three years ago by one of the most celebrated pianists of the day and I came to the conclusion that to a mind wholly untrammeled by tradition and fashion, the one recital was, save in one point, as wholly satisfying an artistic achievement as the other. The programs were much on a par in musical interest. Loyalty to the composer—finish in detail of every kind—but above all the absence of spontaneity and the presence of great premeditation (almost inseparable, in the nature of things, from high class organ playing) were equally in evidence in both performances. Yet the pianist played to a huge audience which at the conclusion gave him quite an ovation, while the organist quietly retired into oblivion after a little chat with a few friends present on the occasion. Of course it is only fair to say that the pianist on this occasion was not at his best, but the gist of the matter lies in the fact that the lack of spontaneous expression which has always been a prima facie object of adverse criticism in the case of organ playing can, and often is, tolerated where a pianist is concerned.

Now this, while only an isolated instance, suggests to me that the musician's general indifference to the organ is not due merely to the lack of spontaneous expression inevitably associated with the instrument, nor to the nature of the programs presented, but also to another and more subtle factor, namely the absence of individuality among organists, engendered for the most part by the necessarily mechanical nature of the instrument. It is hardly too much to say that a pianist of slight personality cannot conceal thase salient points in his make-up that differentiate him from others, while on the other hand an organist of very marked personality in daily life rarely succeeds in impressing his personality on his instrument. In other words the musician in other fields misses here the personal intimate touch that he is accustomed to in the reading of works for other instruments, and for this reason (perhaps unconsciously) more than any other, ignores and I fear may continue to ignore, the more ideal type of organ recital. In my opinion much could legitimately be done by the progressive organist of today to give to his instrument more of human interest and appeal by depending more on touch and rubato and less on registration as his means of expression, but unfortunately this is made more difficult as time goes on by the ever increasing elaboration and complexity of the modern instrument.

A very important subject remains for discussion—the scope of organ literature. Now most musicians are aware certainly in a general way of the value and significance of Bach's contributions to the instrument, but how many realize that in several of his sonatas Mendelssohn sounded intellectual and emotional depths never attained in the rest of his music, and that Ceasar Frank has given to the organ some of his best and most characteristic music, to say nothing of the high quality of certain works by composers of lesser calibre, such as Widor, Vierne and Karg-Elert.

The church however, if true to its traditions, cannot afford the necessary scope for the rendition of most of this music. Much indeed even of Bach's work is eminently secular in character and fitted only for the concert hall and yet, as has been said, it is essentially in the concert hall that the musician considers the organ an unwelcome intruder. This surely is a matter for grave consideration. The genuine musical enthusiast cannot logically persist in his ostracism of an instrument which has been deemed a worthy medium of expression by such composers as we have alluded to and so remain in ignorance of masterpieces that would powerfully appeal to his aesthetic sense, once given a hearing.—Harold D. Phillips in Musical America.

The remarkably beneficial effects of regular indulgence in singing by nervous patients was remarked by M. Frossart of the Sorbonne at a recent lecture at the Academy of Sciences. Aliments as various as insomnia, heart, lung, and stomach troubles, says a copyright wireless dispatch to the New York Times, are benefitted by song. Singing, according to M. Frossart, entails deep breathing and has the effect of regularizing the functioning of the sympathetic nerves.

A celebrated organist recently brought up an odd point about organists. He said many performers "fall in love" with certain combinations of their instruments and work them to death to the almost total neglect of many other effective stops.

Girolamo Frescobaldi, born at Ferrara in 1583, was the leading organist of the Italy of his day. It was he who discarded the real for the tonal fugue, and revived effective double counterpoint. His pieces abound in technical difficulties, but they are subordinated to a firm general conception. His style often has unique energy and even impetuosity, betokening a consummate mastery of his material.

Everywhere in history we read of Hayden's singularly sunny and lovable personality. He was honorable and manly, and possessed all of the virtues which usually go with these attributes. Having gained his own eminence by hard work, he always demanded a full measure of effort ffom his assistants. The soubriquet "Papa," bestowed upon him in his later years, bespeaks the reverence he inspired. At his death he was found the owner of a respectable fortune, which was carefully bequeathed to relatives and to many persons who had been kind to him.

What have you done for your church

FROM the dawn of history—down through the ages—no events stand forth in greater significance than the sufferings and tribulations of the early Christian Martyrs. Deeply engraved in the memory of man, their lives live after them.

Great events of the present day record the sacrifices of many men and women who have consecrated their lives to the moral and spiritual structure of the world, through the development and extension of the Christian faith.

Contributing to the greatness of their memory, and that their sacrifices may not have been in vain, many public spirited men and women, in fulfilling their debt of devotion, have been instrumental in placing in their churches a set of Deagan Tower Chimes, whose golden voices will live throughout the years to come, a fitting and enduring tribute of melody and sweet remembrance.

Ways and means by which the installation of Deagan Tower Chimes may be effected will be furnished interested, responsible inquirers upon request.

At the invitation of the secretary of war, a conference on religious and moral training for soldiers was held in Washington, D. C., June 6-8. On June 7, the committee on army and navy chaplains held an important meeting. This is the first time in recent history that the war department has called in a large body of representative clergymen for counsel in magnifying the place of religion in the army. General Pershing was one of the speakers.

The First Church, Hollywood, has undertaken the support of a missionary, Miss Beryl Snell. The matter was taken up with the Women's Foreign Society which gratefully accepted the offer as it was unable to appoint her because of lack of funds. Miss Snell was appointed by the society with the understanding that the church will provide the expenses for her designation to West China for six years. The cost for the first year will be $1,900 after which the only cost will be the salary until the sixth year when the return passage will be due. Miss Snell will sail September 6. The church has entered enthusiastically into the plan and a substantial amount of the necessary sum has been pledged.

Until recently the public schools in Sweden were charged with the responsibility of looking after the religious education of youth. Now this work is gradually being undertaken by the churches. Mr. Birger E. Hammaren, a young Swedish architect who has been connected with the department of architecture of the Home Mission Society, will be in Stockholm at the time of the meeting of the alliance and will handle the church school architectural exhibits of the Northern and Southern conventions. He will label the drawings and photographs in Swedish and German in addition to their titles in English and will explain the exhibit to the delegates and visitors in these languages, supplementing the exhibit by means of lantern slides showing the development of religious educational facilities in America. Mr. Hammaren will render the churches of Sweden a service in view of the religious educational problems confronting them.

A newly established course in rural church management at the Northern Theological Seminary, Chicago, provided for by a recent gift, will begin the latter half of the year. Dr. B. E. Allen of Neponset, Ill., who is noted for his success in rural work, has been elected director.

Rev. and Mrs. Robert W. VanKirk, who left Boston the middle of April on a trip across the country, arrived in Los Angeles the last week in June. Mr. Van Kirk preached at various cities along the way. Their address will be Whittier, Calif.

A public appeal for the necessary funds and a resumption of the building of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City, has been decided upon by the cathedral trustees. Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt is chairman of the fund-raising movement.

Just What You Give

THIS world of ours is an even place,
That, like a mirror, reflects a face,
As it really is—so if you will smile
You will find that happiness, all the while
Will follow you—and if you must frown
You'll see the mouth of the world droop down!

Just what we give we take away,
Whether it's joy or work or play;
Whether it's fear, or eternal youth;
Whether it's falsehood or gleaming truth;
Whether it's gladness or pain or dread;
Whether it's hope—or an aching head!
Just what you plant you gather in,
And if the harvest you take seems thin,
You've mostly yourself to blame; the earth
Is ready always to give you mirth!
Smile up into the morning's face,
Remember—the world is an even place!

"When I Was Abroad'

From this time on you may expect us to preface most of our remarks with, "When I was abroad" or "When I was in Europe." It will give a certain dignity to our work. We recall a brother who was never known to preach a sermon without a similar reference. Upon inquiry we found that his first, last and only trip abroad was nearly twenty years earlier. All those years Europe had been his inspiration and his congregation's despair. Patient reader, you will not have to suffer for twenty years, for no editor of a Baptist newspaper under transient control could possibly last that long. The editorial sea is already strewn with wreckage.

Killam's Kollum

The Three-mile Limit

Judged by the space given in the current newspapers, the three-mile limit must be one of the wonders of the world. Before this note comes to the attention of our readers the editor will be beyond that mysterious boundary. We will endeavor to describe it to THE BAPTIST family after careful observation.

"What Fools We Mortals Be"

Before leaving home we took out additional insurance. Why? Any one who knows the facts will agree that the man who lives in or passes through Chicago needs insurance if any man does. More than 300 persons have been killed in that city since Jan. 1 by automobiles alone—and think of the bandits! Well, we needed additional insurance anyway. An editor of a Baptist newspaper needs ample protection.

New Obituary Plan

From the beginning THE BAPTIST has made a charge for death notices sent in the form of obituaries. We freely give space to brief news items concerning the passing of those who have in any public way served the denomination. The matter of obituaries has, however, been troublesome. In some cases pastors who could not afford it have paid for long articles concerning the life of some departed brother. THE BAPTIST will print 100-word obituaries free. There will be a charge of 4 cents per word beyond 100 words. Please send cash with notice, if it is more than 100 words in length.

Ruts

Churches get into ruts. Preachers get into ruts. Editors get into ruts. "What has been must be" indicates a dangerous tendency. Few of our capable Baptist men and women are heard through the medium of our Baptist papers. A casual reader would be justified in the conclusion that we have only a few persons with the ability to contribute to the columns of THE BAPTIST. There are thousands, but our difficulty is to persuade these men and women with a message to give us that message for the readers of THE BAPTIST. During the summer a number of new names will appear from week to week. If you should happen to get during the summer a bright idea, put it in black and white and address it to your paper. It is greatly in need of such material. P. S.—Better include return postage. Your ideas and ours may not coincide.

A Statement by the Home Secretary of the A. B. F. M. S.

THE Fundamentalist League of Greater New York and vicinity through its chairman, Dr. John Roach Straton, recently made application to the Officers Council of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society for permission to examine certain correspondence files of the society for the purpose of verifying or disproving certain information said to be in their possession reflecting upon the theological soundness of our missionaries and secretaries. The committee declined to indicate which letters they desired to see without an assurance in advance that any letters which might be named would be submitted for their examination. The Officers Council felt unable to open the files of the society to Doctor Straton and others representing the Fundamentalist League of Greater New York without authorization by the Board of Managers. Doctor Straton made application to the board for a hearing at its meeting, June 28. This was cordially granted and at the evening session Doctor Straton and a delegation consisting of about thirty ministers and laymen were given a full opportunity to make their statement to the board.

Doctor Straton presented the following written request, which formed the basis for a prolonged discussion:

"To the Board of Managers of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society,

"Dear Brethren:

"It is proper that you should know in the beginning who the brethren are who make up this delegation. We are the executive committee of the Baptist Fundamentalist League of Greater New York and Vicinity for Ministers and Laymen. In addition to the members of our committee we have invited a few other interested brethren, who are also familiar with the matters which we are bringing to your attention, to accompany us. The delegation, therefore, is made up of both pastors and laymen. We are all Baptists, we are all contributors to the work of the Foreign Mission Society of the Northern Baptist Convention, and therefore we are a part of your constituency. Consequently, we come as friends and as ardent advocates of the Christian missionary movement.

"We are, however, burdened and distressed at the present time by certain information that has come to us from several different quarters, which seems to indicate that what is called "modernism"—that is, the rationalistic and radical religious ideas of today—is now prevalent on the foreign mission fields, as well as in the homeland. We have made sacrifices in the past to support our foreign missionary enterprise with our prayers, our efforts and our means, and we desire to continue so to do. We cannot, however, conscientiously continue to support our missionary enterprise with that zeal, enthusiasm, joy and liberality in offerings which characterized us in other days until these alleged wrong conditions are either disproved or removed. We are willing to give of our best to advancing the true cause of Christ in the world, but we are not willing to give of our means and efforts and then to find that our gifts, instead of advancing the Baptist cause through the propagation of New Testament Christianity, are being employed to tear down that cause, and to propagate religious theories and methods of work that are founded on what we regard as a highly destructive and anti-Biblical philosophy.

"The information that has come to us, which seems to indicate the wrong conditions referred to, has come from several sources: some of it directly from the foreign field, some of it through reports that are now well known in the denomination, and some of it from other sources. We believe that it is for the best interests of the cause, as well as necessary for our own peace of mind and continued enthusiasm in advancing the foreign mission enterprise, either to be able to verify the information which has been given us from these several sources, or to be in a position to deny that there is any ground for the things that have come to our attention.

"Acting, therefore, upon your invitation for any who are thus distressed to come directly to you for facts, we request the privilege, as a part of your constituency, to see certain specific correspondence which we understand is in your files. We request that such correspondence be produced and read before this group tonight, and, if the contents shall warrant it, that abstracts of such correspondence shall be made, and shall be preserved by the board for future reference.

"For the Committee,

"(Signed) John Roach Straton."

After a full hearing the board adjourned to another room and after carefully considering the request passed the following vote unanimously:

"The Board of Managers of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society makes the following reply to the request presented by Dr. John Roach Straton on behalf of the Fundamentalist League of Greater New York and Vicinity for permission to inspect its files which in the understanding of its missionaries and through the long practice of the society it regards as confidential.

"No one can possibly be more anxious that every one of our missionaries shall preach the true gospel of the grace of God in Christ Jesus and shall do his work in a way pleasing to our Lord than the Board of Managers. Last year the two foreign boards issued a statement to the denomination, declaring their confidence in the faith of their missionaries and asking any one who had any specific charges against any particular missionary to bring them to the board. No one up to this time has brought such specific charges to the board over his own name against any particular missionary. On the other hand there have been published far and wide general charges of unsoundness of faith which can result only in an unjust disparagement of our whole work and unfounded suspicion against all our missionaries.

"In harmony with the statement previously made the board desires to say that should any one bring allegations with reference to any of our staff or of our missionaries the board pledges itself again to a full and fair investigation of them. We are not at liberty to abdicate or share the responsibility for such an inquiry which the denomination has definitely placed upon the board. Therefore the Board of Managers does not feel justified in granting the request to inspect its files."

The board sincerely regretted its inability to accede to the request of Doctor Straton's committee inasmuch as it realizes that the brethren presenting it were doubtless actuated by motives of real concern for the well-being of the foreign mission work of the denomination. It should be pointed out, however, that the members of the board themselves, to whom has been committed by the denomination the responsibility for the conduct of the work abroad, feel a far greater concern than any one else that its missionaries shall be entirely faithful in carrying to the peoples abroad the message of salvation in Christ Jesus our Lord.

The board exercises the most extreme care in the choice of its missionaries to insure their fitness for the great work, it follows closely the work as it is carried on upon the field and is kept constantly informed of the details of its prosecution and its results. It meets its missionaries personally when they are at home on furlough and is not ignorant of the character of the work being done by them.

It is realized that certain unsupported statements reflecting upon the faithfulness of our missionaries have been given wide currency throughout our constituency and have caused widespread unrest and distrust. The board fully shares the anxiety of Doctor Straton's committee that such distrust shall be allayed. It believes, however, that the remedy suggested by the Fundamentalist League is not the right one. A large proportion of our correspondence is carried on under the definite pledge of confidence. All of it is tacitly understood to be for the scrutiny of the properly constituted officers and the board only. The missionaries write to us upon almost every conceivable subject touching their daily lives. Young people all over the country confide the most intimate details of their experience to us. If it became known that the board suffered unauthorized persons to scrutinize our correspondence it would result in such loss of confidence that our work would become impossible. Should we concede this group the right to see certain correspondence today, other groups might reasonably ask a similar privilege tomorrow.

If the evils which Doctor Straton's committee allege actually exist the remedy is perfectly clear. Let this group of brethren submit to us in writing the charges or rumors of which they are possessed and the board pledges the fullest and most searching investigation.

Both the Officers Council and the members of the board have urged upon Doctor Straton and his committee that they be entirely frank with us and place in our hands in writing the details which they assure us they possess. This they refuse to do without a pledge in advance that the board will violate the confidence its missionaries and the denomination repose in it. The board reiterates its earnest desire that any one possessed of information damaging to our missionaries present their statements in definite written form with the sources from which they emanate so that the board may be in a position to conduct such an investigation as the responsibility placed upon it by the Northern Baptist Convention would render obligatory.

P. H. J. LERRIGO, HOME SECRETARY

An Unprecedented Request

WE ask a very careful reading of the clear statement on page 740 of this issue, of the meeting between a group of thirty representatives of the Fundamentalist League of New York and Vicinity and the Board of Managers of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. Doctor Lerrigo, home secretary, makes the official statement for the board, showing what led up to the meeting, and impartially covering the case. The statement is admirable in substance and spirit, typical of the dignified and Christian manner in which an unprecedented issue forced upon the board and its officers has been met.

The matter is undoubtedly serious, and it is of the utmost importance that the denomination should rightly understand it. We call attention, therefore, to some points that should be emphasized.

First, the board of the Foreign Mission Society is not averse to investigation or to criticism based on ascertained facts. On the contrary it welcomes both, and has repeatedly so stated. It has simply insisted, rightly, that the criticisms or charges must be specific, and that investigation shall be made by those appointed and authorized by the agencies to which the denomination has entrusted these interests. The society recognizes fully that it is the denomination engaged in a definite undertaking, and it has no desire to function apart from the will and the wish of the denomination as expressed through its appointed agencies. The society's board and officers, on the other hand, have had a sacred trust committed to them and cannot in honor abrogate its discharge.

Second, the request to turn over its files or any portion of them for inspection by a self-constituted inquisitorial group was properly refused for the reasons stated in the board's unanimous reply to Doctor Straton, the head and chief spokesman of the league. The sacredness of the confidence involved in the correspondence between the secretaries and the missionaries cannot be overestimated. To violate it would be to destroy the vital and intimate relationship which enables the board to know its missionaries and to deal intelligently and justly with its widespread and distant work. The missionaries are encouraged to write to the board secretaries, baring their hearts, with the assurance that their letters will be treated as personal and confidential. This has been true of the society in all its history. It is true of all similar boards, and in the conduct of reputable business generally where confidential relations exist.

Third, the refusal does not imply that there is anything which the board would wish to conceal in its correspondence files. Without being informed as to just what files were wanted, since the league refused to specify unless the request was granted in advance—a most singular condition—the secretaries declare that they know of nothing in the correspondence that could justify the vague charges which have been given wide publicity without waiting to secure reliable verification. This fact should be made perfectly clear, that the board has nothing to conceal, but it has a principle of action to maintain and, moreover, it has a sacred trust to preserve a normal relationship and mutual confidence between its missionaries and its secretaries. To cut the cord of confidential communication would leave the missionaries isolated and bereft, deprived of the friendship and advice upon which they rely in intimate matters; while it would leave the board and its secretaries in ignorance of conditions on the field. We treat this point at length because it is essential. Doctor Straton and his committee demanded—for the word is not too strong in face of the statements made to the board and of the scarcely veiled threats as to what would follow non-compliance—that the board violate a fundamental principle involving its honor and its confidential relations with its servants on the foreign field.

Fourth, the league members came without presenting any specific charges against any individual, offering on the basis of "certain information from several different quarters" vague blanket charges that "the rationalistic and radical religious ideas of today are now prevalent on the foreign mission fields." Added to this was the declaration made to the board by a league spokesman that the secretaries knew of these conditions on the field and abetted them, but were keeping them concealed from the board. Inasmuch as the board has repeatedly sent its trusted members to investigate field conditions as in the case the last year of so eminent a conservative as Doctor Chamberlin, this charge fell of its own weight; but it betrayed the animus behind it. The board in reply asked simply that charges against both missionaries and secretaries be made specific and reduced to writing, and gave assurance that whenever such charges were made they would be dealt with fully and fairly. It could not do more, and those who know the character of the men composing the Board of Managers of our Foreign Mission Society, will be able to judge whether they are likely to be duped or to be disloyal to their trust and to the denomination. Doctor Straton did not appear to realize that when he indicted the missionaries and secretaries in general, he also indicted the board and the society which elected these men to high service.

Fifth, the fact should not be overlooked that in this whole matter Doctor Straton and his league followers disregarded the specific instructions of Jesus Christ in the Holy Scriptures. In one of the rare instances in which our Lord indicated rules, he laid down a method of procedure for his disciples in case a brother felt aggrieved (Matt. 18:15-18). It was manifestly the duty of Doctor Straton if "distressed" at the information of "wrong conditions" to take up the matter privately, first of all with the individual concerned, and, if that failed, with the board, which in this case might represent the church. Instead of that, general charges and insinuations were spread broadcast through the press, to the great injury of the cause about which the league professes such solicitude. When the board was approached, it was not in the manner or for the purpose indicated by the Master, but in an attempt to secure verification of charges already made public on information from sources which honorable men would not ordinarily regard as either reliable or reputable. The editor, en route to Stockholm, happened to be present at the meeting, which was one of the most depressing and disheartening in his experience. He cannot speak too highly of the unfailing Christian spirit manifested by the members of the board in circumstances that frequently made patient dealing difficult.

In conclusion, the denomination has no reason to be alarmed at these general and irresponsible charges laid against our missionaries in foreign fields. No truer or firmer body of Christians can be found. They believe in the real fundamentals of our faith or they wouldn't be where they are. To cast a cloud of suspicion upon them in this league manner is something for which these men must answer to God. Their statements should be discredited until they bring specific charges and proof. To say that "rationalistic and radical ideas" are "prevalent on the foreign mission fields" is a reckless slander of brethren and sisters whose shoe latchets their accusers are not worthy to unloose. It is ours to see to it that the missionaries know they are sustained by our prayers, love and trust. As for the cause, let us give it increased devotion and support.

A Tardy Recognition

FOR many long years the importance of the local church in village or rural neighborhoods was not fully recognized and in consequence the whole cause of Christ and his church has suffered seriously in many ways. Perhaps this statement will be challenged by some one who will remark that the importance of village and rural church life has long been recognized, but the situation has never been faced by church leaders and comprehensive plans and programs under competent ministers and workers provided so that the failures of the past could be converted into present-day successes.

Such a remark would accord with our viewpoint, but we are glad that the situation is rapidly changing. Today, under competent direction and with real understanding, the whole rural church opportunity is being worked out on a successful basis.

This tardy recognition of a most important phase of Christian service is very welcome because the city and town churches are largely dependent upon the product of the rural churches, both for members and for ministers and missionaries.

The rural church needs a trained ministry today in order to develop a trained membership. Without a trained membership the life of the church will never reveal a high standard of living or production. When the witness of a Christian life is unreliable and of poor quality it is tremendously injurious to the future of the Christian body. When the standards of production are low the future of the group and the individual is more or less hopelessly beclouded. When Christian living is not in evidence and the production of resources for Christ's service is meager, the impact of the church upon the community is very small indeed and its program of service is very inadequate to meet the needs of the local situation. We plead, therefore, for a yet larger place in our plans and programs for the work in rural fields.

Many a town and city church owes uncounted obligations to some nearby rural field. The town or city church did not produce any candidates for the ministry so the rural church provided them with a man who was converted and reared in his Christian faith in a rural field. Later, when educated, he took a city pastorate.

Many a city church owes great obligations to rural fields because a large per cent of the membership was received by letter from rural churches. The city and town church should immediately recognize its obligation and repay the rural churches by a helpful cooperation in all lines of Christian ministry and service.

Interdependence

IT has long been the boast of the local Baptist church that it is an independent body and as such can not be interfered with by any other local church or organized group of local churches.

The right to independence is absolutely admitted, for it exists; but it is a theory and not a practice in the great majority of cases.

We would be exhibiting a great deal of wisdom if we placed a large measure of emphasis upon our voluntary interdependence instead of upon our theoretical right to independence.

The future of any local church is inevitably bound up in its association with other similar bodies. Think for just a moment how varied and how important those associations are. Most local churches depend upon others for the production of a ministry. They have never produced their own. The same thing is true concerning the missionaries that enable many a local group to obey the command to preach the gospel to all the world.

Many a church would be in sore straits but for the members which it receives from other local churches. A little while ago we knew of a church that in seven years had received 112 members and exactly 100 of them had come by letter from sister churches.

The poorest, most useless churches we know are those who for some fancied wrong refuse to have fellowship with their sister churches. They try to live alone in independence, but they generally die speedily for lack of interdependent relations with other local churches.

Our interdependent relations are most important and inspiring. If others have found some way in which to do the work of the Lord in an achieving manner, all soon know of it through their fellowship relations.

If there is a tendency to go astray on the part of a local church, the weight of counsel and the right course of many other local churches deters the wayward one from self-destruction.

The strong church is a help to many weak ones and the care of weak churches keeps noble and missionary the spirit of many a strong church.

We would not force any local church to be interdependent, but we would advise them all to place the emphasis not upon their right to independence but upon the wisdom, graciousness and brotherly love of a true and voluntary interdependence.

Patriot and Traitor

AS the good old Declaration of Independence has again rolled out its sonorous and heart-stirring utterances this year it is probably true that to a considerable part of the inhabitants of this favored land the term independence has been interpreted chiefly as a liberty to obtain booze and to get drunk.

It is not, indeed, true that anything approaching a majority of the inhabitants of the land have any such notion, but as in the case of the solitary frog mistaken for a carload, we are likely to be deceived by the noise, for these clamorous misinterpreters of independence are mainly massed in our largest cities and foreign quarters, and they have big newspapers to megaphone their cry until the noise of one fat booze-lover sounds like the vocal output of a boiler factory. The great states of the mid-west and far west and of the south, and in fact of all the states save about half a dozen, are not making much noise, perhaps not enough. They have spoken decisively after taking nearly a century to think it over. They have seen memorable results for good already in spite of the squirming of the venomous reptile which somehow objects to being destroyed, and naturally they see the folly of the wet hope for the repeal of the prohibitory amendment, which was enacted deliberately and not hastily by the most overwhelming majority of any amendment in the nation's history and which would require the unthinkable reversal of a vote by thirty-six states to repeal it.

But while this is true as to the prohibition amendment itself, unfortunately there are loopholes large enough to afford anxiety to all who have sufficient patriotism to wish their country's fundamental law to be obeyed, and sufficient conscience to wish the murderous traffic in drink to be abolished. The provision for carrying out the edict of the Constitution rests chiefly with congress. Now that body of statesmen and near-statesmen has earned for itself in the course of its history the characterization which Virgil in a hasty and inaccurate moment put upon woman, varium et mutabile semper, for it is "ever a fickle and changeable thing." And not only the prolific law-emitting body itself but the people who elect it have a habit of flopping suddenly and violently, especially in the year following a presidential election. For another thing, the prerogative of patronage is so dear to the average congressman that for the sake of having the appointment of the prohibition enforcement agents in his power he has thus far refused to allow civil-service protection to the appointments but has made them a matter of political patronage.

But the thing which is especially of interest to the Christian is the fact that there is danger that some who bear that name who may weaken on the great principle at stake and may give aid and comfort to the enemy in the hour of our country's danger, a course of action which is legally defined as treason. We may expect that all of the confirmed lovers of drink, and those who in direct or roundabout ways profit from the sale or the permission of the sale of drink, and the anarchic element which antagonizes all restraint will fight the enforcement of this law; but we have a right to expect that no Christian minister will, attempt to exhume the old argument that defends a present use of booze from the miracle at Cana, and that no Christian minister will, however much he may wish to cater to popular clamor, permit himself to defend light wines and beer. Now is the time for the church of Christ to stand fast!

Let Wall Street Laugh

LET Wall Street tremble. It is threatened with discovery. This time the farmers' bloc in congress is said to be preparing to urge an investigation of speculative business, particularly as carried on in Wall Street.

And therein the farmers are as naive as the rest of us. They seem to think that a congressional investigation will put them in the way of knowing something otherwise unknowable and of doing something not otherwise possible of performance.

Such investigations were once a hope, then a joke, now a bore. For they are so futile. Usually they manage to discover things that have been common knowledge for ten years, things accepted as a part of the established order. Occasionally some bold spirit connected with such an investigation does find out some material fact or arrive at some virile conclusion, but in such cases the report either is not printed, or is printed in limited editions not available to the public.

Within the last two or three years, the farmers of a single county in the Middle West are reported to have sunk nearly $2,000,000 in wildcat oil stock, with not a smear of oil in sight before nor since.

Let Wall Street laugh.

Dole or Drive

Not by doling or dealing in dribbles, but by driving ahead with power and force, can our churches continue.

By George W. Lawrence

WHEN, as a lad, I was employed on the farm, the woman for whom her husband and I worked, had me, one Sunday morning hitch up the horse so she could go to church. While I was holding the horse, the good farm woman attempted to get into the buggy, but stubbed her toe and spilt all over the ground the two pennies she was taking to church. After collecting together herself and the gift she was making to her God, she drove on down the lane leaving me watching her as she traveled into the main road and toward the village. I can see that boy now, and I experience again the feeling that came into his heart. This woman had the handling of all the money in that household, so I knew that the two cents was her own free gift.

Doling Time

In the years that have passed since that morning I have had many opportunities in our country churches to raise money for the Lord's work, and that incident always comes to my mind. The same type of penuriousness has been displayed again and again. And it shows itself not only regarding money but there is a lack of generosity in the time and thought given to the solution of our town and country church problems. Dole or drive is a question with which we are brought face to face continually. Each community has its own distinctive answer. And that is the reason why more time should be given to the needs of the local church. No general rule can be applied to all our rural churches. A study of the mental make-up of the church members and of the people living in close proximity to the building will aid one in knowing what kind of a program that community needs. Every church needs a well thought out plan, but the approach must not always be the same. Many churches are as isolated as they were when they were built fifty or a hundred years ago. It never was difficult to get people to attend church in a community where there was nothing else to do. But in those sections where there is much to attract the young and old, the church must be alert to offset the evil attractions, and preaching alone will not accomplish this.

In the early days every little group had its own church building and we find those edifices scattered all over the country today. In those times a pastor could be had for a few hundred dollars. And he was, most likely, the best trained man in the community. Today there are many communities where a large percentage of the inhabitants have been to high school and some to college. The church in those parts of the country must have a minister who is as intelligent and who reads as much as his parishioners. One minister recently sending in his quarterly report gave as his answer to the question "What books have you read during the last quarter?", "Exodus and Leviticus." Another reported the Literary Digest and Country Gentleman. A member in a church of which one of the above quoted gentlemen was pastor said he thought $900 a year was enough for any minister. Neither of these ministers is apt to lead his church far out of the "dole" stage. At a conference I suggested to one of the brethren that he let me send him a certain book to read, whereupon he retorted "I have a book, brother." To remedy this lack of acquaintance with the value of reading good books we must pay a larger salary in order to help the minister purchase them. The "gold brick" days of the average farmer, however, have gone and he wants something for his money. I have known several cases where ministers have gone into a field paying a miserably poor salary, but it was soon increased when the man of God proved that he had a vision, was intelligent and had some energy which he was not afraid to use, nor did he hesitate to plan his work for at least a year in advance.

The Pastor's Taxi Fare

But the habit of doing the Lord's work in dribbles is not alone the fault of the minister. I encountered one loyal member of a Baptist church who told me with tears in his eyes that he loved his denomination, and remarked that if I would get his church a pastor I could count on him to help in every way possible. This farmer owned a 200 acre farm and he was out of debt. I know because I looked up his record. We secured a minister and this man who shed real tears, when telling of his love for his denomination, went to the station to welcome the new minister, his wife, and two small children, and drove them back ten miles to the parsonage. As the new minister was getting out of the car this Baptist layman charged the new man $2.50 taxi fare.

In Michigan forty-eight of its eighty-two counties, and in Illinois fifty-six of its 102, have lost in their rural population in the last ten years. This decrease means that many of the church supporters have left the country district. Unless many of these religious organizations make a stupendous effort to gain new members, the churches will die. Many are dying, but others are saying that they must get away from the dole method and start a drive.

The Wealth of the World

By Lereine Ballantyne

THERE are cattle upon a thousand hills,
And sheep in the valleys go;
There are ships that ride a thousand waves,
And gems in the sea below.

There are riches stored in the earth's deep breast,
For the use of the sons of man,
And they know that God gave all these things,
Increased since the world began.

There are cattle upon a thousand hills,
And sheep in the vales below—
Yet we give but little of life to Him,
Or appreciation show.

It is interesting to watch those town and country churches taking on new life. Some of these Baptist groups have been paralyzed by certain types of evangelists coming in year after year. People were sick of their rantings, God gave rural people more than one instinct, so when that longing to worship in a house of God became atrophied, a prejudice had to be overcome in order to attract men and women to the church again. Probably the social or herding instinct was appealed to. (One man told me he was opposed to church socials, because it was socialism that was ruining this country.) Or the approach may have been to the economic side of their life. Jesus fed the five thousand before he preached to them. Missionaries in the foreign field are convincing us that we too must many times help make ways of better business and cooperative methods, and thus show that before we can preach understandingly about saving one's soul through our Master Christ, we as an institution of Christ, have come to serve. Let us get away from doling out a few pennies and a few minutes, and saving only one boy or girl. Let us drive on ahead, spending dollars and hours and brains, bringing all, or at least a fair share of our young people to our Master. Some churches are getting this vision, and those churches are growing.

We might preach until we were green in the face, and yet not win souls because of the absence of the body which contains those souls. The other day I saw a group of men standing before a pop-corn popping machine watching it work. I came to the conclusion that when a church shows "action" then that organization will attract men and women. Christ came into the world to give life. The disciples were rebuked when they sought "the living among the dead." The dying, or even the gasping, church does not attract. Hundreds of country churches are passing out of existence. Only those which are driving ahead, and that means exertion of energy, and sacrifice, are going to survive. The "driving" church is that one which knows its field through a house to house survey, attempts to reach all in its community by those organizations which appeal to the various age and sex groups, such as men's clubs, women's unions and young people's classes and socials, and which convinces its rightful constituency that its aim is to serve, and then leads that community to know God and Jesus Christ, his Son. Not by doling or dealing in dribbles, but by driving ahead with power and force, which comes from a knowledge that we are doing God's business, can our churches continue to live.

The Two Birds in the Bush

Life consisteth not in the abundance of things.—Luke 12:15.

By D. E. Lewis

THE old proverb, "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," may be true from a material point of view, but at times when one can rise above the feeling that life consists in the abundance of things, the balance swings over in favor of the two birds in the bush.

The bird in the hand is a valuable possession. He may be boiled to furnish a few sweet morsels to satisfy the palate and to strengthen the physical man, but if it were not for the two birds in the bush, of little sense would it be to prolong the life of the physical man.

In "Little Rivers" Dr. Henry Van Dyke tells of the farmer who cut down his shade trees so that he might have a little more space to plant a few more potatoes and then calls attention to the dreary place in which he had to eat his potatoes.

The two birds in the bush stand for home. Listen to them, twittering to each other in the bird language of affection as they gather the grass and the sticks to make themselves a nest; watch the faithful mother bird as she patiently hatches out her brood; see the little ones cuddling under her wings; watch father as proudly he goes off foraging for food for the family; notice now the anxiety when danger comes in sight and later the feeling of responsibility when the time comes for the little ones to leave the nest in their trial flight out into the world.

There are folks living today whose bird in the hand means gold and silver and liberty bonds and real estate and big bank balances who would willingly lay everything down in an instant if they could thereby gain the happiness symbolized by the two birds in the bush.

In one of James Whitcomb Riley's poems he tells how dad got a patent right, rich as all creation, but all the family sighin' for the peace they had before. What's in this grand life and high situation with nary pink nor hollyhock a-bloomin' at the door? Let's move back—back to Griggsbys Station; back where we used to be so happy and so poor.

We naturally imagine that a man with lots of money ought to be happy. "Man, what a chance!" He could stand by the side of his Master and say, "This day shall good tidings come to the poor, the captives shall be released and the blind shall see and the bruised shall find liberty and the gracious gospel of the love of God shall go abroad among the nations." He loses his chance if he makes the mistake of holding the bird in his hand so close to his eyes that he fails to see the two birds in the bush.

A noted traveler journeyed the world over and had much to tell, but the message for which the world will forever reverence his

> IF preachers like Wesley and Newman, Dale and Church, Spurgeon and Liddon, have one common word to speak to the pulpit today, it is surely this: that behind all great preaching lies always a great gospel greatly conceived. We cannot bring to perfection even the humblest wayside flower of the moral life without the rain and the sun and the dew from heaven. Celestial observations are needed in order to construct terrestial charts; to steer the ship we must "take the sun"; to solve the problems of the hour we must bring in the things of eternity.—George Jackson, in "Reasonable Religion."

name came from far over the seas from the depth of a lonely heart:

"'Mid pleasures and palaces tho' we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home."

It is difficult to make a palace homelike. A few geniuses have succeeded. Jesus was speaking to the ordinary run of folks when he said that a similar attempt was like the camel and his hump climbing through the eye of a needle. The most of us who may have lost our peace of mind because we never had a chance to know what it feels like to sit down amidst the abundance of things, may recover our equilibrium by watching the two birds in their nest in the bush by the side of the "lowly thatched cottage."

The two birds in the bush stand for song and beauty and hope. The bird in the hand lies mute and still.

During Darwin's time he knew more about earthworms than any other living man. An interesting study, but he kept at this work so intensely that he lost his appreciation of music and art and religion. He paid a heavy price.

When it no longer hurts when you hit your hand on the hard table corner, send for the doctor. If you discover that the only portraits of Washington and Lincoln that appeal to you are the ones on the greenbacks, pray to the Great Physician quickly, for a paralysis worse than physical is killing your real self. During summer-time if the chink of a silver dollar is sweeter music in your ears than the laughter of the brook, you surely need a spiritual tonic.

Soul suicide may come a long time before a man's epitaph is written. If he persists in holding the bird in the hand so close that it shuts out the view of the birds in the bush, all that the bird in the hand can do for him at last will be to encase him in a mahogany casket more expensive than his neighbors could afford and to raise over the six feet of ground allotted to him a shaft of granite a few feet higher than the others in the city of the dead.

The two birds in the bush stand for real life. It takes most of us a lifetime to learn how to live. Life has been defined as contact with environment. What great stretches there are in the realm of what is highest and noblest that we have wandered among so blind and deaf and dumb. In William Allen White's novel, "A Certain Rich Man," this man with his riches faces his old friend in shabby clothes, who seems to be hiding a little package. When the rich man asks what it is, the poor fellow colors up and confesses that he and his wife, out of the depths of their poverty, had saved a little money to buy a few special flower seeds, that they might have the bloom of their childhood home about their humble cottage door. When the rich man died he had the largest and most fashionable funeral ever seen in that city. When the last call came to his friend, only the poorer classes gathered around the bier, but the novelist closes his book with this expression, "Oh, the tears, the tears!"

Heaven is richer when the call to go up higher comes to the man whose bird in the hand, whether little or big, never dims his appreciation of the value of the two birds in the bush.

Rural Churches Gaining

MANY large tears have been shed and volumes have been written concerning the decay of the rural church, but my observation is that the rural church is not decaying but getting stronger. Quite true, church houses have been abandoned, but the old grain cradle was abandoned when Cyrus McCormick conceived the idea of a self-reaper and proceeded to show that it would work We might, if we would, grieve because the grain cradles became obsolete and so many men lost the strenuous art of cradling. A treatise on the decay of the hoe would be about as nourishing as some of the stuff that has been printed on the decay of the rural church.

Many church buildings have been closed and what is more, there are a number of others that should have the key turned in the lock. The building itself may be in decay but the church spirit is still present. The automobile has changed all this without reflecting in any way upon the spirit which dotted churches here and there over the countryside. And with counties and states and even the federal government itself actively encouraging the good roads program, it is more and more possible for communities to combine their talents and finances and to secure better ministers, larger audiences and Sunday schools, and better use of the local talent that is always present waiting for development. And there is inspiration in numbers. In one community I know of, I might lament the fact that three churches are closed if I did not know that a church three miles away has the combined congregations of all three and a great many more besides. It is not services but service that counts.

Taking the Message to the Lonely Places

The land of desert and mountain has not been "the land that God forgot."

By Coe Hayne

THE inhabitants of the lonely places are not a people to be pitied or patronized, for their very remoteness has its compensations. The wilderness has a charm of its own. In referring to those who adore it and would not willingly exchange it for life in long established and thickly populated communities, William E. Smythe in "The Conquest of Arid America" says: "As I write, I hear of a young lady who has enjoyed the advantages of Boston and New York, of San Francisco and Los Angeles, but who resists the appeals of her parents to come out of the desert wild where she went for a brief vacation, already lengthened to months, and where she has previously spent weeks which she enthusiastically describes as 'the only time I ever really lived.' She writes:

"'When I am in the city my happiness depends on people and society, but out here in the deserts and mountains the country itself is satisfying. Perhaps you don't understand what I mean but I do.'

"I understand precisely what she means, and so do all men and women who turn their faces toward the clean, beautiful, unpeopled wilderness with the thrill of a lover's heart."

The pioneer who entered the barren desert of withered grass and sagebrush or mountain wilderness was equal to the gigantic task of subduing the wilderness and developing its immeasurable natural resources, but often would have lost in a battle against religious destitution had it not been for timely help from Christian agencies far from his community. The waste of desert and mountain has not been "the land that God forget." Very early the church boards of the different denominations became God's instruments in the work of developing the spiritual resources of the remote places in "the region beyond." In the pageantry of our national movement westward the home mission enterprise has had, and is still having, its prominent part. The gospel has not followed the pioneer; it has gone with him, often preceding him.

Not infrequently it is declared that the frontier has disappeared. In terms of free land and unrestricted grazing privileges this statement is true. But in terms of gospel destitution the frontier will exist as long as there are communities composed of people who cannot hear the gospel preached or attend Sunday school without traveling from twenty-five to fifty miles, because no service is held nearer.

In Behalf of All Neglected Fields

The interdenominational comity plan whereby the neglected fields may be blessed by the gospel message without the overlapping of denominational effort is meeting with universal acceptance wherever it has been tried systematically.

Dr. L. C. Barnes of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, was the pioneer in this movement and with others succeeded in having it first put into effect in Montana. How it has been received and adapted to the needs in that state is intimated in Dr. Barnes' report for 1923.

"In spite of the prolonged and terrible industrial experiences of Montana, our work in that state forged ahead. Experience in the careful coordination of the work of all the Protestant denominations there, through the Montana Home Mission Council, proves that this is the way to achieve two supremely desirable ends at the same time. One is the advancement of the kingdom of God without the waste and scandal of denominational friction. The other is the advancement of our distinctive Baptist work, testimony and influence much more effectively than it could be done otherwise. Nearly four years' demonstration has been made of the value of this new principle, which is in sharp contrast on one hand with all attempts at organic church union or fusion and on the other hand with all haphazard sectarian plunging. It is simply intelligent, patient, fraternal planning—the spirit of Christ in systematic action. Secretary Cress of the Montana Baptist Convention is recognized by all as the central human factor in the demonstration. Other states now are explicitly asking that the 'Montana plan' be inaugurated in their field. This plan with its distinctive ideal, was worked out and printed before the Interchurch World Movement was thought of by any one, and has had the vitality to survive the severe backwash of that decidedly different undertaking. This plan of every community service is going today much more strongly than ever before. Its aim is not to shut anybody out of any place, but to get somebody for Christ into every place. It is not ecclesiastical but missionary."

"The evils so freely predicted of our efforts have not appeared," reports Mr. Cress, in the Missionary Review of the World. "We are pledged to absolute fairness in dealing with the smallest group in the state. The right of the least denomination to expansion and unhindered self-determination is unchallenged. No one is estopped in programs of aggressive service. The council has never made a decision involving a withdrawal of any denomination from any field. The state is large and the needs greater than all combined can meet. New work is launched with the operating bodies.

"We do not feel that we have solved all our problems, but that a new and hitherto untried principle of working together has been discovered by Dr. Barnes, and Montana is giving it an unprejudiced try-out. It gives us harmony without negative action or compromise of principle. It has shown the way for unity of action while developing new intensities of denominational loyalty. It achieves results not by mandatory methods enforced by authority but by purely spiritual forces. Its cohesive energy lies in the simplicity of its ideals, its spiritual quality and approved soundness from social and business viewpoints. It is built on the basis of a larger service and a fuller recognition of the higher unity of believers than that conceived of in plans involving organic union. It is purely a missionary program without legal elements and is genuinely fraternal." (A reprint of "Denominational Cooperation in Montana," by G. Clifford Cress, may be obtained by addressing Home Missions Council, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.)

Community Service for Boys and Girls

A rural pastor who is keenly alive to his opportunities, fills a large place in the life of his community. His preaching engagements form only a part of his ministry. He works hand in hand with all local constructive agencies, whether religious, educational or social. His acquaintance may include the best teachers available for the local schools; the boys and girls find him a sympathetic confidant and through contacts with him are encouraged to seek the largest possible preparation for useful service for the community and the nation. Such a pastor does not hesitate to utilize the equipment of the church, no matter how incomplete it may be, for the betterment of community life.

Edmund de S. Brunner, author of "The New Country Church Building," whose duties as a pastor have enabled him to make intensive studies of rural life problems, reflects a growing opinion that the day has passed when there is need for apology whenever the church reaches out into the community life to concern itself with some of the manifestations of the abundant life. He asserts that "the church is the proper place for everything that should legitimately enter into the lives of the people. .....Social and community activities are far from detracting from the sanctity of the edifice; rather, the place gives sanctity to the other activities.....How much more free and joyous is worship when the worshiping parent, teacher, or friend realizes that in that very building, that very week, wholesome recreation and inspiring instruction have brought the boys and girls of the community a step further from life failure, a step nearer to the ideal of Christian manhood and womanhood. How fitting that the corn club should meet to learn about the good of their souls in the same room that has also held their discussions of good soil and good seed, and whose walls are hung with pictures of fine stalks or ears. There is no need for apology when a rural community house is attached to a place of worship and the Bible school compelled to use the rooms and equipment of such a building as best it can for religious education. The two conceptions are not contradictory, and a little care will safeguard both."

In this connection may be mentioned the daily vacation Bible schools which have made possible character building activities for the children of isolated communities as well as of densely populated tenement districts of great cities. The services of the volunteer daily vacation Bible school workers who assist the pastors and trained young women workers of the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society are of inestimable kingdom building value.

There are inspiring stories that can be told by the directors of summer work in behalf of the boys and girls in rural industrial and urban communities. It was a revolutionary suggestion that came from Miss Meme Brockway of the Publication Society that state boards, concerned as they have been for years with the pioneer problems of a denomination's existence, should provide for a specialist who shall devote full time to the boys and girls who constitute more than one-half of the Sunday-school enrolment.

Capturing the Imagination of a Rural Community

By Rolvix Harlan

IT is not very inspiring or exciting to look upon the ordinary town and country church, at least not for the average citizen. In most cases the building is out of style. It has served its day and generation and, unlike the church fathers who lie in the churchyard, the building has not quite "fallen on sleep." The grounds are too likely to be uncared for and overgrown with grass and weeds. The tidy, well-painted, well-equipped, clean and homelike country church, is without doubt the exception.

Is it any wonder then that in most rural communities the church has a hold on so few? The same little squad, numbering few, if any, leading, constructive personalities, faces a minister each Sunday, or every other Sunday, or occasionally, as the case may be. This minister hardly dares believe that he and his church can and ought to be the leading, dominant, driving, factor, spiritual and social, in the entire community.

When a church, through inapt or uncaring leadership and visionless policy, has come to a position of neglect, and its influence is depleted or has nearly reached the vanishing point, the first thing to do is to "capture the imagination of the community." This may not be the only thing and the final thing to do, but past question it is the first thing to do.

A Definite Example

A definite example of a church taking this first step is the Chesterfield and Jacobstown combined Baptist churches, under the pastoral leadership of the Rev. T. W. Evans. This parish has two meeting houses, one located in the hamlet of Chesterfield, N. J., the other four miles away, located just outside the village of Jacobstown, N. J., where it was built several generations ago before the village came. Sleepy and sedate, suggestive of rest present and eternal, these two buildings tell a story of the religious devotion of other generations. One year ago Pastor Evans came. He has ideas about the relationship of a country church to the community it serves. Among other things he conceives the church as having an obligation to take an active interest in rural affairs outside the strictly religious sphere. Practical religion, he contends, produces something more than susceptibility to devout feelings, a willingness to avoid temptations, resisting them when they turn up unexpectedly. For him the church and religion is a part of the every-day life program of the people and must furnish inspiration and leadership. The church must cooperate with other agencies in meeting the community's needs. He has not yet worked out a program and method for meeting these needs, or even for making the church a community center, but he has captured the imagination of the community for his point of view.

With the assistance of a committee whom he was able to interest in the proposition, one of whom is the state superintendent of markets, he made the church responsible for a big community fair and pageant. More than 100 exhibitors displayed products of one kind and another, all brought in from farms, farm-kitchens, and workshops of the neighborhood. There were almost as many divisions as are found at the average county fair. The general impression created was better than that of the larger fairs. We quote from the account published in the Philadelphia Inquirer (it takes a real show to secure attention from a metropolitan journal):

"The fair was held in the grounds adjoining the church. Here under a spacious tent were arranged long tables and on them was piled a remarkable collection of exhibits. Practically everything found on the farm was represented, from squash to the handiwork of the farmers' wives, for domestic science is taught in the rural districts today just as it is in the city communities and possibly with better results. Such at least was the impression created by inspection of the fancy work, to which one end of a table had been devoted, and where was found everything from an embroidered collar to a handsomely wrought table center piece. Naturally it was a division of the fair which attracted the attention of the women and enlisted their support.

A Tempting Display

"In the same department was shown an extensive collection of home-canned fruits and vegetables, besides hundreds of jars and glasses of fruit juices and jellies. Had one gone prepared to lay in a winter's supply of such delicacies it would have been a golden opportunity to have obtained it at prices that would have caused the average retail dealer to experience all the thrills of desperation.

"From this delectable and suggestive collection one traveled along between masses of farm produce, including contributions from the dairy and poultry divisions, to where little mountains of yellow and white corn were piled, expectantly awaiting the decision of the judges.

"No general market ever supplied a more varied collection of country produce than was shown under the canvas top that spread out over the east side of the churchyard. It was really a revelation, for it showed as could have been demonstrated in no other way, that the vicinity of Chesterfield is a long way removed from the nearest famine zone and that, so far as local farmers are concerned, stinted tables are unknown. It was such a scene as would have delighted Washington Irving, one which he would have embalmed for all time in his inimitable way.

"But it would be a mistake to think that this farmers' day celebration was purely a local affair. Instead it assumed the proportions of a state event, for it attracted agents of the agricultural department as well as visitors from distant districts. The former arrived all prepared to conduct a series of demonstrations for the benefit of the farmers, and the latter were not slow to take advantage of the opportunity.

"In this way the fair was unexpectedly converted into a farm clinic, or wayside demonstrating station, and this in turn gave birth to a new inspiration. If country fairs and religion could be successfully mixed once, there is no reason seen why they should not be merged many more times, with increasing benefits all around. So important and practical appeared the idea that now there is a plan on foot to make the Chesterfield church-farm fair not only an annual event, but to convert it into both a church experimental station and an agricultural demonstration unit, where those attending can be brought face to face with all of the phenomena between religious incentive with the conception of a bountiful Providence and the practical way of insuring its visitation in farming districts.

"One of the features of the fair was an exhibition of the farm cow. Naturally, advantage was taken of the chance to impress on the owners of the cows the importance of upbuilding their herds by the introduction of the finer stock strains. Talks along this line were made by several men familiar with dairy herd development.

"Then of course there were the athletic features of the celebration, including baseball and a general good time for the children. Probably the fair was more thoroughly enjoyed by the children than any community event has been in the history of Chesterfield.

"Socially the fair was a success. It was so pronounced by the scores of patrons who sat down to tables spread in the basement of the church and partook of a farm-prepared spread that had taxed the ingenuity of housewives, even with the abundance of the well-filled cellars and pantries to draw upon.

"During the evening a musical program was furnished, the grounds being appropriately lighted. Then there were more romping games for the youngsters, announcement of the prize winners and lastly the farewells.

"Even yet one hears the fair talked of in all sections hereabouts as something marking an epoch in community life and certain of repetition year after year with the assurance that it will expand as the conception back of it takes hold.

"Mr. Evans is too modest to claim credit for the success of the fair. Rather he insists this was due to the ready cooperation of the farmers of the district, who fell in with the plan and really made it succeed. Be that as it may, one thing is certain, a novelty has been introduced in the realm of church social activities which will eventually make an appeal to rural congregations."

This country church has captured the imagination of its community. Pastor Evans was far-sighted enough to arrange to have a committee from the Baptist state convention present, with a view to securing cooperation by which he might inaugurate a program of permanent community service to demonstrate what a rural church may mean to its community. It now remains to be seen whether such a program can be devised and whether the interesting of the imagination can be followed by a patient, painstaking program of religious education and spiritual leadership.

Balanced Rations

By Howard Parry

THE community to be described is in the rich farm-land section of northwestern Ohio. It is of easy access, by reason of good roads, auto bus, railroad and electric lines to three other larger towns which affect its life. Its business life is supported by four stores combining general merchandise and groceries, one hardware store, a bank and a farmers' elevator. The employment of the community is that of farming with few exceptions. There are seven organizations in the village: Odd Fellows, Encampment, Maccabees, Rebeccas, Modern Woodmen, Masons and the Grange. The combined membership is 335, with an average attendance at the regular meetings of twenty-five per society. The educational life of the community is provided for by the centralized school, which includes a first-grade high school. The spiritual interests of the village are in care of four churches—Presbyterian, Reformed, Lutheran and Baptist, whose combined membership is 467 and whose Sunday attendance, for the four, is 290. In what manner are the rations, which constitute the food for the social, recreational, educational and spiritual life of the community given to the people? The facts reveal that the rations are administered so as to result in a bad case of indigestion. The diet is not only unbalanced, but too heavy. The patient is attempting to take in more food than it is capable of assimilating and transforming into an efficient, constructive and happy life.

The seven organizations use sixteen of the twenty-six week nights for their meetings. The centralized school requires at least twelve nights for its athletics and programs of various kinds. Saturday night is reserved for business. As many as five meetings of real importance often occur during one evening. Add to the above a lecture course, special committee meetings, special occasions such as lodge conventions, evangelistic meetings—all of which require evenings—and the complexity of the situation is apparent. A large community can easily take care of and receive real benefit from a highly organized life, for it needs more agencies to carry out its interests. The small community, however, works with a small population, a limited group of talented citizens, and a few leaders who must bear the burden of the whole program of the community life. The preceding statement is not a complaint, but is made to show why the attempt of a few to serve their community is rendered so inefficient and comparatively worthless. The few cannot serve all of the people all of the time, so all of the organizations suffer most of the time. Chief interests are such but a short time, for a too highly organized community becomes fickle in nature.

> THO' his ways I do not understand
> Nor yet his face I see,
> Still I am sure what God doth plan
> Is always best for me.
> —C. O. Parkhurst.

Another reason for the unbalanced ration is that every organization functions socially and recreationally in much the same manner in many respects. The school, fraternal orders and churches are each at the same time trying to educate, train, entertain and promote town life, using each time practically the same people, talent and leaders, the only difference being a change of name to a large extent. Is it any wonder the church, consequently the spiritual life of the people, suffers? Neither children, young people, adults, leaders, or the supporting public can be expected to have the strength, even if the desire is present, to engage in the intense spiritual program of today, when they are as tired out, socially surfeited and entertained as the public is at present.

Sympathy Necessary

What can and must be done to balance the ration, so that proper emphasis shall be given to the educational, social, recreational and spiritual needs of the community? First, a sincere sympathy for one anothers' interests must be developed between school, fraternal orders and the church. Cooperation is not possible where groups with different functions fail to recognize their relationship to each other as contributors to the whole life of the people. In a sense this sympathy already exists in this field; it needs only to be made reasonable and shown how to express itself efficiently. The agency for dispensing to the public a balanced ration is the community council, whose membership is composed of an instructed and informed delegate from each group in the village, the pastors of churches and superintendent of schools acting as advisory members. This council meets far enough in advance of the winter activities so that the tentative schedule of each group may be known and adjustment made where necessary. Here also factors which enter into the making of conflict in meetings will be exposed and a schedule for the season drawn up. This council should meet once a month to deal with any necessary changes due to unforeseen circumstances. A committee on notification will advise weekly in public meetings of the scheduled dates, receive all notices of change and thus aid in the elimination of conflicts. In this way the rations can be balanced, the whole life of the community wisely ministered to and nourished in a mutually constructive and happy manner.

Rural Church Work in the State of New York

By F. W. Tomlinson

THE program of the rural church must be broad but will always center around the vital religious services of worship and instruction. In none of the churches mentioned in this article has these been a letting down of the former standards of biblical instruction and persuasion but a real increase, and yet, these progressive churches and their leaders have come to believe that these services alone are not sufficient.

"New occasions teach new duties
Time makes ancient good uncouth
They must upward be and onward
That would keep abreast of truth."

The successful farmer tills the same soil as his fathers, yet he uses new methods and improved machinery and thereby raises four times the produce of the farmer one hundred years ago. So the twentieth century church has the same authoritative inspiring Bible, yet it finds that the religious needs of our age are met by a new emphasis upon the principles of service and adaptation and that out of these principles have developed the methods of all-the-year personal evangelism, of graded Sunday and week-end religious instruction beginning at the cradle, of stewardship and tithing, of preparation for leadership, of providing adequate equipment, of directing the social, recreational, and religious activities of childhood and youth, and in every way working the field to the limit.

The sketches which follow suggest some of the ways in which these principles and methods have been put in operation.

Evangelism and Stewardship

Evangelism and stewardship seem to be twin sisters, generally found together working on different parts of the same task. There is the church at Otego which the pastor, Rev. H. C. Meyers, reluctantly describes as follows: "This church has been supplied by student pastors for several years, services being held in the afternoon, with but small congregations. No resident minister has lived in the parsonage for the past twelve years, nevertheless, the church has maintained itself, and has been a real help to the students. The members realized that the work could not progress until they secured a resident pastor, and, thank God, they had faith enough to venture. Formerly they were connected with the Wells Bridge Church, and were paying $416 as their share of the pastor's salary. When conferring with that church previous to calling a pastor, they said the very best they could do (as they thought) was $600. A few of the ladies of the church said they would solicit the people to see if the pledges could be increased. The result was an amount exceeding $800. The Gleaners' Society then came to the rescue, underwriting $200, which they hoped to raise by suppers, bake sales, etc. The Lord's people are so poor, you know. I do not mean in money, autos, beautiful homes, but in the grace of giving. Thus having $1.000 pledged, they had the courage to call a minister, which in the providence of God was myself and my consecrated companion. We felt that it was a Macedonian call to us, and on Oct. 2, 1921, we began constructive work. We did not come to them saying, "Don't do this, that, and the other thing," but rather saying, "Thus saith the Lord" and the people were willing to listen to his voice.

"The first of the new year, we were ready for a special effort to reach the unsaved, and as a result many were added to the church. The real success was brought to pass by a united effort of the members of our church who had volunteered to pray and do personal work. After two weeks of meetings, the family altar was erected in over thirty homes. Now we are ready to manifest the fruits of the Christian life when once given the instruction, so in the following month (February) stewardship was taken up by the pastor and preached to the people in the morning and mid-week services. At the same time, we had our evangelistic service every Sunday evening and God gave us conversions. You may ask the question, "Why this phenomenal blessing?" Look at Mal. 3:10 for the answer: 'Bring ye all the tithes.' The key to heaven's blessing is not always prayer, but that which we have in our pockets and fail to use. The larger part of our membership enlisted as tithing stewards, and from Sunday to Sunday others have been added to this number until at present, we have eighty. Many of these have become tithers without the necessity of preaching on the subject, simply an invitation from the pastor from time to time.

"In March, the annual canvass was made for the running expenses of the church, the budget at that time being estimated at $1,235. More than $1400 was pledged. Thus the faithful Gleaners who came to the rescue at first with their support through the use of suppers and other things, were now exonerated since Mal. 3:10 was put into practice. Last year, the amount of money paid into the church for all purposes was approximately $2,200. We do not worry about the finances, for the people seem to feel they can do things. The first thing they thought of was to equip the parsonage with modern conveniences for their pastor and family. God will bless a people where this spirit of helpfulness prevails.

"The parsonage has been painted, electric lights installed, hard-wood floor in the kitchen, hot water tank, white porcelain sink, and pipeless furnace. The pastor was presented with $50 for his vacation the first year. In the fall, meetings were conducted in the school houses of the community and the pastor found that the gas and oil bill for his car had been taken care of in advance.

"The membership of the church has been doubled. We have 140 members, fifty-one additions by baptism, fourteen by letter, six on confession of faith. All departments of the church have grown in numbers and spiritual life. There has been an average of over thirty in prayer meeting and an average of eighty-two in every church service. Two Bible classes have been organized, and are doing splendid work. The young people's class has met each week for Bible study, followed by a social time. This has been most profitable to our young people. The Crusaders Band numbers thirty, and meets at the church every Wednesday for Bible study and work. Our missionary society is enthusiastically studying missions and doing efficient work. The pastor's salary has been increased $200. We are just planning to raise several thousand dollars to make the necessary repairs to our church building and we are ever trusting with Van Dyke, "That the road's last turn will be the best."

Community Service

Community service of a high degree in a place where the church has the field to itself is shown in the last ten years of the Morton Church, Monroe County. During that time, Rev. George A. Hobart has led his people in such a way that the community feels it our church rather than your church.

This community service is wrought out in various ways. The Baraca class, a real brotherhood, has for one of the outstanding features of its work a father-and-son banquet which attracts a capacity house of 125 each year. The mother-and-daughter banquet sponsored by the Philathea class has made it necessary to remodel the community house so that many more may be accommodated. Two classes for boys covering the scout ages are avenues for directing their social as well as their religious life. The new community house will make possible a larger service to the boys. Stereopticon pictures obtained from the Board of Promotion and the state department of education were strong educational factors in missions, Christian life, and history. Besides the up-to-date Sunday school which has increased to an average attendance of ninety, week-day religious instruction is given at the village school for an hour each week on school time. The pastor has in his class all the pupils from the fourth to the seventh grades and uses as a textbook "The Great Leader,"

Rural Church Vacation Schools

A notable instance of what may be accomplished in a small church in a small rural town is seen in the work among the Adirondack mountain children at Indian Lake by Rev. and Mrs. C. C. Cunningham. Last year they began their school on July 5 with nineteen children. The attendance increased until there were forty-seven enrolled with an average attendance of thirty. The school was the talk of the community and produced increased interest in the church. Children were reached who had not been to Sunday school and parents felt that children had received training equivalent to a year's attendance in Sunday schools. A Presbyterian summer visitor who saw what was being done for the children stopped his auto as he drove by one day and calling aside the pastor, placed in his hand $110 for the church. It was a little expression of his appreciation for a church that was serving the community.

in the Keystone graded series. The pupils were greatly interested and anxious to remain after the hour which was the closing hour on Friday.

Community Day is held each year just prior to canvass for budget. Reports of year's work are given and new budget presented and explained, and an address is given by some denominational worker who has made a success of his work. The community fair comes each fall with exhibits by the farmers and and the rural schools, with a spelling contest and a baby show.

Evangelism is on the Lowell plan. Members of the church are the evangelists. Adults and their children are equally interested, and all do fine work. In ten years the results of work in this line are given by the pastor.

"We have not attempted anything spectacular and the casual observer happening in might be disappointed, but the currents of faith and loyalty run deep as anyone will find who becomes acquainted with us. Membership of the church has increased from fifty-seven to 137. There were only six men members ten years ago. Now we have many men who are interested to the extent that the financial and property matters are cared for by them, the pastor simply acting in an advisory capacity. These men say the pastor has enough to do without such matters, and as they can do these things, they insist on doing them." Church attendance averaged eighty-five for the year 1922. This average is based upon actual count of every morning service. We have no evening preaching service. Christian Endeavor Society meets Sunday evenings with good attendance.

"Church finances—Ten years ago, no budget and no systematic canvass. Both are now used. Our canvass is more than every member, it is a community canvass. Pastor's salary increased from $700 to $1,600; budget this year, $2,500; quota for New World Movement, $6264. Full amount and more pledged, and we have reason to believe that the full amount of the quota will be paid this year."

Another type of church which seeks to serve its community in every way to the farthest limit is that of the Weedsport Baptist Church where Rev. R. Danald Williamson has been pastor for three and one-half years. One of the results of his leadership is a new Fellowship Hall erected last year and costing $20,000. The upper floor has a fine auditorium and a modern kitchen. The auditorium is used for all kinds of religious, educational and social purposes. The basement is equipped with bowling alley, game room and baths. The bowling alleys are open to everybody, except on Thursday and Sundays, from September to the middle of May and the proceeds average about $40 per week. This enables the church to keep a fine Christian man in charge of the building and pay him $25 a week salary. The building has been open to the public free of cost for health clinics and the community church vacation school. These things help to give it a community atmosphere. A recent informal letter from the pastor tells more definitely the results.

Rural Week Day Religious Education

A pastor on a salary of $800 is big enough to reach into the rural school district and carry with the aid of his volunteer unpaid workers through the year, two successful week day schools. Rev. Albert J. Carsten of Vestal Center in the hills of Broome County is the actor. In the one room school at Glenwood with thirty-seven pupils in attendance, three classes in religious instruction were held each week with the result that all of the eleven children in the seventh and eighth grades made their decision for Christ. In the other school seventeen were in attendance and one conversion resulted. This pastor will also conduct a church vacation school during July. Brother Carsten held unique house-to-house revival services during the winter. He believes this is the best method of rural evangelism. In two years, his morning congregations have increased from forty to 100; the young people's society from twelve to fifty-five.

"I can't begin to tell you how the building has contributed to the life of the church itself. Men feel that we now have a job that is big enough to appeal to them. Next Sunday, I baptize three people. One woman lives several miles outside of town. She was lonely and heard of the wonderful fellowship of the Baptist church. She came to me with her story. We followed the case up and found that she is the mother of three fine children—not one of them in church, although some of them were members of a Methodist church. For several weeks, she has given evidence of her Christian life and unites with us next Sunday. The influence of our new program did it. The survey revealed them as Methodists; so it had been hands off for me but they were of no use to any church. Now they are to be linked up. Another woman to be baptized Sunday feels that the fellowship of the church has changed so that she now can unite with us and be one of us. Before she had felt the church to be cold and distant. She is the mother of six children. It is making a new fellowship which is Christian and seems to point folks to the church and I trust to the kingdom. One influential man in the community, not a Baptist, said that the building had done more this past winter to develop a fine community spirit than anything he had ever known. You understand that through the winter season we have classes for organized play as well as study classes under a person we call our educational director. Mind you the church is doing it. I devote my time largely to the training of people to do the work, so when I come to leave the field the work will go on. I am trying to build an organization that will function of itself."

In three years the Sunday school of this church has nearly doubled its average attendance from seventy-eight to 149; the morning congregations have been trebled, the C. E. changed to B. Y. P. U. has quadrupled, the prayer meeting from an average attendance of eight to seventy-five. The budget of expense and the salary of the pastor are double what they were four years ago. Best of all, everbody in the church has a job and enjoys his religion.

A Rural Parish That Does Things

By P. O. Silvara

THE rural parish program, as demonstrated in this article, holds within its grip the greatest potential possibilities for the rural districts of our country, of any single agency to be found with the land, in the establishing of Christian centers and the making of Christian citizens of the people who live in these communities. It broadens the mind of the individual, it deepens and makes practical his spiritual experience. it stabilizes the home, it fortifies the state and makes a nation.

THE Nebraska Baptist Rural Parish, is in the southwestern corner of Custer County the central county of the state. The parish is situated at the head of the South Loup valley as it runs through the southwestern corner of Custer County. This places the parish right on the border that separates the agricultural section of the state from the purely grazing country. The field is divided into natural districts by geographical barriers in the form of divides as one climbs from the valley to the tablelands. It is only at certain places that one can cross these ridges of hills with a team. The parish extends over into Logan County, covering in all a scope of country thirty miles in diameter. At present work has been done at four outstations—two in country schoolhouses; one at an open country church, and the fourth in a typical frontier town with one store, a garage and blacksmith shop combined, a two-room schoolhouse, a station house and five dwellings. Logan is surrounded by strictly grazing country while off in the distance to the north and west one can see the Nebraska sandhills, which once marked the border of the Great American Desert.

The central plant of the parish is in Arnold on the Kearney and Stapleton branch of the Union Pacific System. It is a town of 1,000 population, and considered the most progressive town on the branch though it has had railway accommodations only twelve years. One small Catholic and four Protestant churches furnish religious privileges for the people. The Methodist Episcopal church is the strongest, with a small brick building erected in 1914 which is inadequate for a community program, yet too good to tear down and of such style that it cannot be made modern. The Church of Christ, with a small one-room building, is the oldest in town. It has a pastor occasionally as it can save up enough money to pay his salary a few months, and then let him pass on. The Church of The Nazarene meets in a remodeled hall and has but a small membership. Somehow they keep a man on the field who earns part of his living aside from the pastorate.

The Baptist church, second in strength, was organized in 1889 with eleven charter members who worshiped in a private house until they laid up a small sod building in which they met until 1908 when they erected their frame building, 34x56 feet, on the best location in town adjoining the public school. It was in this building they worshiped until it burned Dec. 26, 1920 Out of the scraps of lumber left from the erection of this frame building, they built a two-room frame building to which they later added two more rooms. This house served as the prophet's dwelling until the fall of 1919 when the church began the erection of a modern seven-room bungalow with full basement. This was finished for occupancy in 1921 after the church burned. This gives the Arnold people one of the best parsonages within the state.

The membership has always been made up largely of farming people. In the days before the automobile it was impossible for these people to attend more than one service on Sunday. The church activities have heretofore been those found in the average small town or country church, namely, Sunday school, preaching twice on Sunday and prayer meeting on Wednesday night. The conception of a pastor is that he is but a hired man—not a leader, but one to obey; not a director of the work, but one to work. He comes and goes at their call. In thirty years they have had twenty different pastors while periods of six to eight months elapse between pastorates. In this time there has gone out one man into the ministry. Rev. James Judkins has served the Nebraska people as colporter faithfully for twenty years, and continues in his itinerant ministry of helpfulness.

A Last Chance

The Arnold Church became pastorless in the early summer of 1920, while Perry O. Silvara was district secretary of that part of the state. His attention was called to this field by State Secretary Ray E. York, who requested that he visit the field with view to settling a pastor. After studying the field from personal contact, three different men were recommended. The first was called, but refused to move. Another would have been called were it not for certain complications which arose between the church and the first man. He in turn refused to allow his name to come before the church. As result of these experiences and being without a pastor for eight months, the church at one of its meetings, thinking it the last chance, extended a call to the district secretary. Mr. Silvara, on receiving the announcement concerning the action of the church, felt it his duty to respond to the invitation and visit the church.

He arrived on Christmas day, Saturday, on the evening train. Following the Sunday morning service, in a conference of a dozen members of the church who tarried to talk over the question of the pastor whom they had called, an extended program of a modern rural church was discussed. It was accepted and approved by all members present as the very thing needed on this particular field. It was pointed out to this self-appointed committee by the secretary that such a program would demand a modern church plant. To which members of this committee replied, "We are willing just as soon as we get our obligations on the parsonage paid." That very Sunday evening about an hour after service it was noticed that the Baptist church building was on fire, possibly from an overheated furnace. After fighting fire until two o'clock Monday morning with the thermometer standing twelve below, the building was saved, but for the inside which had burned out. The Wednesday night prayer service that week was held in the parsonage basement. No one was willing to give up, though many eyes were so filled with tears that they could not see their way out.

The following Sunday, Secretary Silvara returned to meet with the church in the interest of the insurance which was $2,000. At the close of the morning service the church and congregation as a body insisted that he must become the pastor and take up with them the program which had been discussed the week before. It seemed to be the call of God to a man to take up His work. It was an appeal that the secretary could not turn down. He promised them there that morning in the parsonage basement while their place of worship lay in ruins; "If you are willing to cast into the cause all that you have, I am willing to cast my lot in with you, and together, God helping us, we will either sink or swim."

While working among the churches as secretary, Mr. Silvara had tried to get men to take up special rural fields within the state as a demonstration to other churches what could be done in a strictly rural community with a modern rural program. He failed to get a single church to undertake such a program or a man to consider such an undertaking. At last it seemed that God had laid his hand on him and designated the very field on which he was to undertake such a program. On the second day of January, 1921, after a conference with State Secretary Walter I. Fowle, and a letter from Small Town and Country Church Director Rolvix Harlan of New York in which both expressed themselves favorable to making the Arnold field a demonstration point, pledging not only cooperation but some financial support toward the new building and the upkeep of an automobile, the district secretary found himself accepting a call to a typical rural field without even a building in which to hold service, and the evidence of a rural demonstration point existing only in the crudest and most undeveloped natural resources that might be found on any rural field. It was his undaunted vision of what could be done, and ought to be done, in many of the Nebraska churches that spurred him to the task.

Since he could not move his family from Grand Island until the middle of March he asked the state convention for the services of Colporter James Judkins, a true man of God who knew the field, and the two went out into country schoolhouses and together held four meetings of ten days each.

Activities

The first meeting was held at Logan ten miles northwest of Arnold in a community where some thirty years ago the Methodists held a class in the King Hill schoolhouse, but which went down. There were no regular religious services to be had in the community except a union Sunday school. In this meeting eleven confessed Christ, but there was no church home closer than Arnold. A committee appointed by the community canvassed the neighborhood in the interest of a church organization. Of the sixty-five families who pledged themselves favorable to an organization, thirteen favored the Baptist, while six the Methodist and the others gave no choice. As the result of this survey a committee appointed by the community visited the Baptist pastor in Arnold and requested the Baptists to organize and take up the work on the Logan field. The first of May a group of members from the Arnold Baptist Church, with the pastor, went up to Logan and perfected the organization of a Baptist mission as an arm from the Arnold Church. This mission has all the privileges of any Baptist church and the advantage of being a member of the Baptist Rural Parish. The organization was perfected with thirteen charter members, six coming in by baptism. The union Sunday school is continued. The Logan Mission now with a membership of over twenty has preaching on the second and fourth Sunday afternoons at three o'clock, and B. Y. P. U. in the evening.

The second meeting was held in a two-room country school house five miles south of Arnold. In a survey of this school district we found fifty-three children of school age and not more than a dozen attending Sunday school any place regularly. During the ten days meeting, fourteen took a definite stand for Christ, twelve coming into the Baptist church at Arnold. A community Sunday school was organized under

A Parish Forty Miles Square

In 1919, Dr. S. P. Shaw, state secretary of South Dakota, called John W. Wynn from Marion, Ohio, and placed him on the White Owl district in the western part of the state to develop the new field. Through his efforts there have been organized ten Sunday schools, four churches, and one new meeting house and parsonage has been built.

The Pedro district extends from the Bad Lands to the Cheyenne river and is about forty miles square. Mr. Wynn has no church buildings but preaches in rural schoolhouses and at ranches. This district has four Sunday schools. The picture shows the Bourne schoolhouse, one of Mr. Wynn's preaching points eighty-five miles from the county seat, Rapid City, S. D.

What We Are Trying to Do in Michigan

We are learning that to live a church must do certain things; failing to do these, it dies.

BY THE DIRECTOR OF TOWN AND COUNTRY CHURCH WORK

THREE general principles are adhered to in our town and country church work: Reopening abandoned fields; helping living churches to work out a program so that the church will continue to survive; and opening new fields. Along with these efforts we are trying to conduct demonstration fields.

In reopening fields many factors must be taken into consideration. The shifting of the population may mean that many of the Baptists have moved away and the church cannot possibly be self-supporting. If the field in our judgment warrants it, the pastor's salary is supplemented by the state convention. We are however trying to avoid wasting our substance on riotous missions. I am advocating that the convention refuse to continue aid to a church that fails to make any effort to live. No convention is rich enough to support its lazy children. So we are asking every church receiving help to adopt a year's program suggested by this department. Sometimes we underwrite the whole of the pastor's salary for a year.

Many churches will be abandoned in the near future unless they realize and meet the needs of their communities. In order to help these churches to continue to function, a year's program has been worked out and is now being put into execution by enough churches to prove it is practical. It has eleven sections, and is planned to help any church adopting it to serve the whole community. The sections are entitled: Community-wide Household Survey and Map; Community-wide Evangelistic Program; Purposeful Visitation; Religious Education; Church Organization; Recreation and Social Life; Church Finances; Education; Religious Literature; A Community Program; The Pastor. We now have eleven of our churches following this program.

Rural Life Institutes

Six of our churches last year put on rural life institutes, running from one to three days. Some of these were in the open country and all were exceptionally well attended. There were discussed such subjects as: hog-raising; the aim of life; home economics and sanitation; religious pictures; "ye are the salt of the earth;" young people's and Sunday-school work; poultry; the need of religion. All of these were given by men and women who realized that our life must have a religious background to it.

Now and then a pastor opens up a preaching point in a schoolhouse, and we are finding that even though our state is called over-churched there are still many dwellers in the country untouched by the institution of our Master.

ter.

Three types of demonstration centers have been opened, sketches of some of these will follow. At Marshall the pastor and his rural work committee have succeeded in getting the farmers to come to the town church, rather than attend a small service in any of the nearby schoolhouses. So successful was this work that additional room will have to be secured to take care of the added attendants. At Tekonsha, a church in a community where there is a so-called union church, our Baptists have put on such an attractive program that already work has been started on a community building. Wixom is a small village of 200 inhabitants. Our church is the only one in the community. All phases of rural life have been cared for by the church, so they, too, are now raising money for a building to give more room for community activities.

We are learning that a church in order to live must do certain things, if it fails to do those acts it dies.

Demonstration Work at Tekonsha

Tekonsha is a village of 600 inhabitants, located in the center of a splendid farming district. The membership of the church is 124. The building has a small kitchen, a gallery which can be shut off for a Sunday-school room, and an average-sized auditorium, the back part of which can be closed by means of a system of doors which allows for a dining-room or prayer-meeting room. The most important adjunct to the church is a wide-awake pastor who has a vision of the possibilities of a small village church. Rev. Harry G. Kellogg has been offered a city position paying $3,000 a year, but he prefers to minister to the rural population in and about the village. He is working out an up-to-date program that shows that he believes the mission of the country church is to minister unto.

The rural life institute which he put on recently is of interest. The department of town and country church work of the state convention cooperated with the pastor in securing speakers. The director worked with the agricultural college through its extension department and secured the state director of boys' and girls' club work, and also a representative of the home economics division. A demonstrator of a can sealer company was secured and the International Harvester Company furnished charts for two lectures. Charts on various subjects of interest to farmers can be obtained by writing to the educational extension department of this company at their Chicago office. The country agricultural agent showed a willingness to assist in every way he could.

The subjects of food, clothing, sanitation and the home were presented. The pastor, and Mr. Williams, director of religious education, spoke on the devotional and spiritual sides. A lecture on "Farming in India and China" given by the director of town and country church work was for the purpose of awakening an interest in our foreign mission work. This met with an eager response, and while there is not much material available on agricultural missions, we have been able to gather together some material which we would be glad to furnish to any pastor desiring it.

Mr. Williams in his addresses considered the work necessary to be done among our young people and a conference was held for Sunday-school workers. Mr. Kellogg gave a strong address of his plans for the church. He emphasized the need of adopting a well rounded program. "The House Fly" and "A Fertile Soil Means a Prosperous People," were charts from the Harvester Company which we obtained by paying the express charges to and from Chicago. Dinner consisted of a pot-luck meal, and all went home for supper, care being taken to dismiss in time to allow the farmers to get home to attend to the chores.

The church is now at work erecting a $3,500 community hall. All that amount has been subscribed and the corner stone was laid on June 12, 1923.

This new building will accommodate everything that we need in the way of recreational activities. While the building is under construction we are working hard on a program of leisure time activities for the fall and winter that will reach all our people and large numbers of young people who do not as yet attend church. Our building measures forty by seventy-two feet. We will have a rather unique heating plant and also a fireplace built of granite stone. In order that the work done in this building may be "a means to an end" and not the end itself we shall have a director who will have to work with him a recreational and program committee. This director and committee will at all times be subject to the church.

Village Church at Prairieville

Some years ago the Baptists had a fairly prosperous church at Prairieville, twenty miles northeast from Kalamazoo. But, like many other village and rural communities the shifting population, combined with other local conditions, resulted in a gradual decrease of interest until finally all church activity ceased.

The director of the department of town and country church work sensed the need and requested the board of managers of the Michigan Convention to secure a pastor for this field, the convention to undertake to underwrite the salary in full for one year. Rev. Chas. E. Ehle was secured to undertake the task.

Coming to the field in August, 1922, Pastor Ehle found a community that had been without a resident pastor of any denomination for more than four years, during which time no services or Bible school had been held in the Baptist church. The M. E. pulpit had been supplied regularly by a non-resident pastor whose circuit required four sermons every Sunday, though his audience at this place averaged less than a dozen people. On a recent Sunday the district superintendent of the M. E. church preached to an audience consisting of the pastor of the church and four young people. Their Sunday school had ceased to exist some months before Pastor Ehle came to the field.

A Sunday school was organized September 1, preaching services are held every Sunday both morning and evening. The average attendance at Sunday school during the past ten months has been twenty-six, while the average attendance at all regular preaching services for the eleven months has been twenty-seven—this in spite of the fact that scarlet fever, measles and whooping cough have all had their innings in the community.

Other activities include the conducting of chapel exercises in the ten-grade public school every Monday morning, visiting three rural schools a number of times, preparing a series of papers to be read before the monthly meeting of the farmers' club, assisting in the work of a local Hi-Y group, and pastoral visitation. A rural life institute was held in January, the attendance increasing from nineteen the first session to more than fifty at each of the last four sessions of the three-day program. A church vacation school has been in progress just one week at the time of this writing, being directed by the pastor who is assisted in the school work by his wife and two young ladies. Each of these attended every session of the training institute held at Kalamazoo some weeks previous. The school opened with an enrolment of nine children, which number has increased to fifteen, with an average of twelve in attendance. This number might not justify the effort and expense were it not for the fact that four of these juniors are not enrolled in any Sunday school, while three or four others only come once in a while. Three homes that are never represented in church or Sunday school are represented in the church vacation school every day so far.

Early in May the pastor made a careful survey of the school district ( a ten-grade school) in which our work centers, and found 61 per cent of the whole population never attend any religious services except funerals or the chapel exercises of the public school, while 75 2/3 per cent of the homes do not have one Christian person in all their families. Is it any wonder that a large congregation and Sunday school have not been built up as yet? Would the reader consider this field inviting or promising? But what of the obligation we as Baptists owe to such a community in the light of the Great Commission? Shall we turn to more inviting fields, or will the hearts of God-loving fathers and mothers, sons and daughters, give this pastor and field a place in earnest prayer till hearts shall melt and souls enthrone their Lord and King? Two young people, a brother and sister were received as candidates for baptism and church membership a week ago. Both hope to enter Kalamazoo College next September.

In the Open Country

The Greeley Baptist Church is in the open country, two and a half miles from the nearest hamlet and sixteen miles from the nearest city. There is no other church for eight miles. The population of the entire township is about 500. Our church is trying to minister to the whole community. Most of the work must be done in spring, summer and fall, as the winters are usually severe. Last winter there were eight feet of snow between the parsonage and barn most of the time. There was sleighing from December 26 until April 29.

The church has a membership of 105. The Sunday school, with an enrolment of 130, had 137 present on a Sunday recently when the field was visited by Director Lawrence. The young people's society has an average attendance of thirty, and the men's Bible class has a membership of forty-four. There is a Booster class for young boys, and a group of women calling themselves Willing Workers keep the women in the community actively engaged in church work. They have already this year papered the parsonage, and cleaned and painted church floors.

A program is followed by the church at Greeley. No one is willing to allow God's work to drift. The men's class has a social and business meeting once a month. They are interested in taking care of the church property and accepting responsibility in the finances of the church. The young people's society sent its president to the state convention, and it puts on a social program once a month. So active has the society and church been that the entire eighth grade graduating class was baptized on a recent Sunday.

There are three Bible classes. The men's meets on Sunday. A mixed class has its meeting on Wednesday night. In the nearby hamlet there is a class meeting on Thursday evening. Each Sunday every child recites a scripture verse before the whole school.

The Gleaners and Farmers' Clubs cooperate with the church. The hall formerly owned by the Maccabees has been purchased by the church, and it is used for banquets, socials, farmers' meetings and other gatherings. The community has also purchased a new piano, installed new lights in the hall, and bought new seats for the church.

Greeley affords a pleasing picture as one drives over the neighboring hills and sees the church, community hall, parsonage, and public school all clustered together. And as one becomes acquainted with the spirit of harmony and the desire to help one another that exists in the community, he feels that here is a solution to the rural church problem.

Demonstration Work at Marshall

Marshall is a town of more than 4,000 inhabitants. The principle upon which the rural work of the Baptist church is based is that the town church can and must serve the outlying rural districts.

"All Things to All Men"

BY EDWARD DARBYSHIRE

ONE phase of the rural church problem is the matter of attendance at the Sunday night service of the city church in the boarding-house district. Most of its members live in the suburbs. While they are willing to come long distances to the morning service, the pastor cannot get an evening congregation unless he gets it from the transient population surrounding the church, many if not most of whom come from the country. As city pastors know, relatively few of these young people attend church, and though other causes may partly account for this condition, one of the chief reasons for non-attendance is probably the fact that the rural church back home was either closed or carrying on its work in such a way that it had little influence upon the young men and women. A generation ago these churches were active and influential, and many of the young people who went to the city were already Christians and believed it their duty to unite with, or at least attend some church. The stream of young life is still flowing from the country to the city, but an increasing number go as pagans instead of Christians; and because the church has meant nothing to them at home, it means still less to them in the city where new and multiplied interests crowd out all thought of such an institution.

How can this condition be remedied? The usual answer is, "By the city churches adapting their work to the special needs of this migrant population, whether students or workers." This has been done for some time with good results, especially among the students. Is it not evident that if the rural churches were to apply this principle of adapting to changed conditions at home, they could work even more effectively than the city churches because they are nearer to the source of the trouble?

Paul gives us a good biblical precedent when he says that he would be "all things to all men" that he "might by all means save some." Many city churches, and more recently a growing number of country churches, have been following Paul as he followed his Lord in ministering to the incidental (?) needs of men, while not forgetting their chief need which is God himself. The aim of Jesus was to bring men into living relationship with God, but he did not consider it a neglect of this purpose when he stopped to heal their bodies or to give them food. It might seem quite reasonable for a city church to say, "Our town has libraries, musical and literary clubs, athletic and recreational associations and a variety of other organizations! Let them supply the loaves and fishes and we will give ourselves to the ministry of the gospel." The rural church cannot say this for it is often out in the wilderness, where, unless it ministers to all the needs of the people, there is no other institution that can or will. The fact is that the church in the country has been less concerned about the totality of life than the church in the city. To continue this policy in any community means the gradual deterioration of life in that place. The evidence indicates that where physical and mental development are neglected, moral and spiritual decay begins. The church ought not to usurp the functions of any organization in the community, but wherever there is a lack the church should feel responsible for supplying it.

The principle of adaptation must also be considered in relation to what are called "competing churches." Lack of space forbids a discussion of the question of overchurched communities, but it should be noted that it is difficult to eliminate surplus churches by arbitrary action. These churches exist and we are compelled to adapt ourselves to the situation. We cannot compete with them, for a "competing church" is a contradiction in terms—that is, if a church is supposed to be like its Master who "came not to be ministered unto but to minister." If even one wise church in a community will seek to cooperate with the others, though it may be at a seeming loss to itself, the real spirit of Christ will be manifested and public opinion will be turned against the church that continues to work for selfish ends. There is a process of self-elimination going on, and the unadaptable self-seeking church with no conception of its public responsibility is the first victim of the process. All other things being equal, a church prospers in proportion to the service it gives. It is still true that "he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

Rural Church Problems

My experience as pastor of three churches in a parish in the hills of southeastern Ohio.

BY E. E. MOON

TWO of the churches were in villages, one with a population of 500, the other less than 200 and an open country church about half-way between two trading centers. All three churches were competing with another denomination whose circuit covered about the same territory. The principal occupation of the village was mining and farming extremely hilly land—the big problem of the farmer. The village was made up to a large extent of men who had retired from the farms round about, and of those who had been unsuccessful in the cities. Many of these were not interested in the welfare of the community and their sole ambition was to keep taxes as low as possible, with the result that it was difficult to launch an adequate community program.

In this community the problems were largely economic. There were frequent strikes and even when the mines were running they averaged less than three days work in the week. Farming conditions were just as bad. One farmer who owned over 600 acres could farm only fifty and the average farm was less than 100 acres. There was also the problem of transportation. The roads were unimproved and almost impassable in winter. Then, too, they were not within easy reach of markets for their products.

Here were found the usual problems of competition and overlapping. The work of the churches, schools, lodges, movies, grange and farm bureau were not coordinated and this meant useless duplication of effort. The churches were only contributing to the difficulties and were not reaching the folks in a vital way to develop leadership. There had been many short-term pastorates by uneducated men and long vacant periods in between. It was a community where "Holy-rollerism" and other types of emotional religion had prevailed. Men had saved their "souls" but had failed to attain the "abundant life."

The work of the minister in such a field was twofold: First, to give the people a wholesome viewpoint and to show the farmer the importance of his job and the dweller in the village the importance of village life in a democracy. Second, it was shown them that there are certain enjoyments and satisfactions to be had in rural communities. To do this brought out the problem of developing the latent leadership. Those in the community who were college graduates had little to do with the churches because of the narrow definition of the church's tasks. It was difficult for the churches to secure leadership among the young people, for most of them went to the cities or colleges after leaving the local high school. When a minister moved into the parish there was the temptation to be content to follow aimless rounds of traditional activities and of taking things easy and leading an uninteresting life among people accustomed to the regular dullness.

The training of the country pastor has been narrow and inadequate. His schooling in a theological way is narrowing. He has little knowledge of economics, sociology or scientific argiculture, any of which are as vital to successful work as theology. The country church can no longer be regarded as a stepping stone to a larger city church. Instead there must grow up a profession of real country clergymen who realize the importance of the job in the rural parish and know how to meet its needs. More emphasis must be put upon the town and country church work department of our denomination, and attention called to courses open to the country minister in the state agricultural college and summer assemblies where time is given to the work of the country church. In some way the work of the theological seminary and the agricultural college must be coordinated and the needs of the country church presented as a challenge to young men entering the ministry today. In this way the country minister will be better equipped to meet the economic, political, educational and recreational problems of the rural parish. It is my conviction that the problems of the rural and village churches are not likely to be solved except through a trained rural ministry.

The United Church of Garrettsville

A seven-year experiment.

BY PAYSON LEWIS CURTISS

THIRTY miles southeast of Cleveland, on the Erie Railroad, is the town of Garrettsville. Including the nearby farmers there are about 1,800 people, mostly native Americans and almost entirely Protestant. Four miles away is Hiram College, and all about us and in the town are intelligent people—sons and daughters of pioneers from New England who came west to settle this Western Reserve. We have good schools and a good community spirit. More than 100 autos were parked about our business streets last evening. Twenty-five or thirty people, including three lawyers, two insurance men and several traveling salesmen, leave every morning for their business in Cleveland. Among the interesting achievements is a seven-year successful experiment in church federation. As evidence of this statement is the fact that the committee of the Federal Council on Social and Religious surveys chose this church to be carefully studied and reported in its forthcoming volume, "Churches of Distinction in Town and Country."

Until 1916 there were four churches, each with little chance of large growth. In April of that year an unusual thing happened. The pastors of the Baptist, Disciple and Congregational churches resigned to take effect the same Sunday and soon afterward the three churches began an interesting summer experiment of a united Sunday school and a single pulpit supply. It was expected that in September the three churches would separate and call their permanent pastors, but in September there was a spontaneous desire to continue together. Committees were appointed and conferences held. The Methodist church was invited to join in the proposed federation but upon the advice of its district superintendent decided not to do so. Under the guidance of some level-headed laymen, a working union of the three churches was formed which with a few minor amendments is the governing law today.

In all local matters the United Church is one church with one pastor, one board of trustees, one budget and one worshiping body. Yet each of the three churches maintains intact its church roll, has its own annual meeting and retains actively its denominational affiliations. All the property was leased to the trustees of the United Church for five years with the privilege of continuance. The larger of the church buildings was chosen for the united services. One of the other buildings has been transformed into a very serviceable community house with gymnasium, shower baths and other equipment. The third building has been rented for offices, but is now for sale.

One of the interesting conclusions from this seven-year experiment is that the churches have lost nothing in denominational affiliations while making large gains in economy, efficiency, breadth of view and enthusiasm of numbers. Each year our Baptist delegates to the Trumbull association of Baptist churches have reported much larger contributions to benevolences than was ever possible before. This church was the banner church of the association in pledging its full quota in the New World Movement and has paid its pledge promptly each year. That in itself is a simple historical fact to be thoughtfully digested when one is thinking about the waste of too many churches. In former years this church received two and three hundred dollars a year to maintain its current expenses. A similar report might be given of the other two churches in the federation.

Also there has been a real gain in the amount and breadth of missionary education. Mission leaders of the different denominations and missionaries home on furlough have come frequently to the church. In the every-member canvass a special pledge-card affords opportunity for each member to indicate his denominational preference. All undesignated gifts and all special offerings are divided equally among the three churches.

We believe sincerely in the possibilities of this kind of union work. It can be done wherever there is the will to cooperate. The difficulties are not serious if the people are given a fair chance to try out the plan. There is a real gain in better mutual understanding. Instead of suspicion or distance there is growing appreciation. One life-long Baptist remarked that she had not known there were so many good people in town. A Congregational husband and wife speak with enthusiasm of their growing acquaintance with and new friendship for certain Disciple and Baptist families. So far as I know there is not an individual in the United Church who does not look upon the experiment as a success and no longer an experiment.

The People on "Our Street"

By Mrs. Albertus Pieters

"OUR STREET" is Nishi-shin-machi, Oita, Japan. You will perhaps not find Oita on your map of Japan, but it ought to be marked on the northeast corner of the island of Kiushiu, the most southern of the four larger islands of Japan, right on the Pacific Ocean. Please notice that the name Oita should not be pronounced with an accent on the second syllable, as many "foreigners" mistakenly do. Pronounce the O long, and then slip off the other two syllables softly and easily, bewaring of accent.

The population of the city is about 34,000 and we trust it is like Corinth of old, of which the Lord said. "I have much people in this city." Se we are trying to find these people and bring them to him.

The name of "Our Street," Nishi-shin-machi, tells you that it is in the west (nishi) part of town, and that it was once new (shin), although, judging by the moss on some of the thatched roofs, one would not think of newness. Nishi-shin-machi is not an aristocratic avenue. It is only twenty feet wide. Sidewalks? Nishi-shin-machi folks don't know what they are, nor, for that matter, does any street in Oita have them. We don't need to keep out of the way of autos or fast horses, so can walk right in the middle of the street. The poor horses that draw rickety cars with heavy loads are not likely to go so fast as to be dangerous, and besides the drivers do not sit in their carts but lead their horses.

The jinricksha pullers shout "he, he, he" when there is the remotest danger of collision, so our street is quite wide enough for practical purposes.

We did not choose to live on this street, but as our mission does not own a residence in Oita, we have to live wherever a Japanese house can be rented. We found one that had been used in turn as a nurses' home, a restaurant, and a doctor's office and a residence, so the landlord was willing to rent it even to foreigners with their clumsy furniture and foolish notions.

We did not like the location very well as the neighborhood is very noisy, but it was the best we could do, so we forced a smile and said, "Shikata ga nai" (no help for it) in true Japanese fashion. I fear the Nishi-shin-machi neighbors, who saw us move in sighed as they said, "Shikata ga nai."

But I was goin to tell about the people on our street. There are a great many of them, as it is a street of little shops joining one another. The fronts are used as shops, or miniature factories, while the families, some quite numerous, live in one or two rooms in the rear, with perhaps some additional little rooms upstairs. As many of the little shops are also factories, we find one of the neighbors engaged in carding cotton and making it into nice soft sheets of cotton batting.

In another room wooden clogs are made and sold. The poor apprentice, whom we can see from an upstairs window, knows no eight or ten-hour work day, for he sits on the floor with his tools from early morning till ten or eleven o'clock at night. Sunday is no rest day for him, but like many other laborers in Japan, he has two holidays a month, a middle-month, and an end-month holiday.

Next to us, on the other side of our garden, for we have a garden with crooked pines, toll palms, mounds and stone lanterns, all compressed into a small space, is a dyer who finds our street wide enough to put up little stretching contrivances to dry his goods. In the rear of our house is a cooper pounding away at his tubs, big and little though we cannot see him.

There is also a dirty-looking little place where soy beans are steamed, pressed and made into square cakes that look like white soap not yet fully hardened. It is very nourishing and with proper flavoring and seasoning forms a very important part of Japanese diet. Nearly opposite us is a second-hand store that displays dreadful rubbish and the man matches his wares. He tries to entertain his friends by playing on broken fiddles and singing songs when intoxicated.

One of our neighbors is a barber who has an English sign, Onosi Yticatio which greatly puzzles our foreign guests till they try reading it backwards. The man Isono has not yet learned what topsy-turvy people we English-speaking folks are. A short time ago there was a funeral there, as the young wife died. It seems that they lost their only child, and the young mother grieved herself sick and died soon after. We only heard this story when we saw her Buddhist funeral. After all, how little we do know of the people on "our street." If we had known we might have found some way of bringing her a little comfort. Neither grief nor a sense of propriety kept the barber a widower more than a few weeks.

A very narrow passage between two shops leads to a space in the rear where there are little cottages. In one of these lives a maker of "tatami" (floor mats of straw with matting cover) who, with his wife became Christians not very long ago. They have a baby boy whom they brought to church to be baptized when he was about six weeks old. The woman says life seems so different and her thoughts have changed so much since she "entered the faith." And no wonder. Friends arranged the match, for it was not a marriage, and discreetly suppressed facts that might hinder their success, so after the young people were living together, the young man made discoveries that made him wish to get rid of the girl. At that time he first heard the gospel and it impressed him. He was asked by the missionary whether he was married and whether the Bible woman might call. He naively, and without much embarrassment, told that he had "received" a wife, but that he was not satisfied with her, and it was only a trial marriage; he thought he would return her. Still he gave the desired permission, and after some months they both requested baptism. They were both willing to have the registration that would make their marriage legal. The young woman was greatly surprised to find how the Christian religion guards the woman and the home. Her husband led one of his fellow workmen to Christ, the two are trying to interest others. This is the only Christian family on our street. On Sundays quite a troop of little folks clatter on their little clogs and go to Sunday school with us. The parents willingly permit this, but they themselves are hard to reach for they are much tied down by family decisions and Buddhist customs.

Do the people on our street have only work and no play? Oh no! Right here, only a block or two apart, we find two large theater buildings. Just now the old theatrical performances seem to be giving way to moving picture shows which are very popular. We see large notices, enlivened by large colored illustrations at the corner, most dreadful to behold sometimes.

Thus do we extend our national reputation. But aren't the people religious at all? Just walk along our street and you will see a little temple called Tenjin sama dedicated to a shrewd politician, who on his death a thousand years ago became a god and is much worshipped. No meetings are held there, but many passers-by stop and bow, while old women may be seen reciting a bit of prayer in front of the building sometimes. The yard is bare and untidy and used by the children as a playground.

A little further on, back from the street, is a priest's house, where little ceremonies seem to be held occasionally, especially funerals that are most gorgeous with their carts with wax dolls, finely dressed, and large wreaths of artificial flowers of most brilliant hues, this is the latest style, and seems peculiar to this sect of Buddhists. Still a little farther on is a very large Buddhist temple whose bells, gongs and drums are constantly reminding us of its presence. On special occasions we can hear priests rattling off or droning out prayers.

Frequently begging priests with large bags hanging from their necks go along the street like mendicant friars in Europe did some centuries ago, and as they ring their bell and chant their dreary song, the women come out and put a bowlful of uncooked rice in their bag, or give them a few coppers.

At New Year's time some priests' apprentices, dressed somewhat like priests, may be seen drawing in a cart a queer, comical figure made of cardboard, much painted and representing a fat jolly man sitting tailor fashion. This represents the god of wealth or good luck, and by paying a few cents one can have a formula rattled off by the young priest, and receive a slip of paper with some characters in Chinese; then one is sure of good luck for the year.

The educational value to us of living on Nishi-shin-machi is very great as we observe as they really are the common classes who comprise by far the greatest number.

But our mat-maker and his wife, with the change that has come to their home, give us great joy and encouragement. We hope and pray that many other homes may find a similar blessing and that there may be many transformed men and women on "our street."—From a leaflet published by the Woman's Foreign Mission Board of the Reformed Church in America.

The Story of a Paper Lantern

By Mrs. C. K. Lippard

WHEN Tsumenari was a very small boy his mother took him to a temple up in the mountains to learn to be a priest. At first he waited on the priests, cleaned their rooms, served their food, dusted the idols and swept the big prayer drum which they said awakened the gods that were asleep. He learned many short meaningless prayers by heart and repeated them over and over for the people who came up to pray at twilight while he beat the big drum. After a while he became a real priest.

Then he could wear a long brocade robe with beautiful flowing sleeves. The people bowed down before him as he passed. They brought him the best rice that grew in their fields, the finest fish they caught, the fattest ducks they shot when out hunting. He was flattered and petted and well fed and clothed and comfortable. After a while he became high priest of seven temples.

Tsumenari had a paper lantern that he carried about at night as he walked through the dark mountain roads where there were no lights of any kind to guide him. On the lantern he had painted a swastika. This sign means Buddhism, the heathen religion he had been taught, just as the cross means our religion.

But the young priest was not very happy. He saw that the gods the people prayed to were only wood and stone. He had no faith in them. He knew the priests taught things they did not believe or live. They laughed at the people who brought them gifts and sacrifices. He liked to wander down to the great city at night after twilight prayers were over. He often went into the bookstores and read there.

One night he found a strange new book. He began to read it, standing there in the crowded shop. It was so interesting he read on and on. Finally he came to a chapter about priests. The great teachers in the book called them hypocrites. He described their long flowing robes, their meaningless prayers, the way they fooled the people. Tsumenari read it over and over. That chapter seemed to be written just for him.

"I must have this book," he thought. But he knew well he would not dare to take it home with him. Something told him this was the forbidden book of which he had heard. He felt that he could not read it where the priests could see. Yet he could not give it up. He paid for the little book, hid it in his long, flowing sleeve, and started home carrying his bright paper lantern to lighten his way.

The next evening at twilight when people came to pray and it was his turn to beat the big prayer drum, the priest kept the little book hidden in his great sleeve on his idle arm and read it all the time he repeated over and over the prayers he knew so well by heart. He did this every day till he knew the book almost by heart, too.

Some way it made him more and more restless. He read of a great teacher in his new book and he wanted to learn more about him. So he went to the city oftener and oftener, trying to find a way to hear more of the Jesus-teacher.

One night as he was walking the streets he heard a queer sound. It would not be new to you or me but it was new to him, for it was little children singing Christian hymns. Tsumenari had never heard such a thing before. But as soon as he heard the name of Jesus in the songs they sang, he knew he had found the place he was looking for. There stood a great big American who looked like a devil to the Japanese priest, but he was not a bit afraid. He pushed through the crowd in front of the little street-side chapel, stepped up on the matted floor, leaving his shoes below, blew the light out of his lanterns and sat down to hear.

The missionary preached and Tsumenari listened. He learned more about Jesus. He found he was not only a God but a Saviour. And the man decided right there he could not be a heathen priest any more.

When Tsumenari was baptized he had to give up his seven temples, his brocade robe, and his flowing sleeves. The people who had brought him gifts and bowed before him, hissed at him and spit upon him as he passed. He had to scrub floors and wash windows to earn rice to eat. But he was happy for he was studying, too, so that he could go out and teach others about Jesus. He took his paper lantern on which he had painted the heather swastika and on top of it he painted a big cross.

For twenty-two years he walked the mountain roads, carrying the lantern as a Buddhist priest. And now for twenty-seven years he has walked the busy streets of the cities of Japan, as a Christian worker, carrying the lantern with the light shining through the cross. Tsumenari is now the oldest Lutheran pastor in Japan.—(From "Some of Our Own," published by Woman's Lutheran Board.)

Baptist Forward Movement in Japan

1. When American Baptists undertook the New World Movement, the Baptists of Japan likewise set for themselves goals that called forth courage and tireless endeavor. The first goal was to double the financial subscriptions of the Japanese churches in five years. At the end of the fourth year the subscriptions had more than doubled. At the end of the fifth year they had been trebled.

2. The second task was to double the number of self-supporting churches. In 1916 there were four such; at the end of four years there were six, with another almost ready to join the ranks. "The raising of these churches to self-support means far more than relieving the American churches of a financial burden. It means the setting in motion of the real agency by which Japan is to be evangelized and won for Christ. The missions are temporary. These churches are living parts of the Japanese empire that will not only work more efficiently than we have worked, but will go on creating other churches."

3. The third goal was doubling the church-membership. That goal is not yet in sight. During 1922 special evangelistic services were held in many places, especially in Tokyo, where the meetings at the tabernacle were crowded. Young men and women from the night-schools attended meetings after classes closed, and many were baptized. More than 300 were baptized in all the churches. Rev. William Wynd, a missionary of more than thirty years' experience, says, "In Japan baptism and church-membership do not necessarily follow conversion. This is a land of opposites, and the growth of the church does not keep pace with the growth of the kingdom."

Some Types of Social Service

1. Dormitories. Waseda has become known to Baptists through the remarkable Christian hostel and brotherhood maintained by our society under the direction of Doctor Benninghoff. With the completion of Scott Hall, this work is suitably housed. Here students from all parts of Japan find comfortable quarters at reasonable rates, among Christian surroundings. Christian students are united in the Waseda brotherhood, out of which two years ago grew a regular Baptist church. In connection with this church, the students conduct a Sunday-school for sixty or seventy children from the neighborhood. A university professor said, "Every movement for moral improvement in the life of the university in the last ten years has had its origin in the Christian dormitories." A similar dormitory is conducted for women students.

Baptists also conduct dormitories for young business men and women in Tokyo and Yokohama.

2. In the homes. A fruitful phase of kindergarten work is through the mothers' meetings and contact with the homes. Many mission kindergartens are located in the poorest quarters of the cities, and are definitely devoted to neighborhood improvements through the children. Day-nurseries also exercise a wholesome and uplifting influence.

The touch of the missionary's home is likewise vital in the neighborhood. Miss Helen Elgie Scott works in Osaka, called the Pittsburgh of Japan. She says: "When we took up our residence in the Tsuru Machi district of west Osaka, we found our neighbors expectantly eager for all we might bring them. So we plan the program of our home with these two questions in mind: What do our neighbors need and what have we to give them? One of the most apparent needs is that of instruction in the care of babies. No other city in the world has so high a death-rate as Osaka—250 per thousand in 1921. A Little Mothers' Club, conducted each Saturday afternoon in our home teaches its members how to care for their baby brothers and sisters. Another day is given to mothers who wish to learn how to prepare nourishing food for their families. They are taught how to prepare well-balanced, nutritious meals from the common Japanese materials within their reach. A by-product of the cooking-classes is instruction in proper kitchen arrangements to conserve time and strength. Japanese women are slaves to time-consuming routine that may be easily avoided by a few simple time-saving arrangements."

3. Classes. The largest piece of social service is carried on at Misaki Tabernacle. Classes in English for girls, a school for girls, a school for apprentices, working men's meetings, young men's English evening school, lectures, motion pictures, etc., give young men and women an opportunity for training otherwise impossible.

In each of the four night-schools, a regular period is set aside for religious instruction. Here they are brought face to face with Christ and the claims of the higher life.—Adapted from Service.

Out Among the Young Folks

EAST WASHINGTON YOUNG PEOPLE are greatly rejoiced over the prospect of new summer assembly grounds. "Weonahome" is heard on every hand. The young people are giving showers for necessary kitchen materials and the prospects for the summer assembly are fine.

BROOKLYN AND LONG ISLAND YOUNG people are planning a great season at their Fresh Air Home this summer. "Sunshine Acres" is a very dear spot to a large number of boys and girls of Brooklyn. This is one of the finest pieces of work being done by any young people's organization in the United States and Canada.

MICHIGAN STATE B. Y. P. U. CONVENTION will be held during the state assembly at Kalamazoo College, July 27 to Aug. 5. Rev. Mark F. Sanborn, president of the Baptist Young People's Union of America is one of the speakers.

INDIANA STATE B. Y. P. U. CONVENTION will be held on Aug. 8 as a part of the Indiana Baptist Assembly, meeting at Franklin, Aug. 13-18.

TENNESSEE B. Y. P. U. CONVENTION was held at Memphis, June 12-16. The keynote of the convention was "Christ Preeminent."

KANSAS BAPTIST SUMMER ASSEMBLY will be held at Ottawa, Aug. 6-16. Miss Edna Umstot is state director and is building a splendid program.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, ANNUAL CITY B. Y. P. U. banquet was held Thursday, Apr. 10 at Euclid Church. The speaker was Dr. E. C. Smith.

CLEVELAND CITY B. Y. P. U. held its annual election and rally at First Church on Apr. 27.

NORTHWESTERN B. Y. P. U. OF MINNESOTA is one of the pioneer organizations of young people in the state. The last rally was held in Detroit, Apr. 20, 1923.

ALBERTA YOUNG PEOPLE have organized a young people's convention for the province. Their first session will be held in connection with the assembly at Gull Lake. Rev. A. C. Bingham, with the MacDonald Church, is chairman of the program committee.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y., B. Y. P. U. publishes The B. Y. P. U. Trumpet. It is a newsy sheet put out in the interest of the Emmanuel Church.

JANESVILLE, WISCONSIN, B. Y. P. U. publishes The B. Y. P. U. Breeze. This is one of the greatest publications coming to the desk of the editor. It is brimful of good things about the young people of the church. Its main mission is to "sell" young people's activities to the older folks of the church.

International Sunday School Lesson for July 29

MATTHEW, THE PUBLICAN
Lesson: Matt. 9:9-13; Luke 5:27-32
Golden Text: Luke 5:32

Introductory

Matthew was a tax collector at Caperaum—a Little Mokhes, the most despised of all tax collectors. Tax collectors were numerous, for there was little that the Romans did not tax. Jesus had just healed the paralytic at Capernaum, following which he saw Matthew.

The Lesson

"And as Jesus passed by he saw a man (ever did the Master have the seeing eye for men) called Matthew, sitting at the place of toll." A despised man at a despised work—how many stopped to notice Matthew in the many that passed by during the day? But Jesus said unto him, "Follow me." It was not among the places of the high and mighty that Jesus sought men to follow him—Zaccheus up in a tree, the despised woman, the humble tax collector—these he took the trouble to call personally. Matthew arose and followed him. This is the account of Matthew's conversion as told by himself and it speaks much for Matthew in its unassuming dignity and brevity. The next scene is that of Jesus "at meat in the house" (Matthew's.) Publicans and sinners (that is those who did not perform the rites demanded by religious leaders) came and sat with Jesus and the disciples, and also some of the Pharisees. They began their usual criticism, saying to the disciples, "Why eateth your Teacher with the publicans and sinners?" Jesus hearing gave a Jesus answer "They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick." The last two verses of the lesson give Luke's account of the conversion of Matthew.

Leading Thoughts

1. The Master speaks: the disciple unquestioningly obeys. 2. Is the chief thought of Christians today being given to those that are sick and have need of a physician? 3. Matthew's was no mere lip service; it was giving up the lucrative "job" that meant his daily living.

A Correlated Program for the Youth of the Church

By Clarence W. Kemper

On its face value we are to consider a church program and it must be unified and correlated. Conditions within and without the church make it imperative.

A process of unification is on in the whole life of the church. Evangelism no longer stands for a period of two weeks in the worst weather of the year but a continuous accent through the year. Education is no longer a thing apart and no church can have or do without a church school at will. The modern Sunday school is the whole church in training.

Missions is not a spasm of seasons but the continuous interest of the church expressed presumably by every member every week. Even our current expense budgets are becoming unified so that every offering is in the name of the church whether taken in worship, in the school or any other meeting.

Youth deserves and merits such a program. While blaming no one we have followed a policy of opportunism in the past. When we felt a need we merely hitched on another activity. We have had at one time popular mass movements in Christian Endeavor, Epworth League, Baptist Young People's Union, etc., and they served a great purpose. We have had Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Camp Fires, and today closely organized classes and departments have come. Pity youth for how its interest is bidden for through multiplied organization! It deserves better at our hands. The church owes more to its youth than this opportunist policy indicates.

The church must re-think youth and furnish a natural program and not scatter fire over the whole field. Professor Glover says the first Christians outthought the people of their day. Splendid! Many of us regret to see the church fail in facing her tasks. We have got to get down to bed-rock here. It may mean sloughing off some things. It will mean adaptation and correlation certainly.

Let's take a look at the people we call our youth. They come in three sets. Intermediates from twelve to fourteen years. Seniors from fifteen to seventeen years and young people from eighteen to twenty-three. The first are self-conscious, the second are wise, and the third are coming to the experience of mature men and women.

They should mainly function as departments for there they are most at home with occasionally a great social function so broad and general in its planning as to interest the whole division. A part of the devotional programs of Sunday evenings may well be massed in a great assembly with say two-thirds of the hour left for departmental expressional program.

This program must be four-square. We are told that "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man." Here is the physical, mental social and religious. The equipments of our churches today are answering to this four-sided development of our Master.

Week-day physical activities are not optional activities but it is merely optional with the church as to whether it will keep youth coming its way. When it ceases to care for youth in mid-week activities it ceases to have youth, that is all. God made youth that way so the blame is rather on the church if it fails to function at this point. It must stand for downright work at the school hour. That is the time to dig into the greatest treasury—the Bible—while baseball can be treated at other times. Make the Bible loom big as it is. Call for reports, set tasks and expect something.

The social life can be cared for through the run of the week through class groups and occasionally department groups. That social life must be fed in a wholesome way or it will be fed otherwise even if it must feed on husks. When youth asks for bread of social values, let us not give a stone by turning aside and failing it.

Youth is most sensitive to religion. Never let another young person hear you say "opening exercises of the school." Is that the level of worship? Make that fifteen-minute period worship of such dignity and so appealing that it catches youth. "The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him." We must not worship for youth. We do not eat and read for youth. This is their time for growing in social worship. Stand aside, just advise and let young people lead in all the expression of that precious period.

Direct these three groups of youth to meet in their respective departments for the Sunday evening expressional activities. Let it be varied widely. Church of Jesus Christ, cultivate the personal and individual devotional life if you would have strong men and women tomorrow. We must give them some simple clues.

To the person who can take these factors and put them together into one great well-related whole, will the church owe a debt of deep obligation and in the meanwhile it is upon all of us to seek out the more excellent way to harness the energies of youth for the kingdom of God.

The initial celebration in connection with the three hundredth anniversary of the coming of the Huguenots which will be officially commemorated in 1924, took place June 24 at Huguenot Park, Staten Island, N. Y., where the corner stone was laid for the Huguenot Church, which will be erected as a national memorial of the Huguenot-Walloon-New Netherland tercentenary. The dedication of the church will be one of the events of the tercentenary next year.

Our Own Folks

Who's Who in Rural Work

A report of the work of a number of rural workers under appointment by the American Baptist Home Mission Society, prepared by Dr. Rolvix Harlan, secretary social service and rural community work of the Home Mission Society, gives the following:

Rev. George W. Lawrence is director of town and country church work for Michigan. Mr. Lawrence was reared in a village in New Jersey. He was graduated from Princeton University and Crozer Seminary, and while in the seminary faced the proposition of devoting his life to foreign work, city or country work, and made definite choice of country work. He was pastor first in a little village of four hundred people in central New York, and although there were three other churches in the community, he was able to revive and strengthen the work of the Baptist church; to introduce social activities among the different age groups; and to organize the community for a number of community events. Moving to a country field in Ohio, he gained further experience in organizing a troop of Boy Scouts and Camp Fire Girls, and a township men's organization, introducing many forms of community service with the church as the inspiration, furnishing the spiritual and ethical motivation. His evangelistic effort in this field resulted in a 50 per cent increase in church membership. The property was put in excellent shape. As a mark of recognition of his wide community interests, just before he left the field he was elected secretary of the township chamber of commerce. He left his Ohio charge to make the Interchurch World Movement rural survey in the state of New Jersey. He has been director of town and country church work in Michigan for nearly two years.

His program has included during the past year the visiting of a large number of the country churches, acquainting ministers and people with the splendid work done by successful country churches. He has emphasized the organization of the young people's work and work for men, with a community service program, and has secured the introduction of such organizations into a number of places.

The director conducted a course at the summer assembly in rural church work; has conducted two evangelistic campaigns; arranged for missionary meetings in open country churches for returned missionaries, and has cooperated in the promotional work to assist in the financial campaign. During his vacation he gave a course of lectures at the school for rural pastors, at Penn State College, on rural organization work, and a course at Michigan Agricultural College on rural organization work.

A somewhat similar program has been carried out by Rev. William H. Thompson, director of town and country church work in Ohio. His activities have been as follows:

Conducting institutes and conferences on rural church problems.

Interviews with pastors and pulpit committees, and leaders of the churches.

Supplying pulpits, bringing the message of the new day for country church work.

By personal interview bringing the challenge or claims of the rural pastorate to college and university students.

Conducted survey of town and church in one county for the Ohio Federation of Churches.

Assisted in conducting county conferences on religious situation revealed by statewide survey.

Located trained pastors in three fields to do demonstration work.

Distributed pamphlet literature to pastors on rural life.

Established circulating library of thirty-five volumes for rural pastors.

Cooperated with the Ohio Federation of Churches in summer school for ten days for rural pastors, at the Ohio State University. Secured attendance of sixteen Baptist ministers, the largest group from any one denomination.

Gave lectures and conducted conferences at the Ohio Baptist Assembly.

Given special attention to certain fields developing standard town and country church program.

Directed fifteen men in making survey and charting their parishes.

Has special study of one association under way, ascertaining tendencies for past twenty years and present program.

In general has tried to develop an esprit de corps among town and country pastors.

Rev. Clark H. Bancroft is director of rural work, a full department not having as yet been established. For a good part of the year he has been acting pastor of the church at Reedley, saving the church, to the denomination and demonstrating a program for the small town church. Being his first year in this work in California, and a new field of effort for the state convention, and California being quite different from other sections of the country, he has few precedents to guide him other than his own successful experience as pastor of a country church and a general worker in Nebraska. His work has been principally in the wonderful fruit growing San Joaquin Valley, where small ranch adjoins ranch, making an almost continuous village in the irrigated section, with numerous towns as trade centers. He has done what might be called "case work" with churches and pastors in leading them to see the wonderful opportunities in community service.

Rev. F. W. Benjamin is director of small town and rural church work in Nebraska, and began his work on Nov. 1, 1921. Nebraska is a definitely agricultural state, and the director in this state, who was educated at Denison and Crozer, has had marked success in church building enterprises, and in evangelistic work which has built up strong country churches. He has been giving his time almost entirely to field work, visiting discouraged churches, and churches which are desirous of more fully meeting their responsibility, surveying situations, and helping develop the local program. One of our very best demonstration parishes is at Arnold, Neb., where a program to reach out from the town center to four outlying communities is being developed, and a building now in course of erection to house the enterprise at the center.

Rev. F. W. Tomlinson began work in New York State Feb. 1, 1922. He had ten years of successful experience in developing a wonderfully strong village church in New York State, which ministers to a farming population. He has had experience in general work with the state convention, and having been thoroughly trained at Colgate, comes with excellent preparation to his new task. He has already arranged for numerous one-day conferences in country churches; has organized a summer school for country ministers, and made surveys. The 400 town and country churches of New York state make his department one of the most important in the entire work of the state convention.

The department in the home mission society has cooperated in a few places in the securing of better equipment for country churches, but the amount of money available for this purpose has been so limited that only a fraction of the rural opportunities of this sort can be met. Only the completion of a financial program as comprehensive as that of the New World Movement will enable the department to meet all of the challenges that are coming before it.

Detroit Baptist Doings

By Albert H. Finn

The past few weeks have been strenuous days with so many annual meetings and conventions. Each called for much added labor and anxiety in preparation for and attendance, and in shaping up our denominational interests for the summer vacation period. Then superintendents, pastors and laymen and laywomen of necessity seek to relax and get a change of scene so necessary to efficient service in these days of high pressure living.

I have already given an account of the annual meeting of the Detroit Union. Close upon it came the annual meeting of the Michigan Convention, held at Hillsdale and immediately after followed the great gathering at Atlantic City, of the Northern Baptist Convention. These were all inspiring conventions. Our Baptist constituency is greatly heartened and preparations for the new convention years are going forward with enthusiasm and zeal. We, in Detroit, are looking forward with great expectancy to the unfoldments of the coming months. There are several conferences planned that will undoubtedly be of great constructive influence.

There has been one annual meeting which has not as yet been mentioned in print and that was the third anniversary of the advisory council, for negro work, of the Detroit Union. Comparatively speaking, Detroit is receiving a greater number from the southern negro migration than any other northern city. These are prosperous times industrially in this rapidly growing city. The word has been passed along seemingly, to the ends of the earth. The influx of men, women and children is severely testing the housing accommodations of Detroit, notwithstanding the unparalleled building operations. It is serious enough to attempt to care for the whites that are flocking in by hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands and when it comes to the negro, coming by trainloads, and whose coming is not so welcome for reasons of racial prejudice, the social and housing problems are almost beyond imagination. The pastors of our negro churches are put to their wits' ends to provide accommodations for these newer arrivals, but they are heroically endeavoring to meet the problem.

The Advisory Council

The advisory council is made up of negro and white brethren. This is the agency through which the Detroit Union functions in its widespread endeavor to minister to our negro brethren. So large a percentage of these migrants are Baptists that it is a peculiarly Baptist problem. The Baptist Christian Center for negroes, is doing a remarkable work, but it is handicapped in its opportunities because of its inadequate plant. Miss Alexander and Mr. Clay are doing fine service and Miss Harriet Cooper, who has general supervision of our women missionaries, has been a wonderful factor in the accomplishments of the Christian center. A women's auxiliary from the negro churches is finally getting a vision and is doing a real constructive service.

Doctor Bradby, pastor of the old Second Baptist, our oldest and leading negro church, is superintendent of the work among his race. He sometimes gets discouraged until he goes to some other city and is able to make some comparison, when he returns with new faith and vigor to his great task.

Mr. Robert Ernst, one of our splendid Baptist laymen, was elected president of the advisory council and is also seventh vice-president of the Detroit Union and chairman of its committee on negro work. This is a new development to tie the two organizations into closer working unity.

Doctor Gleiss, our general superintendent, was southern born and has an intimate knowledge of negro psychology, which is an important element in successful ministry to our negro brethren.

Following the annual meeting of the advisory council, a heart-to-heart conference of negro and white brethren was called for Tuesday evening, June 19, at the Woodward Avenue Church. There was no set program. Vice President Klyver of the Detroit Union, presided. Doctor Gleiss stated the purpose of the meeting and Doctor Bradby opened with a statement from the negro brethren, when a frank, open, sincere discussion followed as to housing, industrial, social, vice and other problems incident to this great influx of Southern negroes. A committee to help in the housing situation was appointed, but the interchange of viewpoints has done a world of good toward a better understanding and goodwill. I can heartily recommend such a meeting to all of our great northern cities.

The Hartford Avenue Church, negro, that has become almost hopelessly involved in its building operations, has again appealed to the Detroit Union, agreeing to turn over its property to the union that it may unravel the many legal entanglements, properly finance and complete their house of worship. This has been undertaken and now it is expected the church will be in its new home before snow flies.

The Hurlbut Avenue Church is the living embodiment of the former Gratoit Avenue, Helen Avenue, Calvary, Harding Avenue, St. Clair Heights, now many in one. A beautiful new house of worship is now having the roof put on. The corner stone was laid after appropriate ceremonies on Sunday, June 10, President Power, of the Detroit Union, presiding. The church is still worshiping in the chapel on Harding Avenue. The new site is on Hurlbut just off East Warren Avenue, a most advantageous location and the church is throbbing with gladsome expectation, when they shall have moved into their new home in November. Rev. C. F. Hamilton is the popular pastor of this thriving east side church.

The Grand River Avenue church, near Monnier Road, has already outgrown the chapel built for it less than one year ago, a careful study of the present tendencies has, by request of the church, induced the Detroit Union to purchase a new site in Strathmore village, just beyond the present site, an assured residential section of the better type. This will call for a new and permanent building in the near future. This suburb of Detroit is growing tremendously and a strong, self-supporting church will soon result. Rev. E. J. Parsons, the present pastor, is doing a splendid work.

Another strategic work is that in Dearborn. The Baptists were slow in getting started there because of the multitude of pressing needs. Something substantial must be done this present year for Dearborn. On the Nine Mile Road, east of Ferndale, is a growing Baptist mission that is calling for the help and leadership of the Detroit Union and steps are already taken for a strategic location for a worthy work.

The work heretofore done for the fine body of Ukrainian brethren is urgently calling for a more substantial support. J. P. Zinkiw has been engaged to shepherd this group and we look for splendid results. Doctor Gleiss spent Sunday, June 24, with these brethren when they organized as a regular Baptist church and will ask recognition by the Detroit Association.

The Baptists in Detroit are leading all other denominations in the number of daily vacation Bible schools. Rev. B. T. Leonard, religious education director of the Detroit Union, assisted by the local pastors and missionaries, is leading in this important work. Our foreign-speaking white and our negro Baptist churches are entering heartily into this comparatively new type of evangelism. Each year sees a new advance.

June 25 was Baptist Day at Bob-Lo. This is an annual get-together of our Baptist Bible schools. Bob-Lo is a beautiful island at the mouth of the Detroit river as it flows into Lake Erie. It is an ideal playground and the Detroit and Windsor Ferry Company have fitted it up at large expense for a wholesome picnic ground. Beautiful and commodious steamers ply between Detroit and the island. The day was ideal, even though the temperature was high, for the river and lake breezes ameliorated the hot wave. Nearly 5,000 Baptists gathered at Bob-Lo. There was a full program of sports and a fine spirit of fellowship was evidenced everywhere on the spacious island.

The Baptist brotherhood has made it possible for Doctor Gleiss to attend the sessions of the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm and then visit the continent where he will meet many of the brethren that know of Detroit or have gone back to the fatherland after residence in Detroit. The reflex influence upon Poland, Roumania, Serbia, Hungary, Germany, Bohemia, and other countries that have large groups in Detroit and among which our Baptist work has been greatly flourished, is one of the happy fruitages of our Detroit Baptist work. Doctor Gleiss has a wide acquaintance there and will no doubt, greatly help the struggling interests there and be better able to minister to the foreign-speaking groups in Detroit upon his return in September.

Detroit will be largely represented in the great Boston convention of the Baptist Young People's Union of America. President Sanborn, pastor of the First Church, will direct the convention as presiding officer and the vigorous Detroit delegates will surely do their share in making the Boston convention "the greatest ever."

The spirit of aggressive evangelism is manifest. Additions are being made constantly. Special mention should be made of the splendid results that are following the wise and consecrated leadership of Pastor Lang, at Beulah.

THE FIRST CHURCH, MELROSE, makes a feature of life enlistment Sunday. Seven young people of the church who are in training for Christian service conducted the evening service Sunday, June 24. Rev. Philetus H. McDowell is pastor.

HONORARY DEGREES HAVE NOT come in showers this year. Thus the few granted have been made conspicuous and have provoked satisfaction. Harvard's degree of S. T. D. to Pres. G. E. Horr of Newton is a gratifying acknowledgment of a high type of leadership in the field of theological education. The D. D. of Colby to Rev. Otis

W. Foye of Dorchester Temple Church is much enjoyed by his many friends and brother ministers. Doctor Foye's equipment and accomplishments give him high rank.

ORDINATIONS HAVE COME IN GROUPS since the schools closed. The unmistakably fine quality of the young ministers has awakened unusual interest and satisfaction. Their intelligent maturity and unaffected consecration make one confident that they are equipped to give good service to the churches that have called them.

THE MINISTERS' "OUTING" set for the twenty-fifth at Post's Island struck a hot wave, so that quite a number of the brethren and their wives gave it absent treatment. About fifty men, women and children braved the rigors of recreation and made the best of the social privilege and the bathing.

HON. W. E. BLODGETT, ex-mayor of Woburn and one of the state's best laymen, has had a siege of surgery at the Corey Hill hospital. He is gratefully headed for home after the shock and strain of the experience. The promise of permanent benefit and recovery brings joy to the many friends of a joy-provoking man.

BOSTON BAPTISTS are getting ready for the expected deluge of young Baptists from everywhere that will descend upon them. They will get a welcome that will express itself in shipshape preparation for their enjoyment of Boston and the convention. Dr. Peterson and his assistants have their coats off and things are beginning to hum.

THE BOSTON TELEPHONE GIRL STRIKE that was so threatening, and that now is fizzling, reminds one of our city politics. The city is being saved by Celtic schism. The O'Connors and the Malloys are warring in a manner that promises peace to the public, and an uninterrupted telephone service. We need not take the trouble to be neutral.—C. H. Watson.

THE SUMMER SUPPLIES FOR THE UNION SERVICES of the Old South and First churches, Worcester, are Revs. Fred A. MacDonald, D. Brewer Eddy, Harold Cook Phillips, Marshall N. Goold, Edward Payson Drew, William W. Bustard, Howard G. Holton, John C. Prince and W. R. McNutt.

CONNECTICUT

THE ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY of the Stonington Union Association was held in the First Church, Stonington, June 13-14, with the moderator, Rev. George R. Atha, in the chair. There was an unusually large attendance. The annual sermon was delivered by Rev. Elmer E. Scates, pastor of the Jewett City Church. The speakers from outside the state were Miss Lydia Edgerly of Hartshorn College, Mrs. H. E. Dudley of Burma, Rev. William A. Hill of New York, and Rev. J. Foster Wilcox. The state convention was represented by Rev. E. E. Gates and Rev. H. B. Sloat. The officers for the new year are: Moderator, Rev. Elmer E. Scates, Jewett City; clerk, Rev. Charles A. Merrill, Noank; treas., Charles C. Zabriskie, Preston City; auditor, F. E. Williams, Old Mystic. The next session convenes with the Moosup Church, Rev. Charles S. Nightingale, pastor. The preacher of the annual sermon will be Rev. J. G. Osborne; alternate, Rev. E. E. Knapp.

ON JUNE 3 THE SOUTH CHURCH held an appropriate farewell service which marked the end of religious work in the old building. The South Church is to be razed to make place for the new edifice of the Central Church. Sister churches in the city conveyed their greetings on this occasion through Rev. F. B. Haggard, Asylum Avenue; Rev. M. W. Schuh, Memorial; Rev. H. B. Hutchins, Olivet, and Rev. A. D. Kendrick, Blue Hills. On June 10, the South and First churches united in worship in the First Church edifice, where they will continue to worship until the new structure is ready for occupancy.

THE ANNUAL MEETING AND ROLL CALL of the Federated Church, Willington, was held at the West Willington Church on June 5. The Congregationalists were represented by Dr. Sherrod Soule and the Baptists by Dr. A. B. Coats, state secretary. The pastor, Rev. William V. Allen, delivered the address, after which communion was observed.

REV. IVAN H. BENEDICT, for four years pastor at Branford, has accepted a call to the Blue Hills Church, Hartford, and expects to begin his new work Sept. 1. Mr. Benedict will enter upon his new field well equipped for the enlarged service that will be required of him.

REV. H. C. SPEED OF HOLTON, ME., has been calded to the pastorate of the First Church, Middletown. It is expected that Mr. Speed will accept the call. He has held important pastorates in Massachusetts and Maine. Mr. Speed is a graduate of Brown and Newton.

REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON, pastor at Winsted, recently sailed with his family for a vacation of two months in his native land, Scotland. He expects to resume his pastoral responsibilities at Winsted, Sept. 1.

REV. RICHARD M. RICHARDSON has accepted a call to St. Johnsbury, Vt., and has entered upon his work with his accustomed energy and courage. Vermont has called another Connecticut pastor, Rev. F. W. Klein, who has gone to West Wardsboro. Mr. Klein's successor at Dunham Memorial Church, Mansfield Depot, is Rev. J. Wm. Carpenter, formerly of East Killingly.

THE DAILY VACATION BIBLE SCHOOL in West Hartford, under the leadership of Rev. G. F. Wortley, pastor, being conducted from June 25-July 23, opened auspiciously. Mr. Wortley, who is a student at the Hartford Theological Seminary, is being assisted by workers from the Y. M. C. A. and Miss Elizabeth F. Brown, a junior in Mount Holyoke College and daughter of Allen W. Brown, a prominent member of the West Hartford Church.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

AN EXAMPLE OF LAYMEN doing Christian work is exemplified in the voluntary work done by Mr. C. P. Jameson of Ashland. Mr. Jameson was formerly a member of the Tremont Temple Church, Boston. He came to New Hampshire some years ago to engage in farming, but soon took up Christian work and for several years held services in the West Center Harbor Church. Recently he became interested in the community at East Holderness, where a company of people had been called together for Christian worship. Mr. Jameson is their preacher. The services have resulted in a considerable number of conversions, sixteen of whom were baptized recently. Rev. T. J. Cate of Meredith administered the ordinance. Mr. Jameson keeps in close touch with the convention office for advice and help, while at the same time helping to add inspiration to the state work.

REV. H. L. CAULKINS, pastor at Hopkinton, has resigned and has taken up the work as pastor of the church in Colrain, Mass.

REV. J. S. MACKAY began work with the Federated Church at Danbury, July 1. Mr. MacKay is an inspiring preacher and worker.

REV. T. H. SCAMMON is doing summer missionary work in the eastern part of the state under the direction of the convention. He continues his pastorate at Wolfeboro Falls. Mr. Scammon will give his entire time in August to missionary work.

REV. CHRISTINA MCKENZIE, pastor of the church in Deerfield, has returned to her work after an absence of several weeks, having recovered from a severe attack of pneumonia.

THE HINSDALE CHURCH, organized in 1800, has held no services since 1914. The local membership has become reduced to four and the total membership is ten. There is at the present time no resident male member. Conditions surrounding the funds of this church held in trust by the convention have brought a crisis in the church property affairs. It has been deemed advisable to sell the property and meet the requirements concerning the funds held. Five hundred dollars of the funds will become the property of the convention in addition to the amount received from the sale of the property, consisting of the meeting house and parsonage. The church will disband and resident members will probably transfer their membership to some other church in the same association.

MAINE

REV. T. M. GRIFFITHS has resigned as pastor of the Camden Church after serving for five years. He received the gift of a fellowship scholarship from Rochester Theological Seminary and will study for two years to secure the degree of doctor of philosophy. It is then his purpose to teach. During his pastorate the church edifice was enlarged at a cost of $20,000. His resignation will be effective Sept. 1.

RHODE ISLAND

DURING THE SIXTEEN MONTHS that Rev. Frederick Lee Hainer has been pastor of the South Church, Providence, there have been 126 additions to the membership. At the annual meeting it was reported that the church had raised the largest amount for both expenses and missions than any year in its history. The pastor was given a substantial increase in salary. The church will unite with St. Paul's Methodist Church for services during August.

NEW YORK

THE FIRST CHURCH, POUGHKEEPSIE, Rev. Clarence Hill Frank, pastor, and the First Congregational Church will unite for summer services. The pulpit supplies will be Rev. Albert Gage and Rev. W. C. Chappell.

THE SIXTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY of the Greene Avenue Church, Brooklyn, found the church in promising condition. During the past year the congregations and attendance at weekly prayer meetings have increased and $18,000 was raised for the New World Movement. A campaign of personal evangelism will be conducted during November. Personal visitations will be made by experienced Christian workers under the leadership of Pastor McKoy at more than 10,000 homes in the Stuyvesant section of the city.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

THE FIRST CHURCH, Jersey Shore, at the morning service, July 1, burned the mortgage on its property. Five years ago the church was renovated at a cost of $15,000. Rev. A. B. Strickland preached at the morning service on "The Wealth and Poverty of the Primitive Church." At the evening service he gave his illustrated sermon on the life of Roger Williams and the growth of the Baptist church in America. A legacy of $8,000 will soon be received by the church for the purchase of a pipe organ. Under the leadership of Rev. J. H. Carter, who became pastor last December, renewed interest is manifested in every department. Twenty-six persons united with the church in the first six months of the present pastorate. Four are awaiting baptism.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

Rev. James S. Braker recently began the fourth year of his pastorate with the First Church, McKeesport. During that time 331 new members have been received, making the total membership 1,043. Over $60,000 was raised, half being given to beneficence. Drs. J. A. Maxwell and A. A. LeLarme will supply the pulpit during August.

WEST VIRGINIA

The Charleston Temple welcomed twelve new members at a recent communion service, making 100 additions during the first six months of the pastorate of Rev. Clarence W. Kemper. The pastor is giving a series of Sunday morning sermons on the foundations of Christian faith. Pastor Ostergren is directing a daily vacation school.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The work of excavating for the new building of the Takoma Park Church is now under way. The building is to be of stone and will cost $65,000 exclusive of furnishings. Services are being held temporarily in the Seventh Day Adventists' Church. Rev. William E. La Rue is pastor.

Mississippi Valley

OHIO

On children's day, Pastor Wood of the Glenville Church, Cleveland, baptized forty-two scholars from the Sunday school. At the close of the Easter period the younger converts were organized into a class and have been carefully instructed in the duties and responsibilities of church membership.

The church at Nottingham, Cleveland, will enlarge its building at a cost of $30,000. The membership has increased from seventy to 200 in a year and a half. Work on the extension will be undertaken immediately.

Rev. W. W. Bustard recently completed fourteen years of service with the Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland. During that time there have been 2,800 additions to the membership. The Sunday-school attendance which averaged 400 fourteen years ago, this spring reached 1,700. When Mr. Bustard began his pastorate the membership of the church was about 1,050; now it is 2,450. The old church property was recently sold. It is expected that within a few months construction of a new building on a lot across the street from the old location will begin. The auditorium will have a seating capacity of 4 000.

Dr. Franklin W. Sweet, Rev. Harold N. Geistweit, Dr. Lincoln Hulley, Professor Williams and Dr. L. L. Henson will supply the First Church of Dayton, of which Rev. W. H. Gesitweit is pastor.

The First Church, Lorain, through the courtesy of the Board of Promotion, was able to give an illustrated report of the Atlantic City convention. The slides included views of the city, the beach, the steel pier, exhibition hall, convention auditorium, prominent speakers, missionaries and missionary fields. Solos and hymns sung at the convention were thrown upon the screen and sung by the congregation. Rev. J. G. Whiten is pastor.

The Church of the Master, Cleveland, adopted resolutions expressing its regret at the resignation of its pastor, Rev. F. W. Sweet, its appreciation of his service, and its wish for his success in his new field. The church granted him a two months' vacation beginning July 1.

Rev. L. R. Wilson recently completed five years of service as pastor of the church at Middleport. During that time the membership has been doubled, a new edifice costing $20,000 erected and the Sunday-school attendance increased 300 per cent.

INDIANA

At a special business meeting of the First Church, Marion, it was voted to increase Pastor Woodward's salary at the beginning of the church year in September. During the two years that he has been pastor there have been 135 additions to the membership. A special fund of $2,500 has been pledged for the purpose of repairing and redecorating the church building during July.

ILLINOIS

The Aledo and Enon churches have extended a unanimous call to Rev. Arthur E. Jern, a recent graduate of Shurtleft College.

The Erie Church called Rev. Herbert Grimwood, who began his work here June 10.

The Cordova Church celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the women's missionary circle June 15. An interesting program was given. Rev. Frank Woodhull is pastor.

Extensive improvements are being made on the church at Pawpaw. A new concrete foundation will be laid and the entire interior will be redecorated. Rev. R. D. Walter is pastor.

Forty-nine new members have been received by the church at Manlius, of which Rev. W. A. Nickerson is pastor, during the year. The interior of the parsonage is being redecorated.

The First Church, Batavia, is installing a new pipe organ and erecting an addition for the Sunday school and week-day work. Within the past two years the building has been redecorated and a new heating plant installed. The membership has increased from 105 to 182. Rev. Fred W. Field is pastor.

The First Church, Paris, recently closed a successful four weeks' vacation school. The enrolment was 105 and the average attendance seventy-five. Mrs. Ruth Greenfield Askins was superintendent and had a staff of four salaried teachers and four assistants. This was the first vacation school conducted by the church, but because of its success the institution will probably be a permanent one.

The First Church, Lexington, feels the loss of Mrs. A. J. Scrogin. Mrs. Scrogin was prominent in church circles. She was the wife of A. J. Scrogin, a member of the state board of managers and at one time president of the convention.

Commencement at the Missionary Training School

Commencement exercises at the Missionary Training School were held June 9-12. On Saturday afternoon an interesting exhibition was given of the work done by the students in physical education. Dr. A. S. Carman of the Northern Theological Seminary preached the baccalaureate sermon on Sunday in the First Church. "The Soul's Shadow" was his theme.

On Monday, class day, a large number of alumni gathered for luncheon. In the afternoon the seniors gave "The Questioner," a pageant. In the evening, Doctor Lerrigo gave an impressive address, and Mrs. Katherine S. Westfall of the Woman's Home Mission Society gave commissions to the eighteen appointees of the society.

On Tuesday evening, Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, president of the Woman's Foreign Mission Society, gave the commencement address. Her subject was "The Woman and the Leaven."

Commencement days are now only a happy memory, but the school looks forward to another splendid year of training young women to become efficient workers in the Master's service.

Frances Shimer Commencement

The seventy-first annual commencement of Frances Shimer School, Mt. Carroll, was held June 17-20. The address before the graduating class on Sunday afternoon was given by Dr. J. M. Powis Smith, University of Chicago, on "The Free Life." The final vesper talk Sunday evening by Dean McKee was on "The Claim of the Church on Youth." The address on commencement day, Wednesday, was given by Dr. James Madison Stifler, of Evanston, on "What is an Education?"

There were two graduates from the department of voice, twenty-nine from the academic department, and nineteen from the junior college. These graduates came from seven states. The student body for the year numbered 206 and came from sixteen states.

The year now closing has been the best the school has ever known in attendance, income, and general efficiency. The number of trained teachers of experience was never so large, and the equipment was never so complete. The increase in the number of college students is a decided gain. In 1914, fourteen girls were taking some work beyond high school. The past year ninety-eight high-school graduates are on the list, seventy-eight doing regular college work. The outstanding improvement in the equipment of the school this year is the erection and use of the new dormitory, William Parker McKee Hall, at a cost of $78,000. Of this sum $57.711 came from the Education Society. The building houses fifty-four pupils and teachers, with two trunk rooms, a parlor, a kitchenette, and a dining room with a capacity of 250. This is the largest single addition the school has made at one time, and brings the total resources up to approximately $500,000. This year over ninety of the former students have been in thirty-seven colleges and universities, including the University of Chicago, ten state universities, Vassar and Smith. The school continues the policy of conservative financing. It does not enter into obligations until provision has been made to meet them, with a balance in the treasury at the close of each year. The first forty new pupils registered for September represent nine states. Four members of the faculty are spending the summer in Europe.

NEBRASKA

Since Rev. H. F. Gilbert became pastor of the First Church, Norfolk, a year ago, fifty-eight new members have been received. A successful daily vacation school is being conducted under the direction of the pastor.

NORTH DAKOTA

At a council, which met June 26 at the Page Church, Rev. P. H. Nystrom was recognized as a regular Baptist minister. Mr. Nystrom united with the First Church of Bismarck last fall and came from the Disciples Church. Rev. Fred E. Stockton was moderator, and L. H. Johnson, clerk. Rev. G. B. Newcomb preached the sermon. Mr. Nystrom has been appointed as colporter west of the Missouri river in the state.

WISCONSIN

The First Church, Merrill, Rev. A. O. Protsman, pastor, is looking after Baptist interests in Lincoln County. The church has work organized at three points, Merrill, Irma and Parrish. The pastor preaches twice on Sunday in Merrill, on Monday evenings at Irma and on Tuesday evenings at Parrish. He conducts prayer meetings on Thursday evening at Merrill and has a class in religious instruction at the junior high school. To perform these and other duties he travels an average of 150 miles per week. The population of Lincoln County is 23,000 and is composed of Germans, Norwegians, Swedes, Russians, Hollanders, Poles, French and Jews. Although there are forty-seven churches in the county, there are 11,288 residents who are not members of any church. Many of them have at some time been church members, but for various reasons have lost their membership. They are indifferent and hard to reach. However, new settlers are coming in every year. In 1919 there were 500 new settlers in the county. As there is a transition from the lumbering interest to that of agriculture, pioneer conditions prevail. But every effort is being made to push Baptist work and every opportunity is being used to make the church a vital force in the county.

The Winnebago Association met June 21-22 at the Memorial Church, Neenah. The pastor, Rev. U. E. Gibson, is in the eighth year of his service with the church. Pastors Robert Gordon, Fond du Lac; Eugene Mintz, Oshkosh; E. M. Salter, Appleton; H. M. Barbour, Ripon; A. T. Erickson, Green Bay, all strong leaders, were present. A banquet was held the closing evening. The Fox River Valley B. Y. P. U. was organized with M. J. Anuta of Neenah as president.

IOWA

A successful four weeks' vacation school was held in the Northwood Church under the direction of the pastor, Rev. Henry L. Rust. The enrolment was sixty-seven. An exhibit of the work done will be sent to the Iowa Falls Assembly.

Iowa Baptists are a little proud of their record in the bigger and better Sunday-school campaign of the past year. State Director of Religious Education Rev. Victor N. Witter is to be congratulated that Iowa took first place in class II. A large banner was given the state in this contest.

Those desiring to attend the summer assembly at Iowa Falls, July 18-29, should write Rev. C. W. Fletcher, Bedford, for reservation of tent, room, or camping ground accommodations.

Secy. G. P. Mitchell of the state convention, and Rev. A. G. Lagerquist, a district missionary, left for the World Alliance, Stockholm, June 26. They expect to visit a number of the European countries before returning. They will be gone ten weeks.

Miss Rose Enabnit, who recently graduated from Des Moines University, was united in marriage to Mr. Paul M. Hanzlik by Chaplain J. Orrin Gould.

Des Moines

Rev. H. R. Best, for the past three years pastor of the Forest Avenue Church, recently tendered his resignation as pastor. It was accepted by the church with regret. Mr. Best goes to the First Church, Fargo, N. D., Sept. 1. It will be remembered that Mr. Best for nearly fifteen years was pastor of the church at Sioux City, S. D., before taking up the work of the Interchurch World Movement. He came from that work directly to the pastorate of the Forest Avenue Church. Mr. Best has been active in various lines of civic work.

Rev. Hugh Moore has taken his family to Minnesota for the summer. He is one of the four district missionaries of the convention and will help look after Baptist interests during the absence of Rev. G. P. Mitchell.

The twenty-ninth international Christian Endeavor convention met in Des Moines July 4-9. Rev. Francis E. Clark, Hon. Wm. J. Bryan, Sherwood Eddy and other men of equal international reputation were among the speakers at the convention.

The ministerial association of the city supplies the musical program and the speakers at the vesper services being held at Fort Des Moines during July and August. The post band also cooperates and the services are very attractive. The University Church and the university furnished the music and the speaker for the first vesper service of the season.

The Highland Park booster campaign began Sunday, June 24, by having all of the Sunday schools of that part of the city meet for a photograph on the campus of Des Moines University. In the evening about 1,000 citizens of the community listened to the community chorus and orchestra. Pres. John W. Million was the speaker of the evening.

KANSAS

The state assembly will meet in Ottawa, Aug. 6-16. Dr. W. P. Behan is dean of the assembly. Some of the teachers are Dr. O. C. Brown of Philadelphia; Dr. Charles Durden of Galesburg, Ill.; Prof. G. G. Riggan of Kansas City Seminary; and Dr. E. B. Pratt of Denver. Camp Tauy Jones has become one of the popular features. Rev. Oliver Potter of Bronson will have charge of the boys' work. The B. Y. P. U. will offer classes each day for the study of the best methods of work in all lines of young people's work. Tents may be rented in Ottawa. Meals will be served from a common dining hall. Afternoons will be devoted to recreation. All young people are urged to attend this summer school.

The First Church, Wellington, held its first vacation school. The enrolment was seventy-three and the average attendance fifty-six. A missionary offering was taken once a week during the four weeks' term of the school. As a result, $10 was received to be sent to the Publication Society. During the past month there were nine additions to the membership. The church will entertain the state convention Oct. 15-18. Rev. James Fisher is pastor.

Pacific Coast

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

At the request of the church at Orosi, a council was recently called to examine C. Aaron King. Rev. C. Carl Truex of Selma preached the ordination sermon. Dr. C. F. Holt of Lindsay was moderator, and F. I. Drexler of Riverdale, clerk.

WESTERN WASHINGTON

The Norwegian-Danish conference held its annual meeting June 21-24 at the Norwegian-Danish Church, Bellingham. Rev. T. O. Wold of Cedar Home preached the sermon. Speakers were Revs. Roy E. McGran, N. C. Parsons, A. M. Melius, O. N. Jorgenson, O. N. Norman and T. W. Harris. The following officers were elected: President, Rev. A. M. Melius; vice-president, Rev. J. A. H. Johnson; secretary, Rev. O. M. Jorgenson; treasurer, Mr. L. Forland Resolutions were passed expressing alarm at the tendency to disregard the Sabbath and urging Baptists to secure a proper observance of the day; reaffirming belief in the infallibility of the Bible; and appreciation of the co-operation of the state convention.

Baptist supervision, using Baptist literature. The average attendance of the school for the first nine months was forty-five. Yucca Valley had preaching on the first Sunday afternoon of each month at 3:30 for something like eighteen months when they voted to close up the work and come into town. The Baptist church in town had moved into the new building and had room to take care of the children which was not true before.

The third meeting was held at the Cedar Grove schoolhouse, seven miles north of Arnold. There were no conversions in this meeting. The community was stirred and work may be done later.

The fourth meeting was held just four miles straight east of Cedar Grove and ten miles northeast of Arnold in the Loyal schoolhouse. Nine came out in meetings here, three coming into the Arnold Church. A community Sunday school was organized here under Baptist supervision, using Baptist literature. At first they had preaching on the third Sunday afternoon of each month. After Yucca Valley closed they got the first Sunday also.

In March 1923 Brother George Greenhill, from Omaha, assisted Pastor Silvara in meetings at Pleasant Hill where a good church building had been left by another denomination and the community was without services of any kind. There were no conversions but the community keeps up a Sunday school and has preaching on the first and third Sunday afternoons of each month at 2:30. This is a promising addition to the outstation work.

The rural parish comprises at present, Arnold and three outstations. The pastor preaches both morning and evening in town every Sunday. At Logan in the afternoons of the second and fourth Sundays. At Pleasant Hill at 2:30 and Loyal at 3:45 on the first and third Sundays. Thus the pastor preaches three sermons every Sunday and four sermons on the first and third Sundays besides driving his own car from twenty to thirty miles over sandhill roads. However, he has never missed but two engagements and been a little late four times in two years and a half of this kind of work.

The pastor's family moved into the parsonage March 18 and began the rural parish program as best they could with what equipment they had. Services in Arnold were held in the parsonage basement until after Easter when they got the use of the I. O. O. F. hall over a store building until Jan. 18, 1922. From here they were forced to move, as parties wanted the hall for dances. For the next four months the church worshiped in a discarded tin blacksmith shop which we found impossible to heat.

The old shell of the frame church was taken down to give ground for the new building, there being no better in town. Brostrom & Drotts, church architects in Kansas City, Mo., were employed and the plans of a perfectly modern rural plant that should not cost more than $20,000 was started. The building is 60x60 feet. The basement gives the church a perfectly modern community service equipment with an auditorium that has seated over 500 people for anything given on the stage.

On the main floor above the basement will be an auditorium proper that will seat in pews 150, while along the sides are two rooms which can be thrown into the auditorium, giving seating facility for another hundred, while back of the pulpit is another room which can be thrown into the auditorium when necessary. This will give seating room for 450 people upstairs in the church proper. For Sunday school privileges there are three assembly rooms on the main floor aside from the auditorium proper. There are class-room facilities on the main floor aside from auditorium for 19 classes. The building is erected of hollow tile, stuccoed and trimmed with map-faced brick. The cost when fully completed will not exceed $20,000.

One of the great events of the year occurs the first day of September when all points of the parish come together for a picnic. Cars from each point of the parish decorated in colors adopted by that community form their sector of the line of parade in front of the Baptist parsonage and go through town out three miles to the park. Here before dinner each point of the parish furnishes a fifteen minute program of its own choosing. After dinner there are contests. The outstation winning the largest number of the events during the day is given a pennant previously prepared, bearing the following letters with the numerals, N. B. R. P. 1922. Another annual event in the parish life comes on Thanksgiving Day when the outstations gather at the central plant in Arnold for their Thanksgiving dinner. Last year we had as speaker Dr. L. C. Barnes of New York City. The folks are given time to go home and do their chores and get back for the evening when the first matched game of basket ball and volley is played. This is the official opening of the gym for the season. Last year more than 300 people came to watch the games, while down town they were running the Thanksgiving masquerade ball. Thus it is the pastor's plan to teach the community how to have a good time without entering into things with evil tendencies.

There exists a congenial relation between pastor and the high school. The church gym is used by the high school from four to six each evening for practice as well as all matched games. Thus athletics have entered the high school, basket ball in the winter and track in the spring. This has been a decided influence in stabilizing the morals in the high school and among the younger people in general. The pastor has gone with the teams in many of their out of town contests. In the meantime the school has been raised from the C to the A class. The church has a department of athletics which furnishes equipment for the young people in way of basket ball suits, volley ball, tennis and croquet. The outstations also have the use of the gym for practice and matched games. The pastor last year was chairman of a committee that supervised Saturday baseball instead of Sunday ball. He assisted in organizing a community brass band and played until it was well started. He also assisted the farmers' union in getting a charter and organizing the farmers' union cooperative store.

The church adopted a constitution that creates five departments through which the work will be supervised—department of religious education, which has supervision of all religious instruction given through the church; training for service department, which has charge of both Junior and Senior B. Y. P. U.; department of women's work, supervision of the Kensington, Mission Circle and W. W. G. work; department of athletics, which provides wholesome recreation both summer and winter for all desiring it; department of social service which takes the basement as social service equipment and provides uplifting and constructive community entertainment, rather than turning this field of human activity over to profiteering agencies. Their time has not all been given to the social side of life by any means. The evangelistic side has been stressed since the pastor recognizes that the spiritual side of man's nature must be kept abreast of all other phases of life. Ten series of evangelistic services have been held within this parish. The membership has increased 50 per cent. Stewardship of both money and life has been stressed with the return of the family altar. The possibilities of the rural parish program as yet are untouched. There are great avenues of service to the community vested in the department of social service. It is the pastor's plan this summer to conduct a community vacation school every Saturday afternoon and thus take care of all children within the parish while the parents do their trading and visiting. They have contracted for a Power's projector and will use the moving pictures to be secured free from our state universities—a study of the great industrial life of our country. They will be able to use this fall in connection with the high school the open forum feature, thus providing clean entertainment free and help in the development of the young.

The Rural Church—Its Program and Field

By C. S. Marston

THE program of the rural church must be a distinctive program. Its nature and character must be adapted to a rural constituency. While Christianity is a staple reality the program through which it functions must vary as the conditions require. For instance, that which will meet the needs in well-developed northern Illinois would not serve well in the jack-pine land of northern Minnesota. Neither would a schedule outlined for steel workers at Gary be fitted for a church serving a residential section on Lowery hill. A workable outline for any church must be adapted to its needs. Hence, any church serving a rural constituency whether located in the open country or in a neighboring village or town should have a program that has a distinctive rural tone throughout.

Moreover, the programs must be practical and not theoretical. They must reach people where they live, and enable them to develop their religious life. Theories about agriculture have their place, but getting rid of stumps and stones and raising a crop for a living is the practical issue with the northern Minnesota farmer. So, too, the test of the rural church program is results.

Adequate service will give consideration to the "four-square" life. Life is a unit and the Christian worker should seek the uplift of the whole man. Jesus was so concerned and no ministry unto Christ through those to whom he would have ministrations given can be adequately fruitful, unless due and balanced consideration is given to the needs of the whole life. A program which develops one side only is unbalanced and in reality is only a section of a program. Religion is life, not a section of life. The rural church is guardian of the spiritual interests of rural folks, hence its field of spiritual ministration is the whole life. Blood flows through the whole physical body and gives life to all its parts, but tincture of iron for the blood will not be adequate for all human ills. Pepsin for the digestion, pure air for the lungs, and exercise for the muscles are also needed. Without these the blood itself cannot healthfully function. So, too, in matters religious, the commonly called "soul" life may serve as does the blood to the physical body but only adequate consideration of the needs of all phases of life will produce a normal spiritual status.

A program of this type will render not less than a five-fold ministry. Evangelism must always be in the forefront. But all other streams of influence contributing to character building are likewise essential. Social and recreational interest and social service are always challenging factors. Religious education and a well balanced worship program can not be slighted without injury.

All-the-year-around evangelism should always be sought for. Regular Sunday services, individual approach through personal work, special evangelistic services, and decision day opportunities must ever be prominent. This field holds the key to final triumph and success.

Educational ministry is a field which is too often neglected. It has been thought impracticable under rural conditions, but many experiments have shown the feasability of a challenging program. The Sunday school can and should be thoroughly graded with a graded curriculum throughout. Nothing else is adequate. The value of a work to which Jesus devoted so large a part of his ministry is too great to permit neglect. Even inadequate building facilities should only present a challenge to provide adequate ones at the earliest possible moment and inspire the maximum use of those at hand in the mean time.

Our Book Shelf

A Yankee Interlude, by Charles Farner Cork. Boston: Roxburgh Publishing Co.

An easy-to-read story with true-to-the-life touches is this tale of a New England farm. The book has something of an old-fashioned flavor which those who oppose the "frenzied fiction" of the day will especially like.

Texts, by Roy Ivan Johnson. Columbia, Mo. Missouri Book Co. $1.25.

A book of inspirational poems, each one of which is based on a passage of Old Testament scripture. The poems indicate an insight into the promises of God as well as into the needs of the heart of man. Several of them are veritable gems.

Earth's Enigmas, by Charles G. D. Roberts. Boston: Page. $2.

The author says in his prefatory note: "Most of the stories in this collection attempt to present one or another of those problems of life to which, as it appears to many of us, there is no adequate solution. Others are the almost literal transcript of dreams. . . . The rest are scenes from that simple life of Canadian backwoods and tide-country with which my earlier years made me familiar." The book is illustrated by Charles Livingston Bull.

Inspiration, by Nolan Rice Best. New York: Revell.

The author describes himself as a "liberal within orthodoxy." And yet in his thirteen chapters he does not take side with either the progressives or the conservatives. He holds that the Bible is not inerrant except in its teaching of religion. Doctor Best lifts the subject of inspiration above the disputation of proof-texts, and deals with the living questions of life. In a fine, irenic spirit he at last comes to the conviction that the gospel revelation can never be in peril so long as in the lives of those who deal with Bible exegesis there may be discerned "the fruits of the Spirit." On this basis he feels that there is room in the church for all, liberal and orthodox, who believe in the inspiration, authority and abiding value of the Bible.

The Armor of Youth, by Walter Russell Bowie. New York: Revell.

There are many who would like to give children's sermons, but are afraid of themselves. Here is forty-five short sermons, phrased in simple and familiar language, without being unduly preachy, which convey helpful lessons to growing youth. The topics are suggestive, and practical, and the subject matter is presented in a simple, direct and practical way. Ministers will find this a suggestive book on subjects that children like to hear.

OUR MUSIC CORNER

CONDUCTED BY WILLIAM LESTER

HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE

A new hymnal of the high aspirations, individual viewpoint, and challenging attitude such as mark "Hymns for the Living Age," compiled and edited by H. Augustine Smith, and recently published by the Century Company, such a plan and such an achievement deserve much more than the usual cursory notice. To such an office as this comes a pretty steady stream of books of hymns, "gospel," "middle of the road" or "faddist" in nature. And they do not differ very much at that, regardless of the editor's intention. If you turn the pages you will find the same old favorites, listed under just about the same headings, properly diluted with a sprinkling of new (and usually optional) tunes. Most of the differences lie in the typographical form and the indexes used. All are too bulky and tentative.

Such a volume as the one under review now stands out prominently for its difference, its individuality of purposes and results. Whether or not one agrees with either the particular aims, the particular methods used in selection, arrangement and grouping, or the final results attained, still the volume demands careful and appreciative study. I have been mulling over the book for some time testing it out in actual use and carefully considering its values, planning to give a detailed analysis of the results on this page. But I have been spared that labor. Albert Cotsworth, one of the finest of Christian gentlemen, a scholar, and a genuine musician, did the job so expertly in an article in Music News a couple of weeks ago, that I am taking the liberty of quoting from it and simply saying amen to what is printed below.

The title of H. Augustine Smith's new hymnal is a challenge from and to him. Today he is probably best entitled to wear the mantle so long fitted to Dr. Bird and not truly assumed by any one since his passing. In an enthusiastic way he has kept himself plastic for all revelations of spiritual poetry and musical vibrations thereto. Fortunately he has been so situated that he could try out whatever came his way and weigh its practical values.

He submits present results of his shifting process in "Hymns for a Living Age." Which implies there is no dead timber therein, no debatable theology, no shadowy sentiment, no austerity, no sternness, no strained piety, no stress on doom or punishment, no accents of fear, no mush, no bunk. Rightfully one may expect a series of inspiring, devotional, helpful, social verses set to singable music, to voice the new spirit in the evolutionary process now reviving the church militant.

The Century people have made it a beautiful book, fine clear and clean type, wide margins, elastic binding, sense of space—an urgent invitation to sing.

There are well arranged responsive readings, not at all conventional, and canticles set to familiar chants, accurately pointed. The list of prayers of proven worth is widely increased. One wonders how much they are drawn on by men who halt in their manner of approach. The extempore prayer can be pregnant with feeling and emotion. Experienced organists learn to gauge ministers by their prayers, rather than their preaching. In that part of the service men do not have to consider their creeds or the vagaries of those in the pews who desire to be satisfied. A list which includes Abraham Lincoln and R. L. Stevensin among its collection, sealed with ages of faith and works, has benison for every soul in petition.

Those who want the best turn first to the section where service and vision have space. There should be found the key hymns. Not many are missing and a number that are fresh and vivid in their up-to-dateness are grouped carefully, discreetly and fitted, as a rule, with singable tunes. Our old friend "Truro," laid by many years, turns up a robust leader, being put in harness more than any other tune.

Several sessions with the book, to which I brought my long friendship with the editor and almost a lifetime of experience, leave me with many satisfactions and certain question marks. Some of us who are observant and can make comparisons find a trying situation for church music just now. In circles where preachers are asking where their congregations have gone to and where the future church going people are to come from, there are those who fall back to belief that what is needed is "preaching the gospel." Which means, in their eyes, the dominance of "the spoken word" and elimination of any species of ritual which has crept into most nonliturgic churches. In the Roman Catholic Church it means a direct Papal order for strict ascetic music. In the Episcopal Church an emphasis on "plain chant." In the Science Churches the reader practically selects the music. The same solo is used at morning and evening services. The Lutherans have usually been a close corporation and slow to welcome other than the Choral. I don't know whether the United Presbyterians have landed. They used to maintain no music was sacred save the Psalms of David. My roommate and I had wordy tourneys as to whether his metrical version or that in my Prayer Book had received heavenly sanction.

It is exceptional to find a choirmaster who does not feel some measure of this subtle propaganda that in prayer, preaching and exposition must be found the true approach to God in worship.

The attitude is basically weak because it rests on ignorance. An organist striving to work with many preachers finds them unacquainted with writers of church music and pitiably uninformed about hymns and tunes. What part "Seminaries" play in this I found illustrated when addressing one such. The introducer gave me a chance to fire back when he spoke of music as the "War Department of the Church."

It is almost proverbial that ministers move in a small circle in their selection of hymns. Wonder arises sometimes if choice is still exerted on the basis of other years when my minister would use no tune which his wife could not play! It was his direct test of a hymn's simplicity. He was honest but he didn't mean simplicity. He meant "easy to play." In that address to a group of preachers I was not contradicted or called down when I said that the only anthem the more than average clergyman knew was the "Hallelujah Chorus."

Testing criticism with facts, the service lists of one church called on 89 hymns in one year. Two services each Sunday for ten months. For six weeks morning service only, when no calendars were provided. Adding for these and other events, grant a list of 125 hymns used. The record shows one hymn listed seven times, two used six times, and two five times. Five used four times, seven used three times and seventeen twice—in all 104 hearings were allowed thirty-seven hymns. There are 507 in that hymnal, not counting the chants, responsives, etc. The Ben Ahmed, which led all the rest was, "How Firm a Foundation," with "Crown Him with Many Crowns," "O Master Let Me Walk with Thee," and "O Love that Wilt not Let Me Go," as close competitors. There is no guarantee with their quality or singableness, but it is a limited sphere. What about the need of the other 400?

There would be no motive in these comments on facts if it were not that it is the clergy who pass upon and make the definite use of hymnals. Men with varying degrees of sincerity and lack of prejudice, but in a large majority much alike in what I may harshly call ignorance, have the authority to approve or ignore these overflowing pages of beauty, which represent the years of liberal study and interpretation Professor Smith has devoted full heartedly to the most vital part of church music. He has scoured the world for its best. He has tried it and tested it. He has given thought to proper placement of its thought. He has probed all sources for the exactly right melody to enforce the text. With canny knowledge he has fitted the apt key to make the appropriate color mood. He has eliminated all optional tunes, abbreviated, pruned, clipped, smoothed, simplified and yet preserved vitally until in the book are treasured nearly all of the worth while newer thought. He has gone into all religions and the uttermost parts of the earth for what will sing itself into human hearts and then find expression in thought and deed.

This very life blood of an earnest man's zealous enthusiasm has to pass muster before a jury incompetent to gauge its lofty appeal, its selective adaptability, its wide ranged vision. Will that jury "like it?" They have no other criterion than their likes and dislikes.

What We Are Trying to Do in Michigan

Modern conditions of transportation and communication have changed the problems of the church in its approach to the rural people as well as creating new problems in the city. Because of good roads, automobiles, telephones and rural free delivery the people of the country are much more closely connected with the neighboring town than ever before. The fact is the merchants of the town make a business of soliciting the trade of the farmers. Recreational and social activities in the towns are used by rural people and an ever-increasing percentage of high school students come into the city or town for their instruction. The church cannot afford to be the one institution in the town or small city which still continues to ignore the farmer and neglect his spiritual interest.

For these reasons the Marshall church after thoroughly discussing the matter with representative rural people began its country work by a survey conducted by the people of the church. Practically every home within seven miles was reached by a personal visit and it was found that over 75 per cent of the rural people have no active interest in church work. The entire surrounding territory was then divided into ten districts with a chairman for each district. These chairmen were people who had the interest of the church at heart and were chosen wherever possible from the country, but if a certain district had no one who could take the chairmanship some one living in the town was chosen. The work of the chairman is to keep in active touch with the people in the district, find the best prospects for church attendance; in short, try in every possible way to get the most number of people in their district interested in the whole program of the church.

With this in mind rural socials were held in the homes of eight of the districts the first winter. The people in whose home the social was held cooperated with the chairman in the arrangement of the evening's entertainment which consisted usually of a cooperative supper, miscellaneous program and moving pictures. The attendance ran all the way from twenty to one hundred at each of the socials. The young men of the church promoted an athletic meet for the boys and girls of the rural school and a well attended ice cream social was put on in the country during the summer. During the last winter it was difficult to arrange dates for socials because of the weather and sickness. Several successful rural dinners have been held at the church and at two men's banquets at the church about 35 per cent of the men present were from the rural districts.

The rural committee met recently and decided to promote five summer outdoor socials in five neighborhoods around Marshall and also to conduct a resurvey of the country in the fall.

So far about twelve have been received into the church from the country districts, most of them by baptism. Several more are ready for baptism and about thirty have come into the Sunday school. Recently when a boys camp was promoted for one week by the Sunday school, three boys present were from the rural districts. On a Sunday afternoon last fall when nine auto loads of town church people went out into the rural districts to make calls a family with seven children was found within one mile of Marshall. Three of the older children soon joined the Sunday school after some young people had called and when later a great bereavement came to the family in the death of the mother, the pastor and church people were able to extend sympathy and help which was tremendously appreciated. The incident just mentioned is a result difficult to tabulate but we feel tremendously worth while. We have of course found that we are unable to push this work with the same degree of interest all the time, but we are sure that the results achieved have been commensurate with the efforts put forth. Certain things which were originally planned such as providing a rest room in the church for farmers and a more extensive program for rural people cannot be worked out because of lack of funds so that the building improvements cannot be made.

DID YOU PRE-PAY?

The last Sunday in June was designated as Pre-Pay-Up Day for the payment in advance of the amount due on pledges to the New World Movement for the first quarter ending July 31st. Did you pre-pay? If you have not forwarded the quarterly payment, there is still time to do so before the quarter ends, July 31st.

THREE OTHER IMPORTANT DATES

Pay-Up-Day October 28

This date means the completion of one-half of the new fiscal year, and all the missionary societies will have had to meet one-half of their annual expenditures.

Pay-Up-Day January 27

It is a good time to begin the new calendar year with three-fourths of your pledge to the New World Movement paid.

Pay-Up-Day April 27

This is the last Sunday in the fiscal year, which will close three days later. It also marks the end of the period covered by New World Movement pledges.

$12,161,521.67 is needed this year to care for the work of all organizations participating in the new world movement.

A Sabbath Prayer

O God, we thank thee for, and rejoice together in, the clean, clear light of the Sabbath day, the one day marked with the words of the Creator to be remembered and kept holy. May we make it a day of upward climbing to see the face of God. May there be no waste of Sabbath hours and may our lives be broadened by studying the example of Jesus and striving to be like him. Make our homes sweeter, our lives more gentle, and may all things go better with us because of our spending the day of God's kindest gift to the world in obedience to his command. Grant us the Sabbath peace through our Lord Jesus Christ.—Amen.

The second annual week-end conference for Baptist young people of the Metropolitan area was held June 21-25 at Somers, N. Y., at Old Oak Farm, under the direction of the Religious Educational Department of the New York City Mission Society and the Church Extension Society of Brooklyn and Queens. Rev. Stanley B. Hazzard was dean, and Mrs. Hugh Winton, hostess. Eighty-five young people from nineteen churches were registered. The mornings were used in the development of the devotional life. The evenings were devoted to a song service. While the conference was in progress it was learned that Mrs. Florence M. Stowell, a member of the committee of arrangements, had suddenly passed away. The influence of the conference will undoubtedly manifest itself in the personal lives of the young people.

The goal of the Woman's Continuation Campaign for 1923-24 is $2,000,000 and is a part of the $12,000,000 goal of Northern Baptists. It is desired that the $2,000,000 be distributable money, which means undesignated money intended for the budgets of the organizations cooperating in the New World Movement. However, designated gifts for objects within the budgets of the cooperating societies for this year may be received on the Continuation Campaign. Gifts received for the Continuation Campaign fund may be credited to the local church and count as a part of the entire payments made by the church for the New World Movement.

Why Not the Brotherhood?

We are in receipt of a news item from a certain church. It gives an account of the aggressive work of the congregation, then follows a startling announcement. The pastor will speak on "Ten Tongue-breaks That Separate Friends and Families." Good topic and always timely. The next sentence marks that pastor (if he wrote it) as the bravest preacher on record. "The ladies' aid society will attend in a body, and a song will be sung by their pioneer choir. ——— will sing 'Not a Sparrow Falls.'" How did he bring it about? What will be the result? We frankly admit that we should like to attend the next meeting of the ladies' aid society.

Killam's Kollum

Going to Stahholm

Dear Kollum:

Everybody is asking me these days, "Are you going to Stockholm?" And I answer them, "No, I am going to Stahholm." We folks that are going to Stahholm are far more numerous than those who are going to Stockholm and we are glad to learn that even though Killam has gone to Stockholm, his paper and his Kollum are going to Stahholm. We who Stahholm will be expecting much in your Kollums from Killam in Stockholm. Keep the Kables Koming.—Francis C. Stifler.

Stiller and Smaller

"Bredren," said the colored preacher earnestly, "in some folks de still, small voice ob conscience keeps a-gettin' stiller and smaller, until at las' it'd sure had to learn de deef an' dumb langwidge ter attrack deir attention." We do not point morals. It is not up-to-date. But if any BAPTIST subscriber who is in arrears in his subscription notices a stillness or a smallness in the voice of his conscience, he might profit by the hint.

Why Scrap?

One of our readers suggests that we run a strong article against the K. K. K. Kind reader, note that there are here three K's. It is not the Kollum that he would attack. We wrote him suggesting that such an article would call for several other articles in favor of the things for which the Klan stands. One good whack deserves another. As a matter of fact, we have enough theological controversies to give sufficient color to the journal. After all there is a world of solid truth in a motto which we saw an hour ago in a business place. "Kindliness and patience are rays that dispel the fog of prejudice and suspicion. They will remove misunderstanding where argument would merely confuse the issue." The man who placed that motto in his place of business did it as a part of his sales method. He warns his salesmen to avoid, as far as possible, unfruitful discussion. It drives away customers—and it will drive away peace-loving subscribers. This does not mean that we cannot believe something and stand for something. It simply means that we will be more successful in putting over our message by kindliness and patience than by argument. Why scrap?

The Thirty-Second Anniversary Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union of America

By James Asa White

THE Thirty-second Anniversary Convention of the Baptist Young People of America met in Boston, July 4-8, 1923. The convention sessions were held in historic Tremont Temple while the conference groups met in Tremont Temple, the First Baptist Church and the Clarendon Street Baptist Church. Owing to the fact that Tremont Temple Church held its own services on Sunday, the afternoon and evening convention sessions of that day were held in Symphony Hall, the home of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because of the many historic associations in and around Boston, the delegates gathered early in order that the birthday of the Republic might be celebrated on the very spot where the nation was born. What a thrill to go over the very road traveled by Paul Revere and later to stand by the tomb of this great American patriot! The feelings of the delegates were indescribable as they moved along the Lexington Concord route. Here and there boulders marked the very spots where the Minute Men did such valiant service. Then, up to Bunker Hill monument!

Under the leadership of a trained guide the delegates were shown the burying grounds of King's Chapel and the old Granary Graveyard where lie buried the Otises, Adamses, Paul Revere, the Franklins, Hancock and other immortals including Mary Goose, commonly called Mother Goose.

Acres of Diamonds

After a day spent in sightseeing the delegates gathered in large number at Tremont Temple for a sort of pre-convention meeting. By previous arrangement Rev. Sumner R. Vinton took the young people on an interesting trip to the Near East. Then the delegates listened to Dr. Russell H. Conwell of Philadelphia give his famous lecture "Acres of Diamonds." Doctor Conwell is not as young as he used to be and some of us wondered if he could stand long enough to get through. But for an hour and a half he kept us. Along with his splendid interpretations and great messages to the young people he entertained us with some of the finest stories possible.

The Attractive Christ

This was the convention theme and around it the entire program was built. The first day was given over to a consideration of the attractiveness of Christ's stewardship principles; the second day to the attractiveness of Christ's educational ideals; the third day to the attractive Christ as Saviour and Lord and the last day to the attractiveness of Christ's appeal to service.

First Day

In the Temple, the center of the hall looked almost like a huge gathering of Indian chiefs. The Illinois delegation wore a head-dress of feathers in blue, red, yellow and green. Another section was occupied by the Canadians, probably fifty strong, wearing paper caps with maple leaves around them. The Iowa delegation was distinguished by blue caps, and the twenty-two boys and girls from Kansas had large caps that looked like sunflowers.

An early rising group of visitors by nine o'clock were in the Temple, starting their proceedings with song and praise service. They expected an official word of welcome from Mayor Curley, but he was temporarily detained by other business and had to defer his visit until later. Above the platform, in letters that reached across the huge organ, were the words, "The attractive Christ," the keynote of the convention. That the idealism, the initiative, enthusiasm, optimism and courage which youth possesses in abundance should be tuned to the thought of the attractive Christ, and the youth sent home to be better citizens and better Christians for having been at the Boston Convention, was the sentiment expressed and applauded.

First to welcome them was Rev. W. Harry Freda, minister of the Clarendon Street Church, who spoke in behalf of the churches of Boston. All these young people from the North and the South, the East and the West, uniting the Baptists as never before, were gathered through the magnetic power of Christ, he said, and the people of Boston welcomed them as their friends because they represented the power, the strength, the beauty and the hopefulness in the kingdom of God. He said their encouragement would be greater, their vision larger, their hope stronger and their accomplishment greater in the future because they had come to Boston—the "wise men of the East" will help them better to follow the "attractive Christ." The challenge comes to these young people who hear the call of the Master to put on their armor and gird themselves with righteousness and truth to move forward till the world shall hear the call "all hail the power of Jesus' name."

Brief addresses were made also by Walter Marden, president of the Young People's Conference and by G. T. Newbill from the South, who responded to the words of welcome.

The Annual Address

The annual address by the president of the Baptist Young People's Union of America, Rev. M. F. Sanborn of the First Baptist Church in Detroit, Mich., followed. He spoke in substance as follows:

"Young people, this is a great hour in the world's history. Multitudes believe the world has reached the cross-roads and will take a new direction. It will be our part to help determine that new direction. From all parts of North America we are drawn together by the attractiveness of the Christ. Let us be in prayer that Tremont Temple may become to each of us a new Mount of Transfiguration where we shall come face to face with our Lord and receive new inspiration and new power for the calls to service in the valley of our everyday experiences.

"We are the representatives of a great denomination. If the Baptists' share of the work of the kingdom is to go forward in the next generation, it must be through our help and our leadership. As Baptist young people we are all one in purpose, whatever may be the name of our local society, class, or group. The Baptist Young People's Union of America is a fraternal union for all Baptist young people's organizations. The record of achievements of the past thirty-two years of this great organization is full of interest and challenge. Thousands of Baptist leaders can testify to the helpfulness of the great Christian culture courses. These courses laid the foundation for the great missionary education now being done by the denomination.

"Our organization has been the leader in the development of the inspirational and educational life of the denomination. 'Loyalty to Christ' based on an intelligent knowledge of the Bible has been encouraged. The great history and doctrines of the denomination have been studied by multitudes of young people with the most wholesome effect. Our organization has been the leader in tithing and stewardship promotion. The development of life-work activities among the young people of the churches has been largely fostered by our leadership. During all these years a most

Rev. John J. Hurt recently celebrated his seventh anniversary as pastor of the First Church, Wilmington, N. C. There are reported 1,136 additions to the membership during that time. Mr. and Mrs. Hurt were presented with enough money to purchase an automobile.

Rev. Grover C. Schwartz of Waukesha, Wis., was elected national chaplain of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, at the recent convention of this organization held in Minneapolis.

Prof. Henry Chandler of the department of botany at the University of Chicago, received the honorary degree of doctor of science at the recent commencement of Oberlin College in recognition of his extensive researches upon the sand dunes of Lake Michigan.

According to the "Red Cross Courier," June 30 marked the close of the work which the American Red Cross has been conducting for the refuges who fled into Greek territory from Asia Minor. The burden now rests upon the Greek government. Through official agencies the government is carrying out plans for distributing the refugees among the industries of the country. The Red Cross began its relief work following the defeat of the Greek army in Turkey and the destruction of Smyrna in September, 1922.

The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society has received a cablegram from London under date of July 9, which tells of the safe arrival of the "America" in Plymouth on Sunday evening, July 8. A smooth voyage in the very best of weather and with inspiring fellowship and meetings is reported. All the delegates to the Baptist World Alliance send hearty greetings home. They most earnestly request that the churches throughout the homeland remember in prayer the Stockholm meetings in their services on July 22.

The Army of the Dawn

THERE is something vastly inspiring in the sight or even the thought of an army of thousands of young people gathered, as were those of our denomination from all America in Boston recently, for a distinctively religious purpose. They may well be called "the army of the dawn." The most of the leaders in the great enterprises of life, including those distinctively religious, are in or past middle life. Splendid and valiant service has been and still is theirs; their experience and seasoned judgment make their leadership invaluable, yet they themselves are the first to realize that they constitute an army of the sunset; that their noon of life is already past—perhaps far past; and that theirs are the efforts of the waning hours of life's day. To them and to all who hold the fate of Christian enterprise dear to themselves and of supreme worth to humanity it is as cheering to see this fresh army of the dawn coming on and hurling itself into the battle, as it was to the worn and desperate forces in Europe when at last the eager, stalwart young millions from America came bringing their resistless and decisive aid to the struggle.

It is as true of life's day as of the single calendar day that as its hours pass on from morning toward evening there is a steady diminution of efficiency in many important respects. Alike to the brain worker and the hand worker, psychological tests show that there is a steadily descending curve of memory, accuracy, energy and quickness, and a rising curve of error, forgetfulness and accidents as the day lengthens. Were it not that a wise man may form habits which automatically carry him along to a certain extent in his later years and that he may also capitalize his experience as well as his material savings and make them work for him in the time when the curve is a descending one, a man's expectancy of usefulness would be brief.

But the existence and readiness of these enthusiastic thousands and the countless thousands whom they represent and who constitute a great reserve line, with still other lines coming on and on like waves of the sea, is an immensely cheering thing on other accounts. We were told that when young America came back from the war it would proceed to take the management of affairs into its own hands. It was intimated that this young America would have little use for the church, unless perhaps in the form of a glorified Y. M. C. A. which would try chiefly to extract the profit from the life that now is. It is true that there has been a disturbing amount of turbulence and disregard of social and moral precedent amongst many of the young people in our land, as in all lands. A young writer who has traveled widely in Europe and the far East has written a book called "The Revolt of Youth" in which he gathers interesting evidences of a new and iconoclastic spirit among the youth of many lands. We know that this spirit in China and other oriental lands has presented problems somewhat serious to our own missionary boards. Yet after all it may be questioned whether the revolt against traditional action and custom is much more characteristic of the young than of older life. It might even seem at times that they were but the timid tail-end of the procession whose prancing forefront was composed of wives and mothers.

But the significant thing is that, speaking generally, the young people have neither deserted nor become insurgent in our churches but are showing loyal and enthusiastic interest in the normal work of those churches to an extent greater and not less than before. Although, as THE BAPTIST has recently pointed out, the gathering of multitudes in a great annual convention is hardly a sufficient mission for our Baptist Young People's Union, it is in itself a significant thing as an indication of the interest and loyalty of the young people. For years it had been said that the days of the great young people's convention were past; that never again would we see the great gatherings of the first three or four years. But in the days since the world war, and the subsequent upheavals in government, in social custom and in church life, we have seen far greater gatherings and interest than ever before. It is true that much energy has been devoted to the promotion of these great conventions themselves, and that for permanent results the movement must devote itself more largely to definite spiritual ends; but there are very hopeful signs in that direction.

THAT culminating session of the great convention where young people by the hundreds devote themselves to life-service in some definite form for Christ and humanity cannot be other than a tremendous reenforcement of the life of our denomination if it be properly followed up by our missionary societies, our schools and the pastors of the young people themselves. The emphasis of the young people's movement on stewardship of all one's possessions will make itself increasingly felt in all the denominational life, as these young people win possessions and leadership. Already, too, in the local churches there are signs of heightening ideals, of the attainment of a genuine church esprit de corps, and of a readiness to participate in all the problems and tasks of the church, such as hold out the highest hope for the future.

All hail to the army of the dawn!

The Church of the Future

THE church of tomorrow is largely to be found in the membership of the young people's societies of today. Therein lies the great necessity for the church of today to pay adequate attention to the enlistment, education and projection of all young people with whom they are now in touch.

To enlist young people in the cause of Christ and then fail to educate them would be as criminal as if the government of these United States had enlisted three million young men for war and then had refused to train them, but had sent them out untrained to face the enemy. Such soldiers would simply have been an easy prey to the enemy. To enlist and train young Christians and then fail to project them into the actual areas of service is equally foolish and wasteful. We must do all three things with the young people of today—enlist, train and project. While we give loving heed to the counsel of older people in the church, we need to learn that older out-of-date people must not be allowed to stand in the way of the young people of today. This is a new day and things are done in a very different way than they were done thirty, twenty, or even five years ago. We must hold fast to the truth, but apply it so as to meet the conditions that face the young people of 1923.

We have one final remark to make which is sometimes not very well received by some people who are willing to substitute a part for the whole. No young people's organization can ever become a substitute for the church of Jesus Christ. We believe in the organized young people's work, but it must always be regarded as a subsidiary part of the whole church. If it comes to the place where there is only time for one service on Sunday, then that one service should be a worship service of the whole church. If there is money only for one phase of local work, the church must receive that money rather than the young people's organization. The whole is greater than the part. We want the organized young people's work to continue, but we want it to be properly related to the whole local church enterprise.

The Layman

FOR many years the business affairs of the average local church have been conducted under the supervision of men. Until recently women have not been represented largely in the groups that handle or control the affairs of the average church. Women, however, have developed a large measure of efficiency in the conduct of their organized work and along some lines have far outstripped the men in corresponding realms of organization and productivity when resources and opportunity are compared. Of course we are quite sure that many church men will dispute this statement, but nevertheless we make it because we are confident that it is generally true.

Laymen have held the places of responsibility and large opportunity in most cases, but the average church has not been efficient nor has it been financed so as to commend itself to the business world or to the community in which its work must be done.

Church women have developed a large measure of esprit de corps which, added to their attention to details, has enabled them to produce results, while the men have often been too willing to put church affairs into a secondary place in life and charge the minister with the responsibility of handling the details of organization and the production of resources.

We hail with delight and hope the reorganization of our Baptist Laymen's National Council. We hope the newly elected executive head will begin his task with a well developed sense of responsibility, a mind that seeks after the basic facts of the local church situation and a courage and determination to use those facts to convince the average layman that he must give to the Lord's work the same high-class intelligence and business acumen that is displayed in the conduct of his commercial life. For many years the church, in the control of laymen, has been the worst managed and financed organization on the horizon. It has been run on a minimum basis because only a small part of the membership had any sense of responsibility for producing the resources needed to do its work at home and abroad. The minister was not often given a chance to change the local situation so he cannot be blamed for its existence or continuation. The laymen in our local churches must be enlisted, then trained, then projected into the actual doing of the tasks that belong to the work of Christ. We hope and expect in the coming years great development in the laymen's work of our local and world enterprise within the bounds of the Northern Baptist Convention.

Weighing the Task

AS part of the denominational enterprise, THE BAPTIST is not just interested in getting out a readable and helpful paper week after week. We are determined to add our mite to the constructive thinking and the moving forward to victory in the great tasks that confront all our local churches. This issue of the paper will reach many of its readers while they are away from home or while the pressure of maintaining work is at its lowest ebb. May we not therefore ask that we should all weigh afresh the real task that confronts the denomination through the remainder of the convention year?

If needs and opportunities are very great, no one asks a true friend for a little help or favor. Real friendship makes great demands. God, therefore, because he loves us and calls us friends, is asking a big worth-while achievement of each church and every member. What a wonderful chance we all have to serve God Just now!

Great victories only come out of large self-investments. We must therefore be very willing to spend and be spent in order to achieve the victory needed by the local forces and by the Northern Baptist Convention.

We have a magnificent opportunity just now to make a great investment of time, energy, talents and money. The whole task is a unit. If there is failure in the local enterprise there will be a measure of failure in the whole undertaking. If there should be a failure in the New World Movement there will inevitably be a larger measure of loss in practically every local field. Not alone will missionary work across the water suffer, but the work of the pastor, the building of a local edifice, or the enlargement of a congregation will suffer a subtle set-back that will be very hard to overcome in the near future. Because the work is a unit, we must bring all of it at home and abroad to a heroic completion this year. The New World Movement rightly understood is not an organization built to get something out of the local church, but is designed to help the local forces to do the best possible all-round piece of Christian work.

If we succeed in the work of the year it will be because, first of all, we have won the victory for the Lord in our own heart and life. Our real objective is not a new college or more money but a new awakening of love for our Lord and Master, Christ. Real love will do all that is needed everywhere. In other words, the Baptist people are not after a material advance but are seeking spiritual goals. Spiritual goals are more costly of achievement than any others, but they are the most worth-while of all things under heaven. They are never lightly gained. There must be a new self-surrender followed by much agonizing prayer. After we have prayed mighty things can happen, but where prayer is absent only loss will come, so we need to be much in prayer. Prayer however is not a cheap thing; it is a most costly process but it brings spiritual powers and victories. So now, having weighed our task, let us bring God's will to pass this year and achieve the victory we all need.

A Generation of the B. Y. P. U. of America

THE Baptist Young People's Union has entered upon the thirty-third year of its existence and is thus completing its first generation. This affords a sufficient perspective for passing judgment upon its past work and its present tendencies.

To those who were present in that historic and hopeful convention in the old Second Church of Chicago in 1891 and who can look back over the list of participants and leaders it is a most interesting thing to mark how in the years that have elapsed young men who first showed their mettle in that meeting have risen to places of prominence and power in the denomination. It is true that some of the leaders and many of the attendants on that young people's convention were bald and gray, as has been the case to some extent ever since. The young people themselves have recognized the need of mature counsel and guidance; the established missionary and educational organizations of the denomination have always recognized the importance of utilizing the potential forces of youth; and there has been an almost pathetic eagerness on the part of those "not quite so young as they once were" to reassert and renew their youth by associating themselves with the vivid and buoyant young life of these conventions. But the management of the young people's movement has come more predominantly into the hands of the young people themselves, and it is officered by those who are or who seem not out of the class of young people.

The great distinctive feature of our Baptist young people's organized work has, beyond question, been its educational policy. The Christian culture courses, with their study classes and with the valuable books prepared for their work, have been a stimulus to our young people in the attaining of a knowledge of denominational history, of practical church efficiency, of devotional life and of missionary spirit. The enrolment in our colleges in the years since then, the list of our ministers, and the ranks of our missionaries would all, if their sources could be known, show the young people's movement as a chief source of supply of the efficient workers of the generation. Is it not true that the study classes in missions, and those in Baptist principles and history, carried on in so many churches and institutes with such marked success are a definite sequence, even where the connection has not been recognized, of the educational feature of our Baptist Young People's Union? Is it not also true that the summer assembly work carried on so successfully, and usually under the auspices of the young people's organization, are the legitimate offspring of the Ohio Baptist Assembly organized a year or more before the convention of 1891, in which convention among the constituent state organizations Ohio and Michigan were represented by "assemblies," the latter state having copied the example of Ohio?

At any rate the movement throughout the generation, though proceeding at varying rates of speed and efficiency and meeting many crises, has amply justified its existence. It has been carried on at a remarkably small outlay of money, and has accomplished directly and indirectly remarkable achievements for the denomination and the cause of Christianity. It is highly encouraging to the denomination to see this movement assuming new importance, interest and efficiency as it approaches the second generation of its worthy career.

A Summer Swallow and Swallowers

GOVERNOR SMITH of New York did not take the Northern Baptist Convention as seriously as it took itself. He quietly ignored its request that he veto the Cuvillier bill repealing the prohibition enforcement law of their state.

Well, one swallow does not make a summer, and all the swallowers in New York will not restore the saloon business. Both Illinois and Rhode Island, on test votes, have since refused to follow the lead of New York.

Reactions here and there may be expected. Who did not expect it? Even yet, New York has behaved better than some of us feared.

Meanwhile, the International Congress against Alcoholism will meet in Copenhagen in August. A sober world is coming.

The Centrality of Jesus Christ

Preached at Christ Church, Westminster, London, Wednesday, June 6, for the Evangelical Alliance Congress.

By Frederic C. Spurr

> "And I saw in the midst of the throne and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders, a Lamb standing, as though it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth."
> —Rev. 5:6.

THE book of the Apocalypse for many religious people, is under a cloud today. By a certain few it is almost despised, as if it were a jumble of incoherent images — the product of a strange and disordered fancy. By far more it is avoided, as if it were an intricate set of symbols, the explanation of which is forever beyond us. Whatever be the cause or causes of this indifference or suspicion, the fact itself is deeply to be regretted. For there is no book in the whole Bible which is richer in spiritual meanings and fuller of practical significance for our own time than this book. We may admit freely that some of its fine details are still enveloped in a concealing mist, that certain of its symbols do not easily yield their meaning, and that it is necessary to leave a wide margin for secondary interpretations; but after all this there yet remains in clear and splendid relief, the one great central truth of the book to which all the symbols are bound, and of which they are the expression. This truth is fundamental for Christianity. It is eternally vital, vital for that time, vital for our time and vital for all time. It is a truth which, once it becomes our very own, clears the vision, warms the heart, quickens the conscience and strengthens the will and provides the dynamic for all fine Christian living and service. It is the truth of the centrality of our Lord Jesus Christ in the whole scheme of things, and of his absolute lordship over the life of man and of the world. Whatever uncertainty may attach to some of the symbols employed in the book, there can be no uncertainty concerning this main truth which is set forth to the accompaniment of trumpets and hallelujahs.

The Problem Simple

The problem of the book of the Apocalypse is a very simple one. It is this: Shall the Lamb—that is the divine Lord who gave himself in sacrifice for the redemption of the world; or the Beast, the world power of that day, materialistic and often devilish—rule over the life of man? The Lamb and the Beast! These are the two central figures of the book. The gentle and divine power of the one and the brutal and the demoniac power of the other are set in vivid contrast in a series of symbolic images. The war between the two is depicted, and at the end the Beast is seen forever vanquished—his flesh given to the vultures while the Lamb is upon the throne, King of Kings and Lord of Lords. There was no doubt in the mind of St. John as to who should and who shall rule the world.

The problem of the book of the Apocalypse is our problem too. Still the conflict rages between Caesar and Christ. The Beast is yet abroad, branding his fatal mark upon the brow of man, and uniting the powers of evil against our God and his Christ. The person of Christ, the claims of Christ and the ethics of Christ, clash with the pride and passions of men which in turn rise up to resist him.

The methods of the Beast have been modified by the power of civilization, but the aim of the Beast remains the same. What is to be the issue of the conflict? Can we share the triumphant faith of St. John and of the early church? And if so, upon what must it be supported? The whole secret, I submit to you, is offered to us in the fifth chapter of the book of the Apocalypse. It is from the point of view of faith, the central chapter of the book. The seer is in deep distress. He is weeping bitterly as he contemplates existence. The present was to him full of dread and peril. The edict of persecution had gone forth. The emperor was defiling the souls of men with degrading idolatry. Before the statue of Caesar men were commanded to burn incense. The infant church was subjected to the scorching of an intense fire. St. John himself was banished to the mines of Patmos for the testimony of Jesus. This apostle and teacher of the church is anxious about the future. What does it hold for the world and in particular for that society which Christ purchased with his blood? He looks upward and beholds upon the hand of God the roll of destiny strongly sealed with seven seals. Not a man, not an angel is worthy to break the seals. The future is not in the hands of man or angel. Then, in a flash, the revelation comes. An elder, speaking in the symbolic language of the Old Testament indicates that the Messiah, set forth under the national emblem of the lion, has won the right to direct that future. The seer turns to see the lion, and lo! he beholds a lamb, as though it had been slain. In a moment the Jewish picture passes into the Christian picture. No more do we hear of the lion conquering. Henceforth it is the Lamb—that divine person who in himself, at once fulfilled the prophetic word which spake of "one led as a lamb to the slaughter," and the priestly rites which pointed on to him who by the sacrifice of himself consummated all sacrifices. He does what men and angels are unworthy to do to. He alone is worthy of the great task. Lamb though he be, there is no weakness in him. He possesses the plenitude of power, as symbolized by the seven horns, and the plenitude of wisdom as symbolized by the seven eyes. And all this he has won by his sacrifice.

He Cannot Fail

In hands such as his, the future is safe. He cannot fail. Highly significant is it that upon the proclamation of his worthiness, all fall down to worship him. They do not wait until the seals are broken and the secrets revealed. They do not ask "to see the distant scene." They trust him absolutely. They sing their doxology, not at the end of the event when all meanings become clear, but at the beginning when the meanings are still hidden. Again it is significant that after this revelation of Christ's competence there is no further mention of bitter weeping and anxiety on the part of the seer. All in the book beyond this point is keyed to the note of high thanksgiving, and the final scene ends with a hallelujah chorus. "I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of many thunders saying Hallelujah, for the Lord our God, the Almighty, reigneth."

The Whole Church Speaks

In the great central chapter we have far more than the faith of one imaginative man expressing itself. It is the whole church that speaks. The heart of the primitive church is revealed to us. What is here set forth symbolically is exactly the same faith to which St. Paul gave a theological and philosophical form. The Christ of the Apocalypse is the Christ of the Epistles to the Romans and Colossians. The early church knew but one Christ, Lord of all whose lordship was founded upon his redeeming work. They knew him in personal experience. He had redeemed them. Their theology grew out of their spiritual experience of his grace. They were not in intellectual bondage to artificial dogmas created by speculative thinking. They rejoiced in the warmth of an enveloping love which liberated them from the power of their sins and brought them into perfect harmony with God. They possessed a living faith in a living Lord; a masculine faith which, while it was emotional, was also dynamic, creating character, generating endurance, and ensuring victory over the world.

That faith of the primitive church in the absolute lordship of Christ as based upon his redeeming work has never changed. It remains today as ever, central in the thought and life of the whole evangelical body. There have been times when it has suffered eclipse. Fugitive philosophies, vain speculations, troublesome passions, a weakened devotional tone, a lowered spiritual vitality and the force of worldly opinion have in turn thrown their baleful shadow over the soul of man and deprived it of the warmth and glory of the redeeming mercy of the Son of God. But the eclipse has always passed, as eclipses always do, and the sun has shone forth again bringing healing in its beams. We, in our time, have felt the chill of the shadow; we feel it still, but we believe it will pass away and that once again in the warmth of a great religious revival, we shall witness a return to that ancient and simple and fundamental faith in Christ our Lord, in the might of which the modern church will repeat the ancient victories. The most pressing need of our time is a recovery within the church, of that vital faith in the Son of God, by which alone we overcome the world. For the church, alas! in place of overcoming the world has been largely overcome by it; overcome by its speculations, its spirit, its rationalism, its cynicism, its agnosticism, its materialism. The modern Beast no longer draws the sword against the divine society; he finds more effective the method of asphyxiation by means of poisonous vapors which, unperceived, penetrate and paralyze the very soul. It is the enveloping atmosphere of the worldly spirit which today constitutes our deadliest peril, and nothing can effectively repel this attack but a vital spiritual experience rooted in a real union with the living Lord.

Human pride today bitterly opposes the central faith by which the church lives. It has no place for the idea of a divine sacrifice on behalf of human redemption. It has no place for the idea of the divine Lamb reigning over the world.

The Cross Offends

1. It has no place for the idea of a divine sacrifice on behalf of human redemption. From the beginning the cross has been an offence to the proud man. It offends his dignity and he professes that it outrages his ethical sense. But what if his dignity be false and his ethical sense be deflected! What if he refuses to face the facts of human nature as it really is and not as he imagines it to be? And what if he fail to comprehend the truth that love which gives itself to the utmost, even unto death, to secure the highest advantage for its object, expresses the highest ethical law! It is pride, and pride alone, that blinds the eyes of men to the reality of sin and of divine redemption. Whenever pride has run high in any given epoch, there men have made a mock at sin and have treated with lightness or contempt the divine sacrifice offered in behalf of human salvation. But when pride has been abased, and the stark realities of human life have compelled penitence, then men have returned, humbly with baring of the breast to the cross. This is the inner story of every great religious awakening and the persistence of the phenomenon throughout the ages is a proof that here we are in the presence of a law of life. If history has anything to teach us, it is this: That when the sense of sin has disappeared or become weakened, then the cross of Christ has vanished into the mist; then, having no consciousness of sickness men think nothing of the physician.

The Redeemer

But on the contrary, when the sense of sin is real, then men recognize that in the cross lies their one hope. And is there anything more calculated to awaken the sense of sin then the true preaching of the cross? The sense of sin and the cross act and react upon each other. The one calls for the other. The penitent sinner cries for the Redeemer. The Redeemer, shown upon the cross, creates penitence in the sinner.

Pride, I have said, opposes the faith by which the church lives. But where should pride be today? In the easy days before the war we were told that the "higher man was not worrying about his sins." He ought to be worrying about them now, or he is worse than proud, he is criminal. Is this the time for pride, for the vaunting of the "higher man" after the infernal happenings of the war years? Shall we still prate of "not worrying about our sins" when the blood of millions of murdered men cries from the ground to high heaven? Dare the world still wipe its mouth and declare its excellence after it has pressed into the service of the devil the talent of the engineer and the chemist for the wholesale blasting of human life? In the easy days before the war there was widespread revolt against the idea of a Divine Man immolated for the sins of the world. The atonement was even said to be immoral. And the very epoch which turned from the cross and expressed its disgust with the thought of blood shed for human redemption, has been compelled to watch the soil soaked to repletion with the blood of martyred youth which now it glorifies and to the memory of which it raises cenotaphs and monuments. The world has had enough to abase its pride, yet still it refuses to admit its sin and to cry to God for mercy. Until it abases itself and kneels in humble penitence before him whom it has recrucified, there can be no healing of its wound, nor prosperity for its soul, nor progress for its feet.

2. Human pride, also has had, and still has, no place for the idea of God's divine Lamb reigning over the world. The charge brought against Belshazzar by the prophet may with justice be brought against our epoch: "Thou has praised the gods of silver and gold, of brass and iron, wood and stone, and the God in whose hand thy breath is and whose are all thy ways, thou hast not glorified." Men who know nothing of the secret of the living God always incline to a profound faith in material things, and particularly in material force. In our time this faith has risen to the height of a gross idolatry. It has become a religion. Men worship force. Never before in the history of the world has force been so invested with the attributes of divinity, as today: The force of money by which alone pure pleasure is supposed to be procured, true place guaranteed, and overwhelming success achieved. The force of spectacle through which man, victimized by the passing show, is prevented from reflecting upon the things which pertain unto his peace. The force of institutions, the imposing splendor of which silences the conscience and creates moral cowardice. The force of arms by which peoples are held in subjection and when misunderstandings arise are subjected to the hellish cruelties of war. The nations have taken for their symbols the birds and beasts of prey—the lion and the eagle. Where is there one—even a nominal Christian nation—that has dared to adopt the divine symbol of the Lamb? Adopt it! Our epoch scorns the thought, believing it to be absurd, effeminate, unworthy or at the best wholly impracticable.

The Idea of the Age

Our age has committed itself to the idea that man is just a higher beast, some way ahead of the lowlier brethren, but yet belonging to their order and condemned at last to share their fate. From the jungle he has come; to the tomb, common for man and beast, must he march. There is nothing divine in him. He was never made in the likeness and image of God. Any God there is has been made in man's image and likeness, being no more than the creation of his imagination and fear. Life is a vast struggle for existence and with man, as with beasts, the race goes to the swift, the victory to the strong. Whatever amelioration is offered to the unfortunate proceeds, not from the recognition of their spiritual nature so much as from the presence of a social uneasiness which divines that misery unrelieved may become desperate and turn round upon those whose wealth mocks it. But the deeper notes of love and brotherhood in Christ are not sounded because they are disbelieved. For the miserable, the weary and the incurable, even a Dr. Haeckel has nothing better to prescribe than suicide. Since there is nothing beyond this life, no God to believe in, no Saviour to redeem, the shortening of life by means of a violent end is an act of courage and of virtue. To such infernal logic, the materialist who admits no God, commits himself.

Force Exalted

To counterbalance this horror, the superman of Nietzsche was created. But again force was exalted. Man was all in all and he must rule by force. Contempt, even to the point of vituperation, was poured upon Christianity which was designated a "slave religion." The ideas of these and other false masters penetrated the minds of millions and the result was the violent explosion which laid Europe in ruins. Men may disguise it as they will, and seek for the causes of the late war in immoral diplomacy, commercial envy, unprincipled journalism and unnatural greed—the fact remains that the radical cause of the disaster which in 1914 overtook the world, is to be found in the deliberate repudiation by mankind of the Lamb of God as its only true ruler, and the enthronement in his place, of the Beast. Does the world now believe this? Does it see its colossal error and sin? Is it cured of its fatal trust in force? Let the present state of Europe and the increase in armaments in nearly all civilized countries supply the answer. In every place, God be thanked, there are deep stirrings of conscience and a growing uneasiness concerning the whole matter. The churches are speaking with no uncertain sound. But the world as a whole has learned little from its bitter experience. The Beast is still the popular idol. Must there be another hell let loose before mankind will return to its senses and offer its sole worship to the Lamb of God?

What is the great business of the church of God in this critical hour of human life? The church is Christ's body; the medium through which the living Head expresses himself in the world. The church is meant to be vocal for him and active for him. It is his witness to mankind. It has no other raison d'etre than this. When it degenerates into a club or an entertainment society or a company of religious formalists, it suffers degradation and eclipse, and justly earns the contempt of men. Its business is not primarily to formulate a philosophy or a theology, although we are bound to do both, but to bear unceasing witness by lip and in life to the Lamb of God as the Redeemer and the Lord of the world. It is to a person that we witness; one who has appeared in history and to whom historical documents and institutions testify; one who is at work in personal human lives, delivering them from the grip of sin and empowering them for all holy service—the Christ of history and the Christ of experience. The heart of this witness lies in the Cross and in the throne; the Christ yielding his life in sacrifice for the sins of the world, and the Christ reigning as the Lamb by the power of gentleness, love and holiness, winning by his wounds and not by the sword. This central witness to Christ has from the beginning of its career been the distinguishing mark of the Evangelical Alliance. The alliance has brought together men of diverse minds and varied outlook who are nevertheless one in the things that matter. It has ever realized that the real center of unity is found in the common loyal devotion of Christians to him who by his cross redeemed the world.

Christ Supreme

For it Christ is supreme. He transcends both nation and denomination. "To him shall the gathering of the people be." Such an alliance, providing as it does, a common meeting ground for all to whom Christ is all, should command the sympathy and support of all evangelical Christians. Single voices here and there speaking amidst the din and noise of the modern world are feeble and liable to be unheard. But a combined voice speaking from such a platform as that of the alliance, utters itself as a trumpet and compels attention. Let us, by aiding it, ensure that its sound shall be increasingly clear and effective. But in the last analysis, for an effective witness to be borne to Christ, it is necessary that the entire body of Christian people shall recover the glory and the power of the evangelical faith which works by love. Too long have we been speaking with bated breath concerning the Person of Christ. We have seen him analyzed, criticized, diminished and reduced to ordinary proportions by the apparatus of modern investigation, and we have feared lest, after all, his glory should depart. But now we see by the light of the red fires of war that it is not his glory which has been dimmed, but theirs who criticized him and refused to obey him. The supposed giants of yesterday have become the real dwarfs of today, while away to the horizon there stands but one supreme figure—the true Lord and Redeemer of men—Jesus Christ. Christians must one and all recover the faded vision of the Seer of Patmos and behold the Lamb of God as central in sacrifice and central in rulership. A new and fuller experience of Christ would wipe away all our tears, dismiss all our doubts and prove to us the invincible certitude of the final victory. There is no hope for the world save in the ancient gospel as preached and practised by the church in a new and living way. To this immense task Christ calls us.

The Attractive Christ as Saviour and Lord

An Address before the Boston Convention, July 7

By Samuel Judson Porter

THE attractive Christ! What an engaging subject. Attractive means having the power or quality of drawing forth interest or affection. Surely Christ is attractive. Sidney Lanier is speaking in "The Crystal":

"But Thee, but Thee, O sovereign Seer of time,
But Thee, O poets' Poet, Wisdom's Tongue,
But Thee, O Man's best Man, O love's best Love,
O perfect life in perfect labor writ,
O all men's Comrade, Servant, King, or Priest—
What if or yet, what mole, what flaw, what lapse,
What least defect or shadow of defect,
What rumor, tattled by an enemy,
Of inference loose, what lack of grace
Even in torture's grasp, or sleep's, or death's—
Oh, what amiss may I forgive in Thee,
Jesus, good Paragon, thou Crystal Christ?"

Here is a character whose authorative power compelled soldiers to respect him, whose spiritual quality won the noblest women to his discipleship, whose hope-bringing compassion drew disheartened sinners to a new life, whose courageous advocacy of righteousness stirred the enthusiasm of devoutest men, whose gentleness made little children eager to leap into his arms. Indeed he won all sorts of people, and filled up that which was lacking in every life that turned to him.

"What the hand is to the lute,
What the breath is to the flute,
What is fragrance to the smell,
What the spring is to the well,
What the flower is to the bee,
That is Jesus Christ to me.

"What the mother to the child,
What the guide in pathless wild,
What is oil to troubled wave,
What is ransom to the slave,
What is water to the sea,
That is Jesus Christ to me."

So attractive was he and so abiding is his winsomeness that history, religion, and worship; poetry, music, painting and sculpture, exhaust their resources to proclaim his glory, and to offer him praise worthy of the adoration which ages have consecrated to him. And upon what throne do these unite in placing him? Upon a cross, yes upon a cross, for it was he himself who said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

Young Arthur's Claim

There is an interesting story as to the way in which young Arthur's claim to the throne of Britain was established by a competitive trial of strength. The knights and barons of the realm were assembled in front of London's greatest church in whose yard they saw a great marble stone and in the midst of it a steel anvil, and sticking in the steel anvil by its point a naked and gleaming sword on which were written in letters of gold, "Whoso pulleth out this sword out of this stone and anvil, the same is likewise king born of England." So one after another of the great ones gave themselves to the task. They pulled and tugged and strained, but not one of them was able even to budge the sword. Then Arthur came, the unknown son of a simple knight, as people thought him to be, and without the least effort or trouble drew the sword from its resting place. None prevailed save Arthur, and the people recognized that in the man, whose hand was mighty enough to draw Excalibur and wield it with masterly skill, the rightful king of England had been found. May I use this old story to illustrate the majestic power and attractiveness of Jesus Christ? In the long ago God's holy prophet had spoken saying, "Behold a virgin shall be with child and shall bring forth a son and they shall call his name Immanuel, which being interpreted is, 'God with us.'" What Excalibur was to the British barons, this prophecy was to the great men who appeared in Israel. "Whoso answereth to this name, the same is the Son of God and the King of Israel." And none answered to it until Jesus came. All others failed; but Jesus answered and fulfilled every requirement. The name fitted him as a glove fits the hand. Just exactly as Arthur proved his prowess and claims by drawing and wielding Excalibur, so Jesus made the people about him feel that he was Immanuel by the words he spoke and the deeds he did. He produced within them the sense of God; he wrought upon them the works of God. Charmed and attracted by him, they said, "Thou art indeed the Son of God." When we attempt to trim the uniqueness of Christ and to empty him of any of his divine dignities, we are not getting back to Christ; we are getting away from him. To those who stood nearest him he was not mere man. Despite his humble home and his seamless dress, his glory flashed and blazed before their eyes. Taking up a volume by one of our famous American authors, I reveled in his elegant language, neatly turned phrases and delightful verses, until I came upon these words about great men:

"One was born in a manger,
And one by Avon's stream,
One grew up by the banks of Nile,
And one in the Academe."

The charm was gone. I shuddered. It was like a blow struck in the face of my dearest Lord. To put him in line with even the best, greatest and wisest of men —with Shakespeare, Moses and Plato or even to name him, as has been lately done, in a list of the world's highest notables—can be hardly less offensive than the act of those who nearly nineteen centuries ago crucified him between two thieves. It is like setting the glimmer of a candle in competition with the glory of the sun:

"They are but broken lights of thee
And thou, O Lord, art more than they."

He is out of all comparison. He is the unrivaled Christ.

"Majestic sweetness sits enthroned
Upon the Saviour's brow,
His head with radiant glories crowned,
His lips with grace o'erflow.

"No mortal can with him compare,
Among the sons of men;
Fairer is he than all the fair
That fill the heavenly train."

The attractive Christ is supremely attractive as Saviour. Once as he moved forward under the shadow of the cross, it is written that "at that time he answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth." And is it not true that very often the only answer to discouragement is found in prayer? And then he added, "All things are delivered unto me of my Father." In his discouragement he knew that while there were barriers in the hearts of men, there was no barrier in the heart of God, and that though men would have none of him he exulted in the thought that he had everything for them. Then followed such an outpouring of heart as there never has been before. He knows that only in the Father can men find rest and so he says, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." It is beautiful and touching how our Lord in these most precious words makes his appeal more personal than he has ever done before. Hitherto his great subject has been the kingdom of heaven, and he has called upon men to enter it, but they have refused to do so. He knows what the difficulty is; it is the hardness of their hearts. If he could only get at their hearts! But how can he do it? It can only be by the opening out of all his heart, so he will now make his pleading a personal entreaty. And how tenderly he thinks of them—no more upbraiding, no more reproof. He will seek to reach the conscience through the heart. He forgets everything but their weariness and their woe. "Come unto me and I will give you rest"; "Learn of me and ye shall find rest." This, sweetest of all his invitations, the most touching of all his appeals, comes from a heart that has just been wounded in its tenderest place and has grown weary with the bitterest of cruel disappointment. It is here that we see Christ in his full attractiveness. "Come unto me and I will rest you", is the invitation which he gives to sinners laboring and heavy laden. "Take my yoke upon you and you shall find rest", is the invitation which he gives to those who are willing to serve him as Lord. Sinners are given rest as they come to him as Saviour. His disciples find rest as they serve him as Lord.

The Decisive Test

That is the decisive test of a religion that claims to be universal and professes to meet the needs of a world. What message has it for those who labor and are heavy laden? A religion that can not minister to them is not worth the name. And who are the weary and heavy laden? I am thinking they are the people who have lost heart; the people who feel life's load too heavy for them; the people whose spirits are wounded and crushed by sorrow; the people who are worn and torn and shorn by sorrow, by temptation, by fear, by sin—terrible deathly sin. I venture to say they constitute the majority of mankind. At one time or another we all find ourselves enrolled in one of these ranks. Can our religion do anything for such? Can Christ minister to the diseased mind? Can he bind up the broken in heart? If so, his gospel is different from some other theories that prevail in the world, which find expresson in the cheerless philosophy of Omar Khayyam:

"The moving finger writes; and, having writ,
Moves on; nor all your piety nor wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
Nor all your tears wash out a word of it."

It is only in the gospel of Christ that we find out that God is really on our side. As good old Matthew Henry puts it, "By the light of nature we see God as a God above us; by the light of the law we see him as a God against us, but by the light of the gospel we see him as a God with us." That is the great attraction that sinners find in Christ—that God is not against us; but for us and with us and on our side. Mr. Matheson in his book on "The Portrait of Christ" puts it this way; "Christianity is a regressive religion." That is it exactly. It goes back to gather up the lost things—the things that have fallen by the roadside and have been left behind. It is the glory of Jesus that he goes back to the dark forest of humanity to seek the wilful, bewildered children that have lost their way. All other religions and theories are pressing forward. Plato can build his ideal republic, if you will allow him to seek his material. Let him have cultured, refined, virtuous people to work with, and he can create what he believed would be an ideal state, but it is only the "fit" he wants. Jesus alone has a message for the weak, the other religions preach the heartless doctrine of the "survival of the fittest." Jesus preaches the "survival of the unfit." He brings good tidings to the poor. He was a friend to publicans and sinners. The men and women who have fallen on the march and been left crippled along the way—he breathes new hope in them, lifts them up and sets them going in the highway of God's commandments. It is just this that makes him the attractive Christ. It is indeed true that not all your tears can wash out the stain of sin, but it is true that "the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth from all sin," and that "when we were yet without strength, in due time, Christ died for the ungodly." It is the Christ of the cross that is attractive to sinners, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." I have seen the drawing power of Christ demonstrated over and over again. I know that he can lift the burden from the suffering heart, that he does forgive men's sins and set them free. I know that the gospel will work, for I have seen it work; and nowhere more effectively than among the cowboys in the mountains of New Mexico, many miles from the railroads and towns where I have gone each summer for a number of years and preached and seen those stalwart sons of the frontier coming forward, shod in silver-spurred boots and with bandana handkerchiefs about their necks, coming forward to confess their sins and to accept the salvation which Christ freely gives.

The attractiveness of Christ increases as his righteousness is revealed to us from faith to faith, and as we receive of his fulness, grace upon grace. As we take his yoke and bear it we find completer rest. Following the symbolism of the yoke we may say that it stands for mastership, fellowship and service.

Only as we accept the lordship of Christ will it be possible for us to know how gloriously attractive he is. We find rest as we submit to his yoke. It has been said that Christ in his days of toil at Nazareth was a maker of yokes and that he fitted them to the necks of the animals, so that they might, without pain or choking, draw their burdens more easily. A yoke is not an instrument of torture or punishment. Some mischievous cattle are burdened with instruments to prevent them from pushing through the fences, but such an instrument is not a yoke, its correct name is poke and is defined as a collar with an impeding attachment, as prongs of iron projecting, so as to keep beasts from breaking through an enclosure. There may be those who think of the mastership of Christ as such a hindrance, but this is not the case. Christ's rule is not a poke, but a yoke, and he says that his yoke is easy, while John declares that "his commandments are not grievous." We must take his yoke voluntarily. He will not make us take it. "And as they came out they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name; him they compelled to go with them, that he might bear his cross." Simon did not consent to the cross, neither did he carry it sympathetically. He was coerced. In contrast with this, Paul declared that he gloried in the cross, even to the point of crucifixion with Christ. How many of us really take seriously this subject of the mastership of Christ? It is not enough that we cling to the cross; we are called upon to carry it. Are we willing to bend our necks under his yoke and bare our shoulders beneath his cross. I am quite sure that we err in trying to make the gospel too cheap and bringing it to lower and lower terms. There are no terms to be higgled over in the gospel. Christ never offered less than himself in all his grace and truth, and he never asks less than the surrender of the whole man to himself. Christ asks that we give ourselves to him, and not to an easy service, but to something the figure of which is a yoke, the symbol of which is a cross. When Garibaldi summoned young Italy in 1849 he said, "I do not offer pay, provisions or quarters; I offer hunger, thirst, forced marches, battles, and death." And it was to that cry that the deep heart of his people responded, and when a voice like that is uttered in the church by men who have the right to utter it, then we can be sure that the thin ranks will fill up again and our king go forth conquering and to conquor.

CHRISTIANITY is a religion of redemption and its efficacy never waits upon our convenience, or our liking. It is not a worship of discovery, but an unconditional surrender! It is imperative and universal in its demands. It brings the soul of man into vital contact with God, and insists on absolute obedience to his will. Our protests come from unwilling hearts. To refuse a simple request may be the one fatal act in a man's life; on the other hand obedience to a very plain command may be for us as for Naaman, the pathway to a great blessing. To do as we are told is our great need, and to all who realize it, and act upon it, the Jordan of our cleansing is not insignificant, nor distant, nor as difficult as we think, but near at hand!—Arthur T. Fowler.

"O Cross that liftest up my head,
I dare not ask to hide from Thee;
I lay in dust life's glory dead,
And from the ground there blossoms red
Life that shall endless be."

"Heaven-Light"

Accepting the lordship of Christ we enter into truest fellowship with him. A yoke is not an instrument to be borne by one, but by two. To yoke means literally to couple together, to join. Christ asks us to join him under the yoke which he himself is bearing. Says Jesus, "Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends." Coming thus into fellowship, it is our privilege to live in the glow of a great love. John Ruskin says that there is no great picture possible unless there be in it what he calls "heaven-light." And there is no really great life possible in this world except as a man lives it in the light of the unseen and the eternal, and this comes to us through fellowship with Christ. There is a story of a Flemish blacksmith who fell in love with the daughter of a painter. The painter had vowed that the daughter should marry none but a distinguished master of his own craft. This blacksmith, Quintin Matsys, laid down his hammer and quit the forge; he entered a studio and seized the brush, and today—four centuries after his death—pilgrims and tourists cross Europe to gaze upon the mystery of "The Descent from the Cross" in the Antwerp Cathedral. "The more I love Christ," exclaimed Gustave Doré, "the better I can paint him." And it is true that as we all enter into loving fellowship with Christ, the more beautiful and triumphant our lives become. Our environment is thus transformed and our tasks transfigured. John fretted like a caged lion on his rock at Patmos, but his vision has enriched every time and every clime. "I was in the isle" says John, but in the very next sentence he says, "I was in the spirit." And then he tells us how the glorified Christ stood with him. Stephen was surrounded by an infuriated multitude. One would say that he saw only a persecuting mob, that he heard only voices of blasphemy, but listen; "But he, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven and saw the glory of God and Jesus standing on the right hand of God." John Bunyan dwelt within the narrow walls of Bedford jail with many coarse and painful things to suffer; but through fellowship with Christ his spiritual imagination made him live in a country where it was summer the year round, and he dwelt in the Palace Beautiful, climbed the Hill of Beulah, heard the sounding of golden trumpets, and saw the Celestial City lighted with the glory of God.

Above all, the yoke is designed for service, and it is also true that we discover Christ's greatest attractiveness when we give ourselves as his yokefellows to do his will in seeking to win the lost, "filling up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in our flesh for his body's sake, which is the church." Our Lord is willing to use us in proportion as we yield ourselves to him for use. The promise is, "I will pour out my spirit upon my servants, that is, my bondslaves"—his servants who are wholly dedicated to him, who are wholly given up to his will.

May I tell another story from the "Idylls of the King," that beautiful one touching the passing of Arthur? Coming down to the lake shore, leaning upon the arm of Sir Bedivere, his last faithful knight, he took his sword, Excalibur, saying, "Take it down to the shore; cast it into the water; watch what happens, and come back and tell me the result." And Sir Bedivere took the blade, bore it to the shore, but hid it in the rushes, for he had not the heart to cast it away. And then he came back to the king with a falsehood. Immediately the king bade his go again, and do his last behest. Again he went to the shore. He scanned the wonderful sword, with its keen edge, tempered blade, and hilt bedecked with precious stones of unspeakable value and he had not the heart to cast away the precious weapon. Again he hid it, and came back to the king with the same false report upon his lips. Then the dying king, with hot indignation, warned him that, unless he hastened at once to do his bidding, he would rise up and put him to death with his own hands. Upon that the knight ran with hasty steps, picked up the blade, lifted it in the air, and hurling it over the sea, waited to see it sink. But it sank not. Instead there rose up from the bosom of the water a wondrous hand.

"Clothed in white samite, mystic, wonderful," which laid hold of the marvelous sword, brandished it in the air three times, and then drew it down into the tranquil waters below. The precious blade had not been cast away. It had only been taken back by him who first bestowed it upon the king.

My friend, your life is like that blazing sword in the hands of the faltering knight. How precious, beautiful, and strong! To give it to God seems like casting it away, hurling it into a vast sea of loss. But you are mistaken! For as you fling it forth, it falls—not into an engulfing sea where it sinks and is lost, but into the sea of God's loving will for your life. And as you surrender it, there reaches up a hand not "clothed with samite," but a blood-stained hand, a nail pierced hand; and it will take your life and draw it down into the sea of God's eternal purpose and make it a weapon of power for the glory of his kingdom.

The close-locked lily-bulb, dormant in the bottom of the pond, responding to the attraction of the sun's rays, climbs into the upper light to bloom in fragrant splendor. I have set this thought in these simple little lines:

Lily wrapped up in the mire,
Thou art stirring with desire
Darksome depths to leave and climb
Upward into light sublime.
Tender lily, growing green,
Calyxes so crisp and clean!
Graceful lily, bursting white
Into petals of delight!
Queenly in thy dainty dress
Richly wrought in loveliness,
Pretty, precious, soulful thing,
Round thee lavish fragrance fling.

So may we answer to the attraction of Christ and rise to dispense his grace through the unselfish flowering of our souls.

"To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the nations." Reveal, literally, "uncalyx," as when the expanding rosebud bursts into full flower, while the calyxes are completely hidden by the rich colored petals. To "uncalyx" Christ is to preach him or make him known among the people. This is the true evangelism. In one of Raphael's famous pictures we see the dove of the Holy Spirit, surrounded by four angels, carrying the four gospels. Let the attendants of this great meeting go back to their homes, each in his own place and to his own task, like evangelizing angels, guided by the divine Spirit, carrying the gospel of redemption and seeking by all means to win some to Christ.

Education in the Christian Program

Address at the Thirty-Second Annual Convention of the B. Y. P. U. of A., July 6

By Frank W. Padelford

CHRISTIANITY is essentially a teaching religion. In this important respect it differs from all the other great religions of history. It was in fact founded by a teacher. It was this aspect of the ministry of Jesus which most impressed his followers. When a member of the Jewish government came to see him at night, he hailed him as the "Teacher sent from God." The term of respect and endearment with which his friends always addressed him was that of "Teacher." While it is true that the multitudes followed him "because of the signs which he did" and because "they ate of the loaves and were filled", yet there was an increasingly large company who attached themselves to him, because from day to day he was ever opening up to them the great mysteries of life.

When he was about to leave them Jesus gave to his disciples a three-fold commission. In the first place they were to proclaim the good news which he had given to them. In the second place, in the ordinance of baptism, they were to witness the confession of those who had become obedient to the new faith. In the third place they were to teach, to train, to educate, those whom they had led into the new life.

This has been the three-fold commission of the Christian church from that day. As the church has held these three aspects of its mission in proper balance it has had power and influence. When it has negelected any one of them it has always done so to its own injury and to the loss of the world. When it has emphasized preaching to the exclusion of teaching, fanaticism has always set in. When it has emphasized baptism to the exclusion of preaching and teaching, sacerdotalism has crept in. When it has emphasized teaching to the exclusion of preaching, a dead formalism has developed. It is only as the church has held these three commands of the Great Commission in the proper balance, that it has been able to forward the interests of the kingdom which Jesus came to establish.

Very early in its career the church which Jesus had established began the task of education. It founded elementary schools for the training of the children of the parish, but, not satisfied with these first steps, it established higher schools and then capped its system with a university located at Alexandria. This first Christian university was the forerunner of a long line of colleges in all parts of the world founded by the church of Jesus Christ.

In fact until very recent times, almost within the memory of living men, education has been almost exclusively in the hands or under the patronage of the Christian church. In the United States we have come to think of education as the function of the state and we have built up here the first great system of state education. But our system was inaugurated by the church and its foundations were laid as a part of the ministry of the church. By the close of the Civil War nearly all the primary education had been taken over by the different states, but most of the high-school education, even then, was given in academies founded and maintained by the Christian church.

As for the colleges, all the early institutions in America were founded by the churches. All the colleges in New England were established by the churches, and of the 119 colleges first founded east of the Mississippi River, 104 of them were Christian colleges. Until after the Civil War there were practically no colleges or universities founded or maintained by the states. Since that time state universities have been established in nearly every state, but many of these owe their origin directly to the efforts of the church.

There are in this country today over four hundred colleges and universities which have been founded, and are being maintained, largely by the Christian churches. Into them Christian people have poured their money in small gifts and in large, until these gifts amount to hundreds of millions of dollars. The largest investment the American people have made is in their schools and a large part of this investment has been made by Christian people and Christian churches. One of the outstanding activities of the Christian church in all lands is its work of Christian education. It is surpassed only by its work of evangelism. It occupies the attention of thousands of the leading Christians of all countries who are devoting their lives to the education of the young people of the succeeding generation.

If now education has formed so large a part of the activities of the Christian church for so long a time, has absorbed the life of so many thousands of Christian teachers, has received so many hundreds of millions of dollars from earnest Christian men and women; then we are bound to acknowledge that it is a phase of life which no one can overlook, minimize or fail to recognize of tremendous significance and importance. In view of these facts no young man or woman can pass it by as unworthy of their serious attention. No one can be true to himself until he has asked himself whether he has secured all the education and training which he needs to make him count for the most in the life of this world. I want, therefore, to set before you the advantages—some of them at least—which come to a man or woman as a result of thorough education, and I shall speak exclusively of a college education, for I take it for granted that I do not need to argue the necessity of an education of any lower grade. But there are many young people who are not yet convinced of the advantages, and almost the necessity, of a college education.

The first question in life is of necessity that concerning our bread and butter. How can we best earn our living? A prosperous business man said to a college representative, "If you will show how it is going to pay, I will talk to you about sending my girls to college." He wanted to be shown on a basis of dollars and cents how much more his girls would be worth to him if they had an education. This is a very low basis upon which to discuss such a matter, but we might as well begin at the bottom.

It is not as easy in these days to convince ourselves of the monetary value of a college education as it once was. You look around you and see the stone masons and bricklayers few of whom have had more than a common-school education, earning $10 to $12 a day and on the other hand many professional men whose income is much below that, and you ask what is the use of securing an education. Leaving aside for the present the unquestioned fact of the comparatively inflated value of labor, it yet remains true that in the long run the educated man has a distinct advantage in the matter of his income and his chance of success.

Nine Dollars a Day

The United States commissioner of education has asserted on a basis of an extensive study, that a common-school education increases a man's productive ability 50 per cent, a high-school training increases it 100 per cent, and a college training increases it from 200 to 300 per cent. The commissioner has also figured out that each day of schooling is worth to the average student the sum of $9. Not many of us could be really earning $9 a day at the age when we go to school or college.

President Thwing made an investigation of a group of sixty-five college graduates whose homes were in one city and among them found eighteen bankers, fifteen railroad managers, ten manufacturers, seven presidents of chief insurance companies, and five conspicuous publishers, a total of fifty-five out of the sixty-five.

The attitude of the business world on this matter has undergone a great change. It is well illustrated by the changed opinion of the late Andrew Carnegie. Thirty years ago he said that "the college man has not the slightest chance, entering business at twenty, against the boy who swept the office or began as shipping clerk at fourteen." Twenty years later Mr. Carnegie declared that "the business men of America have at last come to realize that a college education has a commercial value."

Mr. Seligman, a leading man on Wall Street, has said "In my business I prefer men who have received a college education. In every walk of life the necessity of higher education is becoming more and more apparent all the time."

Charles M. Schwab, foremost man in the steel industry, said "Today industrial conditions favor the college man. Business is conducted on so vast a scale that the broadening effects of higher education write a large figure."

George M. Reynolds, the leading banker in the West says: "I would like to impress on boys, 'Go to college.' I did not go. But I recognize that the man who does has a tremendous handicap over the boy who has to plod step by step through the school of experience."

If there was any doubt in our minds on this subject a few years ago it was forever dispelled from the mind of any thinking man by the experiences of the war. It was the college man who immediately leaped to the front. He was in demand at every point, on the land, under the water, in the air. He commanded the situation everywhere. So impressed was the government with his superior value, that it made provision for giving a hurried education to hundreds of thousands of boys. If never before in all history, then during those short months of the war the college man demonstrated his ability to surpass his less trained brother at practically every point. His advantage will never again be questioned as long as the experiences of the great war are remembered. It is not strange that the enrolment of our colleges has increased by unprecedented leaps and bounds since the war closed.

After all "the purpose of an education is not to make us seem greater to the world, but to make the world seem greater to us." We cannot fail to be concerned about the questions of our livelihood and of our influence in the world, but the great questions concern the enlargement and development of our minds and character.

But it is not merely in the financial returns that the advantage is with the educated man. In the direction and leadership of modern life his place is also secure. The advance of knowledge has become so widespread that it is necessary to get as much education as possible to hold a position of influence in these days. In every avenue of life one must face thoroughly trained and educated men, and a man with a college education has no better training relatively than had the boy with the common-school education a short time ago.

While you are in Boston you will visit the State House—most of you will call it the Capitol but the Yankees say State House—upon the dome of the House of Representatives you will see inscribed the names of fifty-three Massachusetts "Immortals." Forty of them were college men. About one man in fifty in the United States is a college graduate yet from this comparatively small number come more than 50 per cent of our leading government representatives — congressmen, judges, presidents—and more than 70 per cent of our leading clergymen, lawyers, physicians and authors. The percentage is rising all the time.

President Thwing who made some most interesting studies, some time ago, of the relative position of college men, discovered that the chances of the college man of attaining success and fame, as compared with the man who has not had this privilege is as 250 to 1. That is, if you take 10,000 children and send none of them to college, one will attain distinction. If you take forty children and send them to college, one out of that small group will attain distinction.

Less than 1 per cent of American men are college graduates, yet out of this 1 per cent have come:

55 per cent of our presidents.

36 per cent of our members of congress.

47 per cent of the speakers of the House.

56 per cent of the vice-presidents.

62 per cent of the secretaries of state.

50 per cent of the secretaries of the treasury.

69 per cent of the justices of the Supreme Court.

Who's Who

In the latest edition of "Who's Who," in which are revealed the names of more than 20,000 men and women in the United States who have attained distinction, 59 per cent are college graduates and 14 per cent more have had some college training—and yet remember that only 1 per cent of American men are college graduates.

Many similar studies along these lines have been made but they all tell the same story. For positions of influence and leadership in all branches of life the advantage is overwhelmingly with the men and women who have had the advantages of a college education. They have no keener or finer minds to start with than have thousands of their fellows, but the training and experience which they have received during their college days have given them a handicap which it is almost impossible for their less fortunate companions to overcome. It would be stating it too strongly to assert that the men and women who have not been so fortunate as to have had a college education have no chance to become leaders in American life, but it is true to assert that they are so severely handicapped that but few of them can hope to attain the positions of leadership which would easily have been theirs had they had the training essential to success. If you have an ambition to be a leader among your fellows you cannot afford to forego the best education you can secure. The young people of this generation might well make as their own the declaration of purpose made by Abraham Lincoln—"I will study and get ready and maybe my chance will come."

But after all "the purpose of an education is not to make us seem greater to the world but to make the world seem greater to us." We cannot fail to be concerned about the questions of our livelihood and of our influence in the world, but the great questions concern the enlargement and development of our own minds and characters.

When Aristotle was asked how the educated man differed from the uneducated, he replied: "As the living differ from the dead."

The great advantage of this higher education is that it introduces us to and makes us familiar with a constantly en-helpful, international Christian fellowship among the Baptist young people of Canada and the United States has been fostered. May this fellowship continue to grow and expand until it shall be a great Christian fellowship, not only among the Baptist young people of North America but of the world.

"In response to most urgent calls from young people's groups in Europe, we are sending our general secretary, Dr. James Asa White, to attend the Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm and there confer with leaders from several countries regarding the possible organization of a Baptist Young People's Union of the World. The achievements of the past are insignificant compared with what may be accomplished by this great organization in the future, under the leadership of the living Christ. No other organization is prepared to take the leadership of enlisting and inspiring the three million Baptist young people of North America for a great loyalty to the denomination and to the kingdom. Young people must have a larger share in the work of the church and of the kingdom. Bishop Vincent of the Methodist Episcopal Church says 'The church that is wise toward its youth will shine as the stars.'

"The church needs the idealism, the initiative, the enthusiasm, the optimism and the courage of youth. May the inspiration of this great gathering enable us to sing:

The strength of youth we lay
At Jesus' feet today
'Tis loyalty, loyalty,
Yes, loyalty to Christ.

"Young people are challenged by the many opportunities for service and leadership in the local society and local church. In business, in politics, in social and religious life there is the greatest demand for trained leadership. The offices and committees of the young people's society, the Sunday-school classes and departments, Boy Scouts, Campfire Girls, World Wide Guild, evangelistic bands, church vacation schools and other opportunities give to the young people a mighty challenge for training in leadership.

"A challenge comes to us because we are Baptist young people. Sectarianism and narrow denominationalism have no appeal for us and still we believe our great denomination has a unique mission in the world today. The greatest word in the world during the past quarter of a century has been democracy. Within a single decade kingdoms and empires have been overthrown and republics have taken their place. Autocracy has lost its grip and the individual is coming into his own. Political and industrial democracy are never safe with religious autocracy. Our Baptist fathers have achieved religious democracy. No Christian body is better prepared to meet the needs of the world today. The supreme challenge comes to us as young people through the attractiveness of the Christ."

Mayor Curley took the platform at the close of President Sanborn's address. He praised the spirit of Boston and that of Massachusetts, which he said were derived from the Puritan ideal, and meant love of God and country. "It is what America needs for its own well-being, and for the welfare of humanity, the whole world over." He noted a "growth away from idealism." Quoting Washington he said: "'We must ever be mindful that education without morality is anarchy.' We need morality," he continued. "There can be no law and order without belief in Almighty God and belief in the hereafter. Each must say: 'I must have a sense of obligation to my fellow man who may not have the same ideas as I, with no limitations of race, creed or class upon the life, liberty and pursuit of happiness of any individual.' Go back to your homes with a new faith, and a new vision, imbued with a new patriotism, with a new love of country and a new sense of what you owe to your particular church organization. The city of Boston stands for the retention of the best possible standards of American life."

BLESS the Lord, O my soul,
And all that is within me,
bless his holy name.
Bless the Lord, O my soul,
And forget not all his benefits;
Who forgiveth all thine iniquities;
Who healeth all thy diseases;
Who redeemeth thy life from destruction;
Who crowneth thee with loving kindnesses and tender mercies;
Who satisfieth they mouth with good things;
So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle.
—Moulton's Modern Readers' Bible."

Rev. Charles N. Arbuckle, of Newton Centre, was next introduced.

Doctor Arbuckle said: "It is a long time since Jacob's struggle with the angel. We don't see angels very often now. But the story sheds light on the life that we live. For the Jew it told him how certain things came to be what they were: the name Israel, the name of the town, and why certain portions of the flesh of animals were not eaten. It is also a light on life and its mystery. God's angels wrestle with us unawares.

"Twenty years before, Jacob made a prayer in exile, after he had defrauded his brother and cheated his father. He slept with his head upon a stone and had a dream of a ladder to heaven. His earlier dream was only a reverie. He was willing only to benefit from his contract with God. The later dream was more than a reverie; he was willing to be a conqueror. There is no attitude more important to take than that.

"We all face the same difficulties. We differ in our native capacities. But for all kinds of people there is no higher attitude. Faith is not a hand-out, not a gift. It is an achievement. The rewards of insight and trust come to men like Jacob. We have to think, to struggle in order to be convinced. Who advances toward the goal? The man haunted with the same problem day and night, till the solution flashes on his mind and he sees.

"Some persons wish religion codified—a, b, c and d. We are saved by character as well as by faith. You can't have good faith with poor character, or good character on poor faith. Jacob limped away, but had a changed character. If you come out with a limp, be sure you come out with a character. Religion is not a hand-out but a conquest. You can't get religion like a ready-made suit. Don't be afraid of doubt. The only thing wrong with it is when you settle down with it. Struggle through it to the end."

The Five-Year Program

Dr. John Y. Aitchison, general director of the General Board of Promotion of the Northern Baptist Convention, was the final speaker of the morning session. His address took up the aims and results of the five-year program begun four years ago, and what will take its place in the future. The program adopted in 1919 by the Southern Convention called for $75,000,000. That of the Northern Convention, likewise for five years, called for one thousand new missionaries in home and foreign fields and $100,000,000. The Canadian Baptists plan their program year by year.

Criticism that the Northern Convention had undertaken to do too much, Doctor Aitchison met by pointing to 129 millions of people living in sections of the world where absolutely no provision for evangelization is made. In particular, he described the inadequate number of missionaries in Bengal, India, where, in many of the fifty-three governmental divisions, there is one missionary to 100,000 to 900,000 people. There are regions with 500,000 people without any missionary.

After telling of individual efforts and sacrifices, he told the story of one girl's attitude toward the campaign of the church "to hold the youth." "We don't want to be held," she said. "We want a program so big it will hold us." A young man who wanted to do something big was asked to turn the ice-cream freezer. That was not enough. From that it was a far cry to victory for Christ.

In the problem of lining up resources there was reason for optimism in the receptive attitude of the editor of a Polish paper in Milwaukee, with a circulation of 83,000. He said: "Our people are all weary of the oppression under which they are forced to live and of the domination of the priests. You Baptists stand for the pure spirit of religion, the dictates of the individual's own conscience, religious liberty and Christian democracy."

"There is no room for the pessimist in the world today," continued Doctor Aitchison. "The man who is a pessimist is one whose faith is not deeply rooted in the eternal values of the Christian religion. The Christian life is not an easy one, but a perplexing one, with many soul anguishes.

"We don't want another five-year program. I ask you to go back to your churches and put on a program year by year. By a system of tithing—not on a legalistic basis, I am against that—we can raise $100,000,000 not in five years but in two and a half."

Conferences

The conferences this year were of an unusually high order. Leaders were secured from all parts of the United States and Canada to take charge of these conferences from 2:00 to 3:30 on Thursday and Friday afternoons of the convention. These conferences were divided into two groups: 1. Organization and administration. The junior conference was conducted by General Secretary White; the intermediate, Mr. M. M. McGorrill, director of religious education, Baptist Temple, Brooklyn; the senior conference, President Mark F. Sanborn; city and associational, the Brooklyn and Washington, D. C., delegations; the state and provincial, W. E. Hodgson, past president of the B. Y. P. U. of Ontario and Quebec. Group 2. Educational. The missions conference was conducted by Prof. H. B. Robins of the Rochester Theological Seminary; stewardship, Dr. W. H. Main, associate general secretary of the Publication Society; evangelism, Rev. Albert H. Gage, director of religious education, Chicago Baptist Association; social service, Rev. U. M. McGuire, pastor of the First Church, Greencastle, Ind.; social and recreational, Mrs. C. W. Karsten; Bible dramatics and pageantry, Rev. C. A. Boyd, director of religious education for Wisconsin; life work, Dr. Raymond M. West, pastor of the First Church, Lewisburg, Pa.; church vacation school, Rev. W. G. Towart, pastor of the First Church, Bennington, Vt.

"The Religion of King Tut" was the title of the address given by Rev. Bernard C. Clausen, pastor of the First Church, Syracuse, N. Y., the import of which was to show how ancient is religion and how modern its application. His appeal to the young people to take one step forward in their faith during the coming year met a hearty response. This was Doctor Clausen's second appearance before the annual sessions of the union. Copy of this address may be had by writing Doctor Clausen at the First Church, Syracuse, N. Y.

Second Day

By constitutional provision, the second day of the convention is a big day in that officers are elected. Friendly candidates are put forward and the delegates engage in a great deal of good-natured rivalry. The demonstrations begin when the president, the Rev. Mark F. Sanborn, pastor of the First Church of Detroit, was named by the nominating committee for re-election. His plea to the convention to permit him to retire was only a signal for a noisy tribute to the esteem in which he is held by the body. Someone on the floor shouted the nomination of Dr. James Asa White of Illinois, the retiring general secretary. The latter had no intention of running for any office, as he is relinquishing his duties to accept the presidency of the Colorado Women's College at Denver. Before the vote could be counted a motion was put and carried that whichever candidate received the smaller number of votes should be honorary president. President Sanborn was re-elected and Doctor White became honorary president.

Dr. F. F. Peterson, chairman of the local convention committee, was chosen first vice-president, the first Massachusetts man to be so highly honored. The two other vice-presidents chosen were F. E. Sadler of Kentucky and W. E. Hodgson of Toronto. The recording secretary, John R. Glading of Michigan, and the treasurer, Orlo O. Montague of Illinois, were re-elected. The board of managers will name a general secretary to succeed Doctor White, but owing to the important duties of the office the matter is likely to remain under advisement for some weeks. The new board of managers is made up as follows:

Alberta, A. C. Bingham; Northern California, Clyde Howard; Southern California, W. A. Sanford; Colorado, Dr. J. A. White; District of Columbia, Elgin Smith; Illinois, August G. Seibold; Indiana, C. J. Hutchinson; Iowa, Miss M. Goodell; Kansas, Arthur Briggs; Massachusetts, Percival Berkley; Manitoba, W. C. Smalley; Missouri, T. G. Newbill; Michigan, William L. Mainland; Minnesota, Richard Hoiland; Nebraska, Joseph Anderson; North Dakota, J. N. Jenson; New York, H. F. Smaltz; Oklahoma, Marie Porter; South Dakota, Joseph M. Smith; Ohio, Charles J. Bowen; Oregon, A. D. Bosserman; Ontario, Norman McLeod; Pennsylvania, L. M. Main; West Virginia, the Rev. H. J. Francis; Washington, Lloyd Garrison; Wisconsin, C. A. Boyd; Vermont, W. G. Howart; Maine, Carl R. Purinton; New Hampshire, Thomas J. Cates; Nevada, H. S. Foote; Quebec, the Rev. M. F. McCutcheon; New Brunswick, the Rev. W. C. Machum; Nova Scotia, the Rev. F. L. Orchard; Prince Edward Island, the Rev. R. C. Eaton; New Jersey, Wilbur Callaway; Kentucky, Miss W. Sadler; Rhode Island, R. W. Cooper; Connecticut, G. B. McDonald.

The following were elected to membership on the executive committee: F. C. Stifler, John Singleton, Edwin Phelps, Herbert Hines, Orlo Montague, Ray Shubert, W. F. Reynolds, W. F. Ripley, Ford Porter and Mark F. Sanborn.

Following the election of officers Dr. C. N. Arbuckle, pastor of First Church, Newton Centre, Mass., led the convention in the Quiet Half-Hour service which is the great devotional service of the convention.

There is no better qualified man to speak on education than Dr. Frank W. Padelford, secretary of the board of education of the Northern Baptist Convention. His address on "Education in the Christian Program" appears in full elsewhere.

The afternoon sessions were again devoted to conferences and discussions of needs in the local organizations.

Canadian Night

With Mr. Riches, vice-president from Canada in the chair, the Friday evening session opened as did the other sessions with an enthusiastic song service under the leadership of Rev. Mr. Briggs known as the singing pastor. First in order was the report of the committee on resolutions read by Chairman George W. Bates of Ohio. Only the high spots of the resolutions are presented.

Deploring the public tendency toward disregard for law and declaring that such conduct is dangerous to democracy, and "whereas President Harding has taken such a firm stand on the question of law enforcement, with special reference to the eighteenth amendment," the resolution relating to prohibition reads "that the Baptist Young People's Union of America go on record as pledging sincere support to the cause of law enforcement, and that we convey to President Harding our hearty appreciation of his effort to defend the eighteenth amendment as a part of the national constitution."

Referring to industrial unrest and the disputes between capital and labor, with consequent loss to both, the convention adopted a resolution stating that in the settlement of all questions at issue, "Justice and righteousness must be the underlying principles. Economic profit is not and never can be the main concern, but justice between man and man. The Golden Rule in business, which is the rule of Christ, is the only solvent. In the application of the Golden Rule to this problem, the rights of a capitalist for just compensation for his investment, and the rights of labor to a just compensation and such working hours as leave room for the pursuit of health and happiness are fundamental.

"The 12-hour day is utterly incompatible with such pursuit. The crippling of industry by unreasonable wage demands is equally incompatible. The square deal for every man whether employer or employee is the only righteous and just thing. Arbitration of disputes by a properly constituted tribunal seems to be at once both the most economical and the most reasonable."

The convention also went on record favoring President Harding's plans for a world court. Resolutions were adopted recommending that "the constituent societies of the organization set aside a Near East Relief day each year for special study of the problems and needs of the peoples of that section of the world; that all societies seek some definite cooperation for such work along the lines adopted by the Atlantic City convention of last year; and that there be appointed from the board of managers a committee of cooperation through whom the organization may voice its convictions in international relationships, to the end that there shall be international action to secure justice to the Christian minorities of the near east."

A resolution was passed expressing regret in the loss the B. Y. P. U. of A. will sustain in the resignation of General Secretary James A. White to become president of the Colorado Woman's College.

The reading and passing of resolutions were the business climax of a session, the emotional climax of which came when Thomas S. Riches of Ontario, retiring vice-president, in temporary charge of the meeting, produced a large and handsomely wrought Canadian flag which he entrusted to Dr. James Asa White, commissioning him to present it to the Baptist young people of Europe, whose convention in Stockholm Doctor White will attend. The occasion was marked by a demonstration by the Canadian contingent, which sang "The Maple Leaf" and other patriotic airs of their country, followed by "Rule Brittania" and at last "God Save the King," following which Canadians and Americans joined heartily in singing 'America'." Doctor White responded feelingly to the charge given him, and promised to convey as much as possible of the spirit of the seniors to the young people of Europe.

The speaker of the evening was the Rev. Dr. F. W. Patterson, president of Acadia College, Nova Scotia, who spoke extemporaneously, his topic being "The Attraction of Christ's Need."

Doctor Patterson said: "What is there in God that attracts us? I take it your executives did not have in mind any superficial attractiveness; they had that quality in mind of Christ himself which draws men and women unto him.

"I was taught that God needed nothing at my hands. He was complete. If he came to me in grace that was something arbitrary, it was something that need not have been. I was taught that Jesus had no real need of me. He could do without me. I plunged into his consciousness as revealed in the New Testament and I heard "Come unto me all that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." I was taught that the cattle on a thousand hills were his, the silver and gold his, and the world his, for he made it, and that he was perfect and complete in himself and had no real need of me. Then one day I read my New Testament with a different eye. I realized that the Master of men needed me and you. You cannot overstate the fact of need. And so I began to revive my thought of God and Christ. He could not be a teacher without a disciple, he could not be a vine without branches and he could not be a Father without mankind. The God I saw revealed in Jesus was in men, in you and me, a complement of his own being.

"That God appeals to me and God and Jesus Christ appeal to me. They attract me, not merely because of what they do for me, but because in what they do for me they require something that I can be and something I can do for them. Were God purely self-contained without need for us there would be no attraction, but his attractive powers lie in his need of what I am and what you are and what we together can do.

God Needs the Individual

"God needs you as an individual, as a corporate body of young men and women that through you he may reveal himself to mankind. God's image dwells only within the bosom of the wise and good. We learn by seeing things. There is a reason for the apostle's saying 'that which we have seen, that which we have handled, that we declare unto you.' Nothing else could they know but that which they had seen and handled. Christianity cannot be preached. One can preach about it, express the experiences and describe them but it cannot be preached. Christianity is a way of life. Unless there is a message of Christianity, concrete, illustrating the needs described, Christianity is robbed of its power.

"God can reveal his power only to men who are like him, and the only way men learn is by exposition. Why do you send a missionary family to the foreign field? Because a man with a family is more efficient. Another is that in the non-Christian world there is no ideal of home family life and we may talk to the non-Christian world until the stars grow cold and they will not understand it. But if you will send one Christian family down into it, you will do more in six weeks than in a lifetime of talking about it.

"God needs you in your organized capacity in order that you may be the demonstration society of living together with the Master of mankind, Jesus Christ. We have in Canada demonstration farms in order that farmers who do not know may learn how to do things. Unless the Christian world can organize and live the Christian ideals, then where is that ideal to come from?

"I should like this young people's organization to go home with an exalted idea, not only of B. Y. P. U. associations but with an exalted idea of the church of the living God as an institution. He needs you that in you he may perfect his salvation. Take your own personality. How did you come by it? Take two ledgers, and in one write the things you do because your father was John Smith and your mother Samantha Allen. Write the things you do because you went to a certain school and came under the influence of a certain teacher. Write the things you do because your father at nineteen voted democratic or republican and would do so at sixty-five. Write the things you do because you were reared in a certain denomination. In other words write the things you do because of other people's influence and then in the other ledger write the things you do because of yourself. You will need a library for the things you do because of other people's influence and a microscope for the things you do yourself.

"God not only needs your character to reveal himself, he not only needs organization that in it he may perfect his thought for you but he needs that you should do work that he wants done. God's kingdom has not come until it has come through you. God has never done what he wants to do for you until he can do what he wants to do through you. The kingdom of God in its last analysis is a kingdom of God brought in through the surrender of men to God. Until there is set up in the church of God or in the body of men and women who bear his name the conditions that will enable him to do it, God's kingdom cannot come. You ask why the kingdom of God has not come? Why sin is rampant? I say, the kingdom of God is waiting simply to break into the lives of men and that God cannot bring it in because there has not been set up in the life of the Christian community the conditions that permit him to do it. I believe that were it possible for the Christian church the world over by the exercise of faith, not merely the faith that subscribes to a creed, but the faith that responds, that were it possible for the church to exercise faith in that way we should see the kingdom of God in it. If there is failure, it is failure here.

"God is complete only in his children. If you will get nearer to the heart of God you will find humanity and nothing else. Jesus came to us with the great word 'Father.' The cross does not mean anything at all unless that God needs men so completely that only the cross can express the need. Where are you going to meet the needs of God? In the sanctuary? You will meet the needs of God for service inthe communitics where you are, on the streets in your own town or village, in the city of which you are a resident, in the faces of men you come in contact with. But the only way you can meet the need of God is to minister to humanity.

"In 1914 I was pastor of a church of perhaps six hundred members in a far away place under the shadow of the foothills and there came a call for men. The country was in need. Out of that congregation two hundred and twenty-five men responded to that need. They left their harrows in the field and came by horseback and on foot some as many as four hundred miles to register their names in answer to their country's need. Not one of them came in and went slinking into a rear door of the place where they were to register. They walked as though that was the only thing they could do to help their country in need.

"The Master of men is being hastened to the end. The greatest tragedy of the world is nearing its consummation. If God ever needed his followers he needed them now and Simon Peter stood by the fire and warmed himself. I simply ask you tonight what will your response to the need of Christ be? Will you rally to his call as these men rallied to the call of their country or while God needs you and while the issues of God are hanging in the balance, are you going to say 'it doesn't mean anything to me?'

"He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never sound retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat.
O be swift my soul to answer Him! be jubilant, my feet!
Our God is marching on."

The Search

I sought his love in sun and stars,
And where the wild seas roll,
And found it not. As mute I stood,
Fear overwhelmed my soul;
But when I gave to one in need,
I found the Lord of Love indeed.

I sought his love in lore of books,
In charts of science' skill;
They left me orphaned as before—
His love eluded still;
Then in despair I breathed a prayer;
The Lord of Love was standing there!

Saturday

The thought for this day centered around evangelism. Owing to the rush of business, visiting and sightseeing, the delegates were a bit tired out by this time and the attendance was not so large. However the program was of an unusually high order. The report of the important topics committee was presented and accepted without debate.

President Sanborn presented General Secretary White who gave a brief survey of world prospects for the Protestant church. Doctor White, who has sailed for Sweden to represent the Baptist Young People of America in the Baptist World Alliance conference at Stockholm told about the spread of the Baptist denomination in Russia, Sweden, Norway, France, Germany, England and Czecho-slovakia. About the population of Czecho-slovakia he said that before the World War it was 94 per cent Catholic, but today with their new freedom, the people are turning Protestants by the thousands. The same is true of France. From Russia comes the announcement that before the war there were few Baptists in that country, and today there are probably 1,000,000, and they will have representatives at the Baptist World Alliance meeting in Sweden.

Concerning the attendance at the Boston convention, Doctor White announced that there was a contest among the state delegations for a banner awarded to the state representing the greatest mileage in reaching the convention, and this banner was awarded again to the Illinois delegation. From that state there have gone to Boston 182 delegates and jointly they traveled a total distance of 218,327 miles. This is far more than any other state delegation had to its credit, though many reported long mileage records. The Kansas delegation of twenty-one showed 35,490 miles; the Ohio delegation of seventy-nine had 76,545 miles; the Ontario delegation reported 28,800 miles and the New York delegation of 116 members had traveled 23,200 miles. It was brought out in a report from the credentials committee that nearly 4,000 delegates had registered and paid their fee at the convention.

Growth in Canada

Thomas Riches of the Canadian delegation told about the phenomenal growth of the Baptist young people's organizations in Canada, and he attributed it largely to the contact of the Canadian people with the American people in their Baptist convention, incidentally he referred to the Americans as his cousins, expressing gratitude for the gracious reception in this country, both in the convention and in the streets. To his term cousins Doctor White later took exception and declared the Americans and Canadians to be brothers which the convention emphasized with approving applause.

Orlo O. Montague of Chicago, the treasurer, made some remarks about "stewardship" and incidentally asked for a show of hands to determine how many there were in the convention who had pledged themselves to give one-tenth of their income to the Christian church. A large percentage of the audience, more than a majority, showed its hands. Then the speaker urged all to get into the tithers' movement, and advised against the idea that it is giving one-tenth; for it is merely paying what the Christian owes to God. They should pay not only one-tenth of their income, but of their talent and time as well.

Announcement that the board of managers had accepted the invitation from Denver, Col., to hold the next annual convention there was greeted with much enthusiasm, and a song from the Colorado delegation. The invitation was endorsed by two governors, the two branches of the legislature, by the state convention of Colorado and by many of the organizations.

Speaking for the Publication Society, William H. Main urged more attention to the thought of training Christians. This training must start early, and as the years roll by and the Christian gets far enough away from the details of the truth to get the proper perspective he sees the reality of Christ. At present the presses of the Publication Society are turning out the whole Bible in the Russian language, and if that could have been done some hundreds of years ago and the Bible had been read in Russia the people of that country would not have taken their czar and his wife and daughters away and killed them after the war. They would have done as the other nations did with the kaiser at the close of the war—let him alone.

Final "Quiet Hour"

Organized cheers by two small delegations greeted Doctor Arbuckle as he came forward to begin his "Quiet Half-Hour" talk.

"When Thomas announced his faith in his Lord," Doctor Arbuckle said, "he captured a great moment in the history of our faith. He gained the belief that all things were to be eternal, but he gained something more: when he said, 'My Lord and my God!' he discovered his own soul.

"A mighty work, one of the mightiest works that God ever wrought, was the raising of Christ from the dead; but a mightier work is the disciples' faith in the risen Christ, which was to enable Christians to live with the spirit of abandon.

"There has been an effort in the past two generations to recover Jesus, to rehabilitate the old time with its customs and peculiarities. But if you knew everything that he did and everything that he said you would still not have captured the real spirit of Christianity.

"Jesus was enabled by his mighty power to create faith in himself. You cannot separate Christ from his disciples and have anything left. What good if he were perfect and couldn't convince men that he was perfect? In all the Gospels it is not only the facts but their interpretation which concerns us; not only the story of Christ's life but the effect of his life on the disciples, on men and women like ourselves."

Speaking of the survival of Christianity, Doctor Arbuckle said: "You cannot separate the generations. One generation must create the faith in Jesus of the next. We can't, like Thomas, see and believe. The Gospels were written to convince men and women who had not seen their Master. The marvel is that men and women like us, who have not seen, can believe.

"When Thomas acknowledged the lordship and deity of Christ he became the incarnation of faith. There is no such thing as abstract faith, abstract Christianity. It cannot exist apart from a personality; it cannot exist in a church, in an organization, in a book. All the faith in the world is in living Christians. All the Christianity in the world, all that there will ever be, is just what is in you. That is the full measure of your responsibility."

The principal address of the morning was on "The Attractive Christ as Saviour and Lord," by Rev. Samuel J. Porter, of Oklahoma. This is printed in full elsewhere in this issue.

Saturday afternoon and evening were given over to recreation and sightseeing under the leadership of the local committee. A number of the delegations continued pilgrimages to the historic places while hundreds of others enjoyed a boat trip around the islands in Boston Harbor returning to Boston about 9:30 in the evening.

Sunday

One of the great features of the young people's convention is an early prayer service on Sunday morning. A permit was secured from the city and this meeting was held at the Parkman bandstand on the Common near the hill where Obadiah Holmes was whipped on the bare back because he was a Baptist, and of which he said: "The peltings on me were like the peltings of roses, for conscience' sake." Several hundred delegates attended this service under the leadership of President Sanborn.

There are no Sunday morning meetings held in connection with the convention. The delegates went far afield in their attendance upon the worship services of the churches of Boston and vicinity. It was the opportuity of the delegates to visit former pastors and friends in the home churches. Especially was this true with the young people from the Maritime Provinces.

The afternoon session at Symphony Hall opened with a great song service. The attendance was large and enthusiasm great. It was the occasion of the life work address to be given by the "irresistible" Joe Taylor of China. Some of our readers will remember him as one who had only eight minutes at the Indianapolis Convention to tell about China and who, when he was introduced at the Atlantic City Convention, began his great address, "As I was going to say at Indianapolis." His theme was "The Mission of Self-Culture." It was a sensible, heart-searching life-work address. Without any undue pressure 209 young people came to the platform as either having made their decisions before or during the convention for some form of Christian service. What a privilege to witness such a picture! After a few words of conference with the volunteers, the young people quietly left the hall to meditate upon the great service, some of them to return in the evening to register their decision.

Coronation

The convention again assembled in Symphony Hall for the final service of the convention. This was by far the largest attendance at any service. Under the leadership of General Secretary White hundreds of the delegates gave their impressions as to the meaning of the convention. This was followed by the coronation address delivered by Dr. C. Wallace Petty, pastor of the First Church, Pittsburgh, on the subject "Thy Kingdom Cometh." As usual Doctor Petty was unreportable. Newspaper reporters charmed by his personality and captured by his enthusiastic presentation forgot to write. It was a masterly, kaleidoscopic presentation of the general world situation and a mighty challenge to the young people to do their share. The invitation of the afternoon was renewed and a large number responded until the total number reached 263.

The Unusual

The program committee instituted some new features in the program this year. Rev. C. A. Boyd, director of religious education for Wisconsin, was invited to present in dramatic form the thought for the day. This was done at the close of the day's discussion on stewardship in a most effective manner in "The Vision Splendid." The dramatic climax of the Sunday evening service was presented in "The Spreading of the Light" under the leadership of Mr. Boyd. It was a most fitting closing for a wonderful day. "God be with you till we meet again" was sung, Dr. Wallace Petty pronounced the benediction and the Thirty-second Anniversary Convention became history as the young people turned to their homes to serve more effectively "the attractive Christ."

Education in the Christian Program

larging world. Take for example the study of astronomy. We look up some beautiful clear night into the starry heavens and see them dotted with hundreds of twinkling lights. But what do we know about them? We cannot determine between stars and planets; we do not know which are "fixed" and which are "moving;" we do not know what their relations are to one another and to us. And then some night the professor of astronomy takes us out into the observatory and places us behind the great telescope, and in an hour the whole heavens are changed. Thousands of stars of which we had never dreamed appear upon our vision and we watch many stars in their relation to one another. We learn their distances from one another and from us and the rapidity with which they are whirling through space. We discover how many thousand years it requires for the light given off by one of these bodies to reach this earth of ours. And as we go on in our study this old world becomes not merely vastly greater but wonderfully majestic. And as this world becomes constantly more wonderful our mind reaches out in an undreamed of way to the God who made it. He becomes a vastly greater God to us than we had ever dreamed. With an entirely new meaning we cry out, "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handiwork."

Or we take up the study of geology and investigate the history of this planet. We had been taught that the life of this world extended back about six thousand years and one day we take into our hands a piece of rock and discover therein a fossil and we learn that that bit of plant has been embedded in that stone for more than a million years and this old world becomes vastly older than we had ever imagined.

We begin the study of some of our great social problems and we fancy that we are thinking of things of which men had never dreamed. And then we take up the study of history and find that these problems which we had thought were so new are thousands of years old, and we are able to discover which men thought about them and what they did to solve them generations and ages ago.

A Greater World

And every day as we delve and study, this world of our becomes greater and more wonderful. Our education not only makes us stronger but it makes our world vastly greater and more significant. President Hyde of Bowdoin well stated what the college really does for a man: "To be at home in all lands and all ages; to count Nature a familiar acquaintance and Art an intimate friend; to gain a standard for the appreciation of other men's work and the criticism of our own; to make friends among the men of one's own age who are to be leaders in all walks of life; to lose one's self in generous enthusiasms and cooperate with others for common ends; to learn manners from students who are gentlemen; and to form character under professors who are Christians—these are the returns of a college for the best four years of one's life."

The educational process is thus a continual introduction to an ever-enlarging world. Its great purpose is to make us familiar with the world in which we live, the long history through which it has been developed since the first day when God said, "Let there be light"; the structure of its various parts, their marvelous formations and compositions; its inhabitants with all their strange habits; its people on all parts of the globe, their history reaching millenniums back into the past, their relations to each other, their problems past, present and future; their hopes and aspirations.

No Limit to Possibilities

This is the educational process. There are no limits to its possibilities and its outreaches. The process begins with our first perceptions. It never ceases while we live. But the days of its most rapid development are our days in school and college. During these days we are devoting the major portion of our time to acquiring information and thinking through problems. Can you imagine any greater boon that can possibly come to a man or woman than to have the privilege of four precious years in college in which to study these wonderful themes? It is a boon from which no man or woman can turn aside without the very best of reasons.

But President Hyde has said that these are days not merely for acquiring knowledge but for the forming of character. During these years you are living with the great men of all the ages, thinking with them on the great problems of life, sitting at their feet as they discuss its mysteries and its motives, watching their struggles as they mastered themselves and their destinies.

This is the process by which character is formed. I do not question but that it develops more rapidly and more surely during these student days than during any others. I do not deny that there are influences in college which are not in themselves conducive to the development of the truest character. But character is not developed aside from the struggle against evil and odds. I do maintain that there are no environments in life where true character may and does develop more surely and more strongly than on the campus of the college.

There is no denying the relation between education and character. "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he." A man's character is determined by his thinking. During these college days he is thinking on great themes, the greatest questions of life. If he fails to develop a strong, true, pure character it is because he will not bring his life into tune with the great things he is learning.

Edward Everett Hale put the matter plainly when he wrote: "The good of a college is not in the things which it teaches. The good of a college is to be had from the fellows who are there and your associations with them. I do not believe that any life outside of a college has been found that will in general do so much for a man in helping him for this business of living. The business of changing a boy into a man is, on the whole, more simply and certainly done in a good college than anywhere else."

There is but one other phase of this subject which we can consider at this time. A great change has come to the young people of this generation in the matter of their ideals for life. It is no longer a question with many of them as to what they can get out of life but what they can put into the life of the world. A great wave of idealism has swept over the young people of our generation and they are searching to find that place in life where they can make their lives count for most.

For this great host of high-minded young men and women, the college offers four years of the richest possible experience. These years of study help one to understand specifically what the great needs of the world are, to evaluate these needs and to see the relations between them. They help one also to measure himself by the side of these needs, to determine which appeal most strongly to his mind and heart, to decide for which tasks his abilities are most definitely fitted. There is no other environment in the world where a man or woman can get so much light on the question of his plane in life or where there are so many influences to help him reach the right decision for his life. Each year thousands of our young people are making their life decisions on the campus of college and university, and while some of them may make mistakes, and doubtless do, the great majority order their lives in accordance therewith to their lasting satisfaction, for these decisions are of themselves and of the world.

But not only does the college furnish the environment for reaching life decisions most satisfactorily, it furnishes also the training for one's work in life. There are short cuts to many occupations and professions but there are no satisfactory ones. Success in any high calling demands serious training. While complete training is not to be had outside the university, the four years of college furnish the foundation for training which is almost certain to insure success. In this day of strenuous competition there is but little chance of attaining success without a thorough training. It is almost suicidal to attempt it. With a college education within the grasp of almost any one who desires it, there is little reason why our young men and women should not achieve a high degree of success in their chosen field of service.

We have enumerated but a few of the considerations which have led the Christian church to make its great investments in schools and colleges that its young men and women may enjoy the high privilege of an education which will fit them for positions of influence and service in the world. To discuss many of the other advantages of such privileges would carry us far beyond the limits of these pages. But in the light of the facts which we have faced, what man or woman can undertake the serious business of life without securing for himself the best education and highest training?

"UNDENOMINATIONAL BIBLE SCHOOLS"

I want to commend unqualifiedly the article by Dr. J. J. Ross entitled "The Undenominational Bible Training School." I have had occasion a few times during my fourteen years in the pastorate to come in contact with students from these schools and to see first-hand the utter lack of denominational consciousness on the part of most of them. I have been amazed at their shallow preparation and have seen the ill effects of their work in different churches. Many students go out of the grade schools into these so-called Bible training schools and suppose that the general acquaintance with the Bible which they there secure fully equips them for all the work of the ministry or mission fields.

Surely, these are times when we need better training on the part of those who are entering the work which our Lord has committed to the churches. And as one who took a thorough course in one of our standard and well-established Baptist colleges, as well as in one of our oldest Baptist seminaries, I know that the training in these standardized schools is not only much more thorough-going, but just as conducive to spiritual growth as are conditions in the unstandardized and undenominational Bible training schools.

I have already written to Doctor Ross thanking him for his splendid article, for I feel that he has the ear of many of our people who are supporting and sympathizing with some of these schools. As Doctor Ross states, one of the leading characteristics of the most of these students is their overweening spiritual pride and their unusual ability to use pious words and phrases which they apparently learned in the classroom. They assume a cocksure air and unhesitatingly inform you that they receive their information direct from the Holy Spirit. I have long felt that these schools are a real menace to our Baptist work and have many times wished that some well-known Bible scholar, who is a true denominationalist, like Doctor Ross, would call the attention of our people to this evil.

During the meeting of the Columbia conference, when the matter of the criticism that has been leveled against all of our schools was under discussion, I bore my testimony to the fact that many of my acquaintances in school had been frightened away from our Baptist seminaries because they supposed the general criticism against our schools must unquestionably be true. I am sure that while there may have been three or four or half a dozen teachers in schools and seminaries who ought not to have held their places, that 99 per cent of these men are consecrated, God-fearing men, who are thoroughly trained for their profession and worthy of the utmost confidence of all our Baptist host.

An increase of brotherly love and confidence will do much more to strengthen our Baptist institutions than all of this unfounded criticism, and the future of our denomination is assured only insofar as our leaders are trained in our own schools. Doctor Ross suggests that we ought to have a Baptist Bible training school. It may be that such a school would be helpful. I feel, however, that the great majority of our Baptist students can get much better preparation in our schools that are already established than they could in any school that seeks to lower the educational standards in any way whatsoever.

AN AGE LIMIT

I commend you most heartily on your editorial in the issue of June 23, "Is Our Organized Young People's Work Effective?"

In Northern California I have twice been state B. Y. P. U. president and held various other state positions and have long been identified with the associational work around San Francisco Bay. I tried in part to bring about some of the ideals you so ably present in this article, having long ago felt, like you, that the work of the larger organizations is far from as effective as it should be. I well remember how many motions intended to bring about better conditions were voted down by grey-haired ministers who meant well, but who thought the youngsters were too ambitious. I believe that an age limit should be drawn and after one is thirty-five years of age he should step down and out. Let the young people's work from one end to the other be run by the young people! My California friends will know I am not looking for a job because I cannot pass for thirty-five any longer. I keenly feel also our Baptist young people's work is not more effective because it is divided in its affiliation. How many Methodist young people's societies are there other than Epworth Leagues?

DOCTOR VAN DYKE ON TOTAL ABSTINENCE

In THE BAPTIST of June 30 is an article "The Perpetual Crisis in the Christian Church," by Dr. Henry Van Dyke. I admire Doctor Van Dyke's books of travel and description. His books, "The Gospel for an Age of Doubt" and "The Gospel for a World of Sin" are very helpful. He seems right in what he says of evolution. There seems to be no more reason why a denomination should express itself on evolution than on the composition of the sun. But in the matter of total abstinence from intoxicants the case is very different. If the Presbyterians have no pledge against intoxicants they are behind the times. As early as 1828 the Free Baptist General Conference advised the entire membership to abstain from the use of ardent spirits, except when necessary as a medicine. In 1840 the conference advised the withdrawal of fellowship from all members who used intoxicating liquors as a beverage. The Baptist church covenant, adopted by most Baptist churches, pledges the members to abstain from intoxicating drinks as a beverage. Doctor Van Dyke says, "For the Christian church to impose a pledge which would have excluded Christ himself is to border on blasphemy." It is a mooted question whether or not the wine that Jesus made and drank was intoxicating. Cider when first made is not intoxicating. Is not the same true of wine? However that may be, Jesus lived in a different age and country from ours. There were no saloons. There were no distilled liquors to the use of which wine-drinking might lead. The use of wine then would not ally one with the liquor propaganda. There can be no question that Jesus would say with his great apostle: "Wherefore, if meat (or wine) cause my brother to stumble, I will eat no flesh (or drink no wine) forevermore, that I cause not my brother to stumble." John, the herald of Christ, who was "more than a prophet," was pledged against wine and strong drink from his birth. Presbyterians should adopt the declaration of the Baptist covenant against wine and strong drink. So far Bryan is right. If he is wrong on evolution we should learn from our far-off animal ancestors to let intoxicants alone, for none of them would without human aid "get beastly drunk." It would seem that in this respect man had degenerated from lower animals. There is not as much reason why we should indulge in Timothy's medicinal wine as for curing blindness with clay and saliva.

Of course Doctor Van Dyke cannot have in mind the definition of evolution called "scientific" by Mrs. Capp in the same paper. But why should not evolution with the Infinite Thinker back of it and through it be even more scientific?

Mrs. Suzu Takagi of Yokohama

Graduate of Suruga Dai School, Tokyo

IN 1886 a government official was very anxious his fifteen-year-old daughter, Suzu Takagi, should attend a school where English was well taught.

After some searching, this gentleman found that our Suruga Dai School had what he wanted in that line, but he thought she would object to attending as it was a Christian school. Her sister said to her, "People will laugh and call you 'Yaso, Yaso'" (colloquial for Jesus). But her reply was, "I do not care for that, I do not need to believe their faith." So she went to the school undaunted, so ignorant of Christian things that when the girls said they were going to "church" she supposed they were going to shop in some special bazaar. But one day Miss Whitman, only three years from America, gave a lesson on John 3, showing that God created us, loved us, and gave his only Son to save us and she did it so convincingly that Suzuko believed then and there—a bold thing for a girl to do, especially in those early days. But she has ever had the confident, brave spirit of a pioneer, unafraid, if she felt she was in the right.

After six years she graduated and went to Himeji to assist Miss Church in the school just started; three years later she was with Misses Fife and Rolman in Odawara and Tokyo. In 1897 Suzu went to Chofu with Miss Cummings, where she taught English and did evangelistic work until the school was discontinued in 1901. While doing house to house calling, the wives of merchants always told her that they could not become Christians, the reason being because shops could not be closed on Sunday when one's competitors were open and that it was necessary to tell and act untruths in order to succeed.

Suzu thought deeply on these things and determined to be a pioneer in establishing a business conducted on Christian principles, tithing her profits to aid the evangelistic work she still loved. She went to Yokohama in 1901 and after a time opened a lace and lingerie store, the articles being made in the upper rooms under her own supervision. Owing to the growing demand in the United States for drawn-work and Irish crochet lace, she was very successful, yearly sending thousands of dollars' worth to New York City. Over fifty women were employed in her shop and many more in their homes in the country.

All those working in the shop were gathered together for morning worship, led by herself or by an evangelist. Sunday was faithfully kept in spite of protests from American tourists, and her tenth carefully set aside for helping others. She says that she never knowingly told, or permitted her clerks to tell an untruth. In the midst of this, she was married, her husband taking her name, and she has two pretty daughters to train in love. In 1916 her husband died and she has now retired from the headship of the firm.

This department is conducted by Miss Margaret T. Applegarth. Communications to her may be addressed in care of THE BAPTIST.

She has always been prominent in Christian work in the city and has striven to interest business people in the Y. W. C. A. and the W. C. T. U. and the woman's exchange, in all of which she is a moving spirit, even introducing a modified tag day to secure funds for them. She is deaconess in our Yokohama church and leader of the woman's circle. Full of plans, she has ever an inspiring message and undaunted faith and courage.

To Mrs. Fisher's sketch of Suzu Takagi we add the following from another pen:

When Takagi San was in her store, it was her practice to ask tourists freely if they were Christians. One day, in talking to me about this, she enumerated the five or six earnest Christians—tourists who had come to her store during the many years she was in business and she could even tell me their addresses. She remembered them distinctly. One day a Christian lady tourist went into her store and, as usual, Takagi San asked her if she were a Christian. Naturally the woman was surprised and interested to hear Takagi San talk of God and she asked her how she knew of God. Takagi San told her she found Christ in our Suruga Dai School, Tokyo, and was trained under Miss Kidder's faithful care. The woman then wanted to see the woman who had made such an impression on a heathen Japanese woman and made the journey to Tokyo on purpose to see Miss Kidder.

Again, on a Saturday afternoon, a tourist came into the store to buy a lace dress. She found one which pleased her and said she would buy it if it could be a little altered by early Monday morning when her boat sailed. Takagi San told her that they did not work on Sunday and that they could not get the dress done by the time the boat was scheduled to sail.

Thereupon the woman said, "Then I can not take the dress," and Takagi San replied, "That is all right, but we cannot work on Sunday." Takagi San said that some, when urging her to work on Sunday in order to alter a garment by the time a boat should leave, would, half-apologetically say, "I never think of such a thing in America, but you can do it, can't you?" Takagi San said, "I always asked them if the God of Japan was not the same as the God of America."

The Story of a Head of Hair

By CHARLOTTE B. DEFOREST

A MOTHER was sitting beside the bed where her little girl of two or three was lying flushed with fever. The bed was a thick silk comfortable spread on the spotless matted floor, with lighter quilts for a covering. The mother's seat was a square silk cushion near the baby's head. From time to time the mother would rise to cool at the faucet the damp cloth she was keeping on the baby's hot head. She was waiting for the doctor, whom the father had promised to call up on the telephone when he reached his place of business that morning. The mother had said, "I'll take the baby to Dr. Sato's office."

"No," the father had replied earnestly. "It's a damp day; we'll be on the safe side and have him call."

"Hana," said the mother anxiously to the little maid who was dusting the sliding doors, "have you the hot water ready for the doctor's cup of tea?"

"Yes, Oku San (madame)," said Hana, bowing politely. It seemed a long time before the gate bell rang and the sound of steps on the stone walk announced the doctor's arrival. "We are putting you to a great deal of trouble," said the mother as she dropped on her knees for a bow of greeting at the door.

The doctor pulled off his shoes—they had elastic in the sides for convenience—and stepped up in stocking feet on the mat floor. He wore the costume of men in America and the European countries, for it was less likely to get in the way than the flowing Japanese dress. After the mother had helped him off with his coat, he slipped on a long-sleeved white apron from his handbag before he stopped to look at the sick baby. Then, seated on the large guest-cushion that the mother had placed for him, he took the baby's pulse and temperature and listened to the mother's story of the case. He looked grave, gave some careful directions, and wrote a prescription.

"Can the maid take this to the dispensary at once?" he asked. "I will come again tomorrow, but should there be any new symptoms, let me know at once. You have a telephone?"

"We will borrow the neighbor's," answered the mother, with a quietness that did not betray the anxiety roused by the doctor's solemn manner.

He paused a half-minute to acknowledge his hostess' courtesy by swallowing a small cupful of yellow tea that Hana had placed on the floor by his side. "We are under deep obligations to you," said the mother, patiently seeing the doctor through his preparations for departure, and then bowing him off at the gate as he entered his jinrikisha and was pulled briskly away by his tidily uniformed little runner. Then she turned quickly.

"Hana," she called anxiously. "Take this prescription to the jinrikisha stand at the corner and ask a man to run with it fast to Dr. Sato's hospital and get the medicine. Here is the money." And she pulled her pocketbook from a deep fold in her obi (sash) and took out a one-yen bill. "Don't stop to prink. Hurry!" she added as the maid untied the cord with which her long sleeves had been held back while she wiped the floors.

"Hai, hai," said Hana, obediently bowing. Then she slipped on her out-door sandals and disappeared through the back gate. The minutes dragged sadly and the awaited medicine seemed to the mother hours in coming. What could she do to help save her precious baby? She walked aimlessly about through the two rooms that were the living rooms. The baby was in the lighter back room. At last, following a blind impulse, she went upstairs; there was only one room there; it was where her husband kept his books and where they liked to entertain company because of the pretty view of the hills.

Yonder, near the foot of the hills, half hidden in its evergreen grove, was the village shrine, the shrine to the god of healing. She placed her palms together and bowed over them toward the shrine, her lips half forming the prayer in her heart. Then she went downstairs. From a drawer in the chest she took out a soft silk dress and a heavy brocade obi, and changed her clothes for them.

"Is Oku San going out?" asked the maid with polite curiosity.

"When the medicine comes and the baby has taken it, I shall go out for a few minutes. You will watch her closely and if she cries, take her up and hold her awhile."

The medicine came and the prescribed dose was given. Then the mother slipped out.

She hurried through the alleyways and sped along, following all the short-cuts to the foothills where the shrine stood. She passed under the red toru almost without noticing it, and came to the front steps of the shrine. Eagerly she pulled the long rope that hundreds of worshipers had pulled before her, and the round copper bell at the top jingled out its call to the guardian spirit to hear; she clapped her hands to draw the attention of the god to her prayer; she tossed a coin in the big grated offering-box at the front. And then she prayed.

"Oh, save my little daughter, my only child, my precious one! Oh, great and honorable Spirit, hear the prayer of a mother in distress! I make my vow that I will offer before thee a great offering. Oh, what shall I give thee? What offering wouldst thou have? I will give thee for my daughter's life the crown of her girlhood's beauty, her shining, glossy hair! Oh, thinkest thou it is no offering, because she is small and her locks are short and untrained? Nay, but I promise them when they have grown long and beautiful—eight years hence, no, ten years hence, on this day, the thirty-first day of the tenth month, I vow that her tresses shall be brought as the thankoffering to this, thy shrine. Is it not well? Wilt thou not hear, and hearing, grant my prayer?'

Almost weeping in her earnestness she bowed before the shrine and poured out the sacrifice of her mother's love for her child. At last she rose and made her way home with a sense of lightened burden.

Home again she stroked the little head with its soft black hair, and her tears started in spite of her brave effort to restrain them.

"Ka-a-san (mother)," murmured the baby.

"Yes, darling."

"Ka-a-san," she murmured again, and nestled closer.

* * * * * *

It was nearly ten years later. Ito San had grown into a well girl, slim and agile and strong. The mother had watched her grow with pride and had noted, often a little sadly, the handsome head of glossy hair. The greatest events of Ito San's days had been the visits to the shrine where she often went with her mother and where she had learned to worship, but never had her mother breathed to her a word of that quiet visit when the little girl was so very sick, though she had often told her of her fears at that time and how sick she had been.

"I wonder," Ito San had thought to herself sometimes, "how that homely old god can cure sick people?" Sometimes, as she stood there with her little friends before the old idol, she had almost felt like laughing in spite of the fear in her heart of the idol who, she believed, could cause sickness just as well as he could cure it.

And now Ito San was in the Big School. Surely the most wonderful day of her whole life was the day when she passed her examinations and could enter Kobe College. It was thrilling to go every day with her classmates to the gymnasium and march and play basketball and do the things that the bigger girls of the college did, and it seemed to Ito San that she never dreamed of having such wonderful friends as she had in this school. Her mother had spent a great deal of time planning and arranging for the little girl's pretty clothes, that she might be just as well dressed as any girl in the school, but again and again she had thought to herself, "So soon, so soon now, I must make her a laughing stock," for the day of the vow was almost at hand. And it did come. But not even then was Ito San's mother ready.

"Just a few days more," she said to herself. "Surely nothing can happen in just a few days, for the emperor's birthday is near at hand and for that feast day I cannot spoil my child's pleasure."

So it was that Ito San went through the joy and excitement of the national holiday still in ignorance of the promise that was so soon to cause her trouble. Then one day her mother said gently, "My daughter, I have a story to tell you. Listen carefully and be not too sad." And then she told her the story you have heard here, the story of a vow and a baby's sickness, and the mother cried more than the daughter.

"Never mind, mother," said Ito San. "I am sorry, but, as you said, it is a sacred promise and we must not disappoint the god." And so the long, shining hair was cut and offered at the shrine, but underneath a new wig there sprang up in Ito San's head and heart a longing to know more about her school motto, for the last words of the motto clung in her mind always—"For the Lord, thy God, shalt love thee."

"It must be a wonderful God that does not call for shining heads of hair and sacrifices of money. I would like to learn more of him," said Ito San to herself. "Perhaps he does not need any service from those who follow him. It would be a pleasure to serve a God who did not demand anything."

One day she heard of a wonderful place where boys and girls of her age learned about the real God. It was a place called a Sunday school, and though it was far away, Ito San found at last that she could go to it and even take her mother. In the singing and the prayer and lessons of that Sunday school Ito San learned a new thing about this God of Love—that he did demand service, but that it meant loving and serving with the whole heart and mind, not the mere giving of a head of hair. And Ito San found that even a little girl in school could serve the Great King, the King of Love, and she, too, made a vow.—Copyright, 1921, Woman's Board of Missions and Woman's Home Missionary Federation.

Peasants in the Samara district of Russia are importing camels to take the place of horses in the regular farm work, according to a recent report received at the headquarters of the American Relief Administration from R. H. Allen, district supervisor in Samara. "The camels eat anything and thrive on it. On the other hand they can with difficulty be persuaded into a freight car and are hard to transport here. The Samara peasant uses his cow also for draft purposes, but by incorrect handling ruins her for milking and breeding purposes."

Young People's Work

Topic for August 5

LESSONS FROM THE PSALMS. (8) A NATURE PSALM
Ps. 104:1-35
OUTDOOR CONSECRATION MEETING

"The earth is full of thy riches"

What a wonderful world this is in which we live. It seems almost impossible that people would stoop so low as to do vile and ugly things when there is so much beauty around us and when there is so much good in the world. Unfortunately many people are shut off from these beauties. There are thousands of little children in our great cities who never get to the water's edge or out on to the green. Either a business concern has captured the nearby place, or often there are forbidding signs such as "Keep off the grass" or "No trespassing."

The psalm under discussion portrays the handiwork of God in its magnificence. If at all possible, the meeting of the young people's society should be held out in the open. The psalm should be read in its entirety. Several choice nature hymns would add a great deal to the program. Possibly there would be some objection to the society going very far away. But there are vacant places near many of the churches, especially in the country and villages.

While this psalm is under consideration there should be a generous resolve by the young people that they will do all in their power to bring the beauties of the great out-of-doors to the folks who are not so fortunate, or, better still, take some of the folks away to the beauty spots. The Baptist Young People's Union of Brooklyn and Long Island have done such a work as this for a number of years. "Sunshine Acres" is a very dear spot to the kiddies. Information may be secured from Mr. H. F. Smaltz, 174 Montague St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Then, above and beyond nature, is nature's God. The outdoor meeting will be a miserable failure unless the young people look beyond all that they can see and into the face of him who gave it. There must be humble recognition of his presence and conscious direction of our lives by him, if we are to share his spirit and enjoy to the full his works.

An Efficiency Contest

Dear Mr. White:

On June 1 our B. Y. P. U. at Janesville, Wis., completed an efficiency contest which has been a decided success for the church as well as for the young people who participated. The four who won the highest received awards for their work, we have had a group picture taken and a cut made for our local paper, and it occurred to me that you might like to use some of our suggestions for THE BAPTIST.

The awards were as follows: First, Miss Margery Ridley, president of our B. Y. P. U., also a member of Life Service League. She receives the full Wonder Tour, covering sixteen states and the convention, $175.

Second, Clara Granger, secretary of our local union and president-elect for the coming year, also a member of the Life Service League. She receives two weeks at our State Summer Assembly at Green Lake, near Ripon, Wis. She was offered $100 toward Boston expenses but chose the above instead.

The lower group represents our B. Y. P. U. advisory board. Mrs. R. G. Pierson, advisor of evangelistic and devotional phases of the work; Oliver Sanders, chairman of advisory board and advisor of local organization; Mrs. Oliver Sanders, advisor of social, educational and denominational work.

Some of the accomplishments this past year were: 60 per cent membership tithing, only about one-fourth of our membership are employed, of this number all but two are tithers; the young people are helping the pastor conduct services outside of our local church and in the absence of the pastor they conduct them alone.

We hope to have a gospel team next year, but owing to the fact that our group of young people are younger than the average B. Y. P. U., and because we have been organized less than two years, we are as yet unable to get all the results that we can after a longer period of organization.

Last year our society was represented at St. Paul with eighteen young people and that fact has been a great help to us this year.

Next year we hope to start our contest by September 1, and we are going to adjust it in such a way that the boys and girls will compete separately.

OLIVER C. SANDERS.

---

KANSAS YOUNG PEOPLE, under the leadership of Miss Edna Umstot, are attempting to reach the following goals since the meeting of their last assembly at Ottawa:

1. 10 per cent increase in membership.
2. 25 per cent taking original part in meeting. (Printed materials to be used in preparation only.)
3. 50 per cent attending church services.
4. 25 per cent active members engaged in some other church work.
5. 25 per cent active members reading the Bible daily—"Daily Devotions League."
6. 25 per cent enrolled members reading at least one book of Christian Culture or Young People's Reading Course.
7. 25 per cent active members tithers—"Tithers League."

International Sunday School Lesson for August 5

MARY MAGDALENE

Lesson: Luke 8:1-3; Matt. 27:55-56; John 19:25, 20:1-18
Golden Text: Psalm 33:20

Introductory

Little is recorded of Mary Magdalene beyond the facts recorded in these four scripture references given for the lesson text. She came from the town of Magdala on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. She was possessed of seven demons, but was freed from them by Jesus. She contributed freely toward the work of Jesus and the twelve. At the crucifixion she was near the cross; she is the first person to whom Jesus spoke after his resurrection.

The Lesson

Mary Magdalene's gratitude for the healing which had come to her through Jesus took a practical turn, for she, with two other women, Joanna and Susanna, ministered unto Jesus and the twelve "of their substance" as they "went about through cities and villages, preaching and bringing the good tidings of the kingdom of God." Joanna and Susanna also had been healed by Jesus. The words "of their substance" indicate that all three must have been women of some wealth. The second scene in the lesson shows Mary Magdalene with the mother of Jesus and his aunt, standing near the cross. The next scene is that of the resurrection. Peter and John had been before Mary Magdalene to the tomb and found it empty; thereupon they returned home. But Mary stood without the tomb weeping. When she stooped and looked within she saw two angels clothed in white who questioned her, "Why weepest thou?" She answered "Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." A personal matter did Mary Magdalene make of the death on the cross—my Lord! Turning, she saw standing beside her a man whom she supposed to be the gardener. "Why weepest thou?" he asked her. Here was a man ever busy about the place who perhaps might give her a clue, and she said to him," "Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him and I will take him away." Then Jesus called her by name and she recognized him, crying, "Rabboni!" Perhaps in her joy at beholding him she tried to cling to him, for his next words are "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended unto my Father." And he bids her go to "his brethren" and tell them the news of the resurrection. "Mary Magdalene cometh and telleth the disciples, I have seen the Lord; and that he had said these things unto her."

Leading Thoughts

1. Those who seek as Mary sought can never lose their Lord. 2. A gratitude of the lips which is not backed by a gratitude of service is not rooted in the heart. 3. "Jesus saith unto her, Mary,"—ever was Jesus calling men and women by name—the personal touch which won all men unto him.

The Scout Troop and the Sunday School

By Leonard D. Fackler

Being both a scout executive and a Sunday-school superintendent, and having had a scout troop in connection with a Sunday-school when I was a scoutmaster, I feel that perhaps it will not be amiss for me to say a few words on the relation of the scout troop and the Sunday-school.

The scout troop is a first-class adjunct to any Sunday school for three reasons. First, in our up-to-date Sunday schools we must provide more or less mid-week activity, not only to hold interest in the class on Sunday, but to safeguard the boys of the early "teen" age through the week. The scout program, with its purposeful play and civic education is exactly the program to be used. It is up-building of the boys along all lines, and because of the general emphasis on religion, gives the boy a better background for the teaching he receives on Sunday.

The second reason is that the educational program of the Sunday school must be widened in order to fulfill the modern functions of the Sunday school. For the particular boys involved, this enlarged program can find no better subject matter than that which is to be obtained through using the content of the scout program. It is much easier to use this material through a scout troop than to appropriate scout features and use them through class or club organization.

Third, and least important, perhaps, is the fact that the scout troop will be good "bait" for the Sunday-school classes. At least it has so worked in a number of instances.

An average example of this connection between scouting and the Sunday school has been noted in the Methodist Church School of Devils Lake, N. D. Here the troop is sponsored by the church but its activities supervised by the school. The scoutmaster, assistant scoutmaster, and chairman of the troop committee are members of the church school board, and "in" on the monthly supper conferences. Reports on the troop are given at each board meeting, and the personal contact with individual boys is shared by the troop leaders and the church-school teachers.

The sooner that it is generally recognized that scouting is not so much an organization as it is a program which may be appropriated by churches and Sunday schools with the added advantage of skilled supervision, the better will Sunday schools be able to fulfill completely their modern functions and the more boys who will be reached with a purposeful and successful mid-week schedule of activities.

Devils Lake, N. D.

The Need for Trained Leaders

It has been found by those who study the problems of farm and orchard that it is needful to understand some at least of the needs, characteristics and laws of growth of plants, grains and fruit trees in order to succeed well in agriculture or horticulture. Relatively more must be known if one is to succeed with poultry or live stock. Much of what needs to be known for such success can be learned in a short time. Much more can be learned by longer study. So in addition to the regular courses of study offered in our agricultural colleges, there are practical short courses which give immediate and usable knowledge. The farmer deals with living things, therefore he must be trained.

But as the touch on life comes to be more intimate and on higher planes, more care must be taken to make sure that he who takes life into his hands or who touches it in any way knows at least the more essential facts about it, and has some skill in doing what he is to do. We therefore license auto-drivers only after a certain needful amount of knowledge and skill can be shown. We prescribe and require certain amounts of school work to be mastered before one may dispense drugs, teach school or practice medicine. But not all people think that such requirements should be demanded of those who touch life more intimately, and at its highest level, in teaching a class in our church school. Too often the thought is "Any good person can do that." That just any good Christian can teach a Sunday-school class is, however, a thought fast disappearing from thoughtful Sunday-school circles, and in its place comes the conviction that at least a certain amount of definite preparation for this work is not only desirable but indispensable. Upon the deepening of this conviction, until it finds expression in an adequate program of training leaders in each of our church schools, depends the advance so much sought and prayed for in our church school work.

National Council of Northern Baptist Laymen

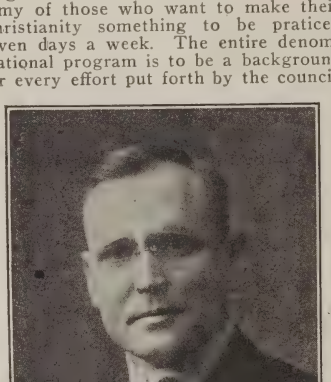
Immediately upon the completion of preliminary organization plans, the National Council of Northern Baptist Laymen set to work to carry forward the undertaking of mobilizing the men of the Northern Baptist Convention for definite tasks. The executive committee at Atlantic City elected William Travers Jerome, Jr., as chairman and decided to engage an executive secretary at once. Accordingly the services of R. O. Jasperson, a layman with experience in publicity, advertising and editorial work, were secured, and on July 1 the new secretary assumed the duties of his office. Headquarters have been established at 17 East 42nd St., New York City, and it is promised that before the fall season opens, a program that will appeal strongly to laymen generally as practical and well worth while, will have been worked out and be well under way.

In a statement setting forth some of the general purposes and objectives toward which the National Council will work, Mr. Jerome says:

"How much lighter the burden would be, how much easier the tasks, if all would lend a hand in doing things for the kingdom. Better still, how much greater could be the scope of the work.

"There are evidences, notwithstanding the pessimistic view some people hold, who speak of the slump and letting down in ideals and high purposes since the world war, that laymen are holding a new attitude toward religion. Men are seeking an outlet for their better impulses. They respond when worthy causes are presented to them. The exaltation of spirit which took possession of people everywhere when great principles were at stake, has not departed and we have faith that if earnest men everywhere will give serious thought to the place that men can fill in our churches, they will find tasks worthy of their very best efforts, stimulating, satisfying and calling into play the very highest aspiration and ideals.

"The National Council of Laymen received its initial impulse under these great laymen, Mr. F. W. Ayer and Mr. Ambrose Swasey. It is proposed now to devote its energies to a continuing program of enlisting men in the denomination in all the tasks of the churches and of the denomination as a whole. Every organization of men will be made acquainted with its program in the hope that it will prove sufficiently attractive and appear sufficiently worth while so that their activities may link up with the purposes of the national body.



"Our plan is to render such service as we can to men's organizations, endeavor to act as a clearing house of ideas and gather from our own and other denominations facts concerning men's activities which will help our men who are already 'carrying on' to draw other men into the work.

"The purpose of all this is not merely to build up organizations of men. Organization is necessary but we shall pay less attention to the form of organization than to the work to be performed. Organization, not as an end in itself, but the means to an end, is our aim.

"Our goal is to enlist men in the work of the Master with the program of the denomination as the background for every effort. This program can succeed only as the individual churches succeed, and we believe that by bending our efforts to interesting men in the tasks of the individual church, tasks that properly belong to men, we shall be building from the ground up.

"It is not a movement for propaganda; neither is it a movement for raising money. It is a movement by laymen, for laymen, to create a laymen consciousness, which is but another way of saying that laymen are now seeking jobs for themselves and for their fellows in the Master's vineyard."

It is proposed to gather experience from every available source which will be helpful to men's organizations and get this information to men's groups in the various churches. Every existing organization of men will be utilized in the general plan and where there are no men's organizations an effort will be made to bring about the formation of such groups. The spiritual aspect of this movement may be summarized briefly as an effort to create among men a wider acceptance of the fact that the teachings, spirit and example of Jesus have a definite place in the daily lives of men. The leaders of the movement have expressed their conviction that the surest way to achieve the work of the kingdom is to enlist men in the growing army of those who want to make their Christianity something to be praticed seven days a week. The entire denominational program is to be a background for every effort put forth by the council.

R. O. JASPERSON, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, NATIONAL COUNCIL BAPTIST LAYMEN

Organization machinery will be set up to suit the work to be done. Less emphasis will be placed on the form of organization than upon the tasks to be accomplished.

The personnel of the executive committee includes some of the best known laymen in the denomination. With two vacancies still to be filled, the present members are as follows: Arthur E. Bestor, New York; Charles R. Brock, Colorado; James C. Colgate, New York; W. C. Coleman, Kansas; George Earl, Minnesota; H. W. Ewalt, Pennsylvania; H. M. Fillebrown, Rhode Island; A. M. Harris, New Jersey; Orrin R. Judd, New York; Carl E. Milliken, Maine; E. H. Rhoades, Jr., Ohio; Smith G. Young, Michigan; A. L. Scott, ex-officio; Corwin S. Shank, ex-officio.

Chairman William Travers Jerome, Jr., is well known in the New York Metropolitan area for his activities in the Metropolitan Laymen's Council of which he is chairman. He is a member of the Warburton Avenue Church in Yonkers, of which he is a trustee and superintendent of the Sunday school. He is also a member of the executive committee of the New York City Mission Society and a trustee of Colgate University. Mr. Jerome is a graduate of Yale University and the Columbia Law School but does not practice law as he is associated with the brokerage business of James B. Colgate & Company.

The newly appointed executive secretary, Mr. Jasperson, is a product of the middle west, a newspaper man of long experience, and at the time of his appointment, was managing editor of the Gas Age-Record of New York. He was formerly managing editor of the Evening Wisconsin at Milwaukee and for a number of years after the above paper was sold, was connected with the Milwaukee Gas Light Company as advertising and sales manager. Before removing to New York he was a member of the First Church at Milwaukee for twenty years, having served both as president of the men's club and alternate leader of the men's Bible class. He is now a member of the Church of the Redeemer at Yonkers.

Boston Letter

By Charles H. Watson

Our Baptist Young People

They came, they saw, they conquered. Not quite as many as we expected. We looked for at least 5 000; but we had about 3,500. Evidently Boston though "on the map," is too far towards the rim of things. But in quality and abounding enthusiasm, they were able to make a distinct impression—which they certainly did.

They were nôt only Baptist—they were young people, and evidently were having one of the times of their lives. The writer well remembers, when some years ago, the Endeavorers came here in a great convention, there were many jokes about the free sprinkling of antiques and venerables. But not so in this convention. Doctor Merriam and the writer were about the only venerables in sight, and there were about us such tides of pink, peachy, vivacious juvenility, that it was easy for us to renew our youth.

How They Looked

They had the appearance of a very lively and blooming garden when you surveyed them massed in their delegations in Tremont Temple. Their faces, and their caps and turbans, gave brightness and color, and their decorative leaves, and feathers, and legends, made a field of animation.

There were times when the whole garden suddenly bloomed, and their glowing responsiveness and staccato cheers made one hear it, as well as see it. Looking from face to face in the delegations there was everywhere the light of young Christian ardor and sincerity. The Canadian contingent much impressed the writer; clear, earnest faces, and the quiet determination to grasp an unusual privilege.

It Was All a Privilege

And all were radiantly conscious of it. Sometimes that consciousness broke loose, and spontaneous youthful exhuberance swept all before it. But it was all upon so high a level, these supreme moments made us all the happier. The whole experience made a good object lesson to our Massachusetts Baptist young people, who have so generally held to the Christian Endeavor allegiance. It was nothing short of a revelation to them to see these young Baptists from South, West, Pacific coast, Canada, and even Japan and China, and all enthusiastically united in Christian service and conquest. Somehow these young Baptist boys and girls had the stride and swing of veterans, jubilantly doing nothing novel, but just the things that had gripped them and had set their Christian habits. It was a gripping time. The speakers gripped them, and they gripped the speakers.

The Program

The program, in its grouping of paramount interests and activities, and its wise selection of speakers, teachers, and leaders, explains in large part the high quality of the convention, and its impressive success and enthusiasm.

Its first note was like striking a high pitch. It was a happy thought on the first night, with the Temple crowded, so to knit together the outlying field of Christian duty, and the home base, as did the vividly illustrated lecture of Missionary Vinton and the remarkable lecture of Doctor Conwell of Philadelphia. The young people saw at once the wide sweep of an all-embracing sympathy, and a human specimen of the sort of leadership that our Baptist young people should be seeking after. Evidently they were much impressed by Doctor Conwell's achievement as by a sort of marvel. Think of it everybody, a man over eighty, coming to his speech at nine fifteen p. m., and mightily gripping and lifting the great company until ten thirty! People spoke of it as if they had seen a giant in action, and never could forget it.

The All Absorbing Topic

It was emblazoned over the platform, in the heart of everybody and in every responsive young countenance. It was "The Attractive Christ." In a time of over-industrious suspicion, it was good to see every speaker glow with the theme, and all the thronging faces give back their loving answer. The subtopics that marked off each of the four successive days were stewardship, education, evangelism and service.

These sub-topics were stressed in the daily quiet half-hour addresses by Dr. C. N. Arbuckle, in the inspirational platform addresses, in the numerous conferences and study sessions held in the First and Clarendon Street churches, and the minor halls of the Temple. The groups were many, the subjects attractive and practical, and the leaders were drawn from our most competent teachers, preachers, and lay workers.

James Asa White

Mr. White was born August 24, 1886, at Quitman, Mississippi, where he spent his early boyhood. At the age of seventeen he joined the Baptist church and soon became an active worker. He was educated in the University of Louisville, Louisville, Kentucky, taking the degrees of Bachelor and Master. His theological training was completed at The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky. From this institution he received the degrees of Bachelor, Master and Doctor.

During his educational work in Louisville, Mr. White became identified with the Baptist cause in the city and state. He was vice-president of Kentucky Baptist Young People's Union, and president of City B. Y. P. U. of Louisville. For two summers he was lecturer on young people's work at Indiana Baptist Summer Assembly at Franklin. He took up the duties of general secretary Nov. 1, 1915.

During his service as general secretary of the Baptist Young People's Union of America, Mr. White has been intimately associated with Baptist denominational affairs throughout the United States and Canada. For a number of years he has served as a member of the board of managers of the board of education of the Northern Baptist Convention, and at the present time is recording secretary of that body.

Mr. White is connected with a number of Baptist papers as a writer on young peoples' topics. He is the author of several books, two of the most important being manuals on junior and senior young people's methods and programs.

He sailed early in July for the Baptist World Alliance meeting in Stockholm, Sweden. From Sweden he will go to Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Switzerland, Italy and France, returning to America about September 1, at which time he will take up his duties as president of the Colorado Woman's College, Denver.

The Prominent Speakers

Under the topic of stewardship it was befitting that Dr. John Y. Aitchison should sound the initial note. This he did with much enkindling information. In the evening Dr. Bernard C. Clausen, of Syracuse, was the youthful orator. Doctor Clausen connects at once, especially with the young. When buoyant, breezy, inspired youth seeks a voice and a hero, Doctor Clausen seems like a complete answer.

On education, of course, Dr. Frank W. Padelford was the authoritative voice. We never heard him speak with more convincing fact and passion. It was something to see thousands of listening youth having poured into them the accumulated study of years upon a subject so vital to them. When you are crediting up some of the achievements of the World Movement, do not forget the fact that it has given us a great prophet on education: Frank W. Padelford.

Dr. F. W. Patterson, the new president of Acadia, was the evening speaker. He well supplemented the masterly address of the morning, and brought the emphasis of long interest and mature conviction into a solid and thoroughgoing statement that closely held the young people to the end.

Evangelism

The next day's thought was evangelism. Dr. S. J. Porter of Oklahoma was the principal speaker in the morning. "The attractive Christ" was the heart of evangelism. That thought was clearly and ably unfolded in an address that was suggestive of the old sermonic classics of a former period. His entire address appears elsewhere. The young people were treated to a specimen of the preaching of the fathers at their best.

Saturday afternoon and evening were given to recreation, under the direction of the local committee. With all the attractions of Boston before them, a sail down the wonderful harbor, and return with the glory of the sunset in their faces, imagine what a day it was to the exhuberant host.

Sunday

The best wine came at the last of the feast. It first came at a remarkable prayer meeting in the Parkman band stand in the Common, at seven in the morning. Three hundred were there, and President Sanborn was the leader. Of course the meeting was unusually impressive at such an hour and place to the more ardent of the young people who had made the effort or the sacrifice to attend it. All the delegates were free to choose their church and preacher on Sunday morning, and their faces lightened up many a service of worship, and many a domine.

The Culminating Sessions

They came at Symphony Hall, afternoon and evening. The thought for the day was service. In the best sense, it was an earnest day, one that glowed with high devotion. The freedom of the other days, their lightness, brightness, laughter, seemed to prepare for this one, and made it notable. Dr. Joseph Taylor of our West China mission spoke in the afternoon with power upon the surrender of the life to God. After applying his principle in realistic fashion, he called for immediate readiness for service at any cost, and about 200 of the delegates came forward and pledged themselves. It seemed like the supreme moment of the convention. Everything said, and done, and sung, seemed put to the test.

The evening session filled the hall. The session opened with a dramatic presentation in pageant of "The Spreading of the Light," under the direction of Charles A. Boyd of Wisconsin.

The coronation address was by Dr. C. Wallace Petty of Pittsburgh. He spoke on the seriousness of the problems that faced the young today, in the immanence of a reconstructed world.

A Bug in the Ointment

There was only one, but the ointment was so rich we were only momentarily and unnecessarily annoyed. One of our big Boston dailies had an unusually unscrupulous correspondent who seemed bent upon making trouble by an exasperating brand of lying. At first it seemed incredible, as well as puzzling; and when day after day the thing was evidently going on with the look of a plot, some attention had to be given to it.

The other journals treated the convention handsomely, some of them reporting a few of the principal addresses almost in full. Doctor Peterson had things well in hand in his management of them, but he could hardly have anticipated the unholy antics of a sheet that has been dubbed by some, "The Boston Swill Bucket."

All in All

It was in truth a great experience for our Baptist young people. It was so clear and cool that we had not to summon our East wind to fan their sweltering faces. Not an umbrella was hoisted, nor a galosh pulled on. The Common was on a broad smile, and the public garden blushed coyly with all manner of beauty. The young Baptist guests revelled in every attraction, and had it not been for their too evident delight and their turban oddities, they might have passed for the gayer descendants of a solemn race.

The Pastors' School June 18—July 5

By C. H. Wood

I am writing from the pastors' school now being held at Columbus. This is the third annual school conducted by the Ohio State University and the Ohio Federation of Churches. The sessions are held in Townshend Hall, College of Agriculture.

It was my privilege to attend the school last year and I received much benefit. This year the courses of study apepaled to me so strongly that I had to come regardless of financial shortage. However, the expense is not very great after all as there is no registration fee. Last year I slept on an army cot in the Plymouth Congregational Church and furnished my own bedding, $1.00 paying for my bed during the entire term. This year I brought my own cot and a small tent. Part of the time I am camped under an apple tree just north of Townshend Hall, the rest of the time I am located at the M. E. student's social center. Many of the men rent army cots this year, paying $1.50 for the seventeen days of school. Most of us eat at the Ohio Union where the food is wholesome, well cooked and reasonable in price. Thus far, my meals have averaged eighty-four cents a day.

The courses this year include expert instruction from many of the university specialists. On the faculty are outstanding pastors who are doing big things in their churches, like Doctor Blackwood of Columbus and Doctor Gilkey of Chicago. The lectures cover a wide range of subjects from rural beautification to an illustrated missionary address by Dean Vivian on the work of Sam Higgenbottom in India. A course on "Psychology of Salesmanship Applied to Evangelism," taught by Professor May of Syracuse University, closed today. This course by itself would pay us for coming to Columbus. Two other men who are giving us courses of unusual interest are Dr. Warren H. Wilson and Prof. E. C. Linderman.

The fellowship of the ministers is one of the finest things about the school. While we do not all agree on everything, still there is an absence of that "theological chip" on the shoulder. I have met some splendid men and found some excellent friends in this group. Personally, I have learned as much from the men themselves as from the faculty.

Most of us are taking eight or nine forty-minute lectures a day which is rather a load in hot weather. But we also have a world of fun. I feel greatly indebted to Miss Crawley of New York for her instruction in children's games which she gave last summer. After attending this class I was able to make many groups of children happy during the past year. I recently moved to Columbia Center and as the parsonage is located beside the school playground, I hope to be of service to the boys and girls in connection with a program of recreation which will probably be carried out in the community.

By attending the school, I have a better understanding of the work of a rural pastor and a larger conception of his great task. Yet there is much in these courses that would appeal to city ministers. I sincerely wish that every rural pastor in the state of Ohio could attend the summer school. It is more than worth while.

RHODE ISLAND

Lewis Arley Brown, pastor of the Trinity Church, Providence, and a graduate of Gordon College, was ordained June 27. Rev. Nathan R. Wood preached the ordination sermon.

NEW YORK

Charles E. Kempton, a graduate of Denison University, and acting supply of the First Church, East Aurora, was ordained by a council of the Buffalo Association which met June 29. Rev. George A. Briggs was moderator, and Rev. Wallace E. McCoy, clerk. Dr. Clarence A. Barbour preached the ordination sermon.

Calvary Church, Schenectady, is completing a modern parsonage which will be ready for occupancy Aug. 1. At the same time that the house is given to the pastor, Rev. Edgar C. Smith, the church will cease to be a mission. The church is now raising three times as much for current expenses as it did at the beginning of the pastorate of Mr. Smith seven years ago, and the missionary contributions have increased seven-fold. A mortgage of $4,500 has been removed and the membership has doubled. Six or eight of the young people will attend the young people's assembly at Cook Academy.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

Rev. John Cameron, after a successful pastorate of four years with the church at Curwensville, recently resigned. Under his leadership the church made substantial progress.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

In the absence of Dr. Carter Helm Jones, the following ministers will supply the pulpit of the First Church, Philadelphia: Revs. John R. Brown, Raymond M. West and James McGee.

Mississippi Valley

MICHIGAN

Mrs. Emma Otis Wilkinson, wife of Rev. Arthur L. Wilkinson, died recently at Ann Arbor. Her husband and three children survive her. Rev. R. Edward Sayles, pastor of the First Church, officiated at the funeral services.

Rev. Chas. W. Biastock resigned July 10 as pastor of the First Church, Lawton. During the three years of his pastorate there were twenty-nine additions to the membership. All organizations are in a promising condition. Mr. Biastock intends to enter college.

The program committee of the Wayne Association met at the office of the clerk, Mr. George E. Sutton, in Pontiac to plan for the next session to be held at Ypsilanti, Sept. 18-19. This will be the first session under the plan of the state organization to have all associations meet in the fall in rotation so that state officials may attend all meetings.

A council of the churches of Wayne Association met June 26 at the Betheny Church, Pontiac, to consider the ordination of Mr. D. E. Story, a student in Crozier Seminary. Rev. Clarence S. Burns of Ypsilanti was moderator, and Mr. George E. Sutton, clerk. The ordination sermon was delivered by Rev. George E. Dawkins. Mr. Story will continue his studies.

Miss Ruth M. Campbell who will be the secretary for Baptist students attending the State Normal College at Ypsilanti, recently had a conference concerning the plans and possibilities of this new venture with Dr. J. M. Smith, Rev. Clarence S. Burns and Miss Frances P. Greenough. Miss Campbell recently received the B. A. degree from Denison University.

The Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian churches of Coldwater united in a community church vacation school which was held in the First Church and the pastor, Rev. Winford L. Sharp, was principal. The enrolment was 202 and the average attendance 117.

OHIO

A community revival was held during June in Attica by the Hulme evangelistic party. As a result the Baptist and Methodist churches will have at least fifty additions to their membership.

The First Church, Struthers, recently closed a successful three weeks' series of evangelistic meetings. As a result, there were eighteen additions to the membership. Rev. J. R. Hazelwood of LaGrange, Mo., was the preacher.

Evangelist George Hulme will assist Rev. D. C. Rich of the First Church, Warren, in a tent meeting with the Frances Willard Church, the latter part of July and the first of August. Pastor J. W. Ely will move to Granville the first of August because of ill health.

ILLINOIS

A number of pastors, evangelists and other Christian workers in the central part of the state have united for the purpose of conducting Bible conferences. Rev. J. L. Watson recently closed an eight day conference at Edgewood. Other churches are planning for similar conferences. Some of the teachers are Revs. Irving A. Fox, pastor of the Riverside Church, Decatur; G. P. Burdon, pastor of the Shelbyville Church; E. C. Shute, pastor of the Arthur Church; J. F. Rake, pastor of the First Church, Evansville, Ind.; and J. L. Watson, evangelist and Bible teacher, Sullivan. All interested in such conferences should communicate with Mr. Watson.

Evangelist E. S. Stucker of Ottawa, Kan., has been engaged to assist Rev. M. P. Boynton, pastor of the Woodlawn Church, Chicago, in special meetings, Sept. 23-Oct. 7.

KANSAS

The First Church, Coffeyville, recently conducted a five weeks' vacation school. More than 100 children were enrolled in three departments, kindergarten, primary and junior. There was an unusual interest on the part of the children. The work of the church is prospering under the leadership of Rev. Earl Riney.

June 3 was a notable day for the First Church, Kansas City, when the new edifice was officially opened. Among the speakers were Drs. S. M. Brown, P. W. Crannell, F. L. Streeter, L. M. Denton, Revs. P. H. Seise, O. S. Osborne and O. C. Felth. The church was organized in 1872. In 1910, under the leadership of Dr. Stephen A. Northrop, the present site for the building was chosen and the erection of a large central edifice was begun. The foundation had been laid and the basement partially finished when Mr. Northrop was forced, in 1917, because of ill health, to resign. Dr. Louis S. Bowerman then took up the task. The church was put upon a modern financial basis. The debt of $6,500 was paid and a building fund was started. Plans for the building were readjusted so that it could be financed through a local bank. The property is valued at $75,000. The first floor of the edifice is of stone; the second and third are of stucco with stone and brick trimmings. The marble baptistry, auditorium pews and organ which will be installed in the fall, are memorials. The church now has equipment equal to that of any in the state.

NEBRASKA

Rev. H. F. Gilbert recently began his second year of service with the Norfolk Church. There were sixty additions to the membership during the past year. In the every-member canvass this spring, enough subscriptions were secured to cover the budget for the ensuing year. The church conducted a vacation school and school of missions. Mr. Gilbert will supply the First Church, Lincoln, July 22-Aug. 19.

SOUTH DAKOTA

The First Church, Huron, entertained the Central Association at its annual meeting, June 15-17. This year the church conducted its first vacation school. The average attendance for four weeks was more than 100. Rev. R. J. Lloyd will soon complete his sixth year of service with the church.

The church at Irene recently completed a series of revival meetings conducted by Evangelist R. R. Richards. As a result there were eleven conversions and it is expected that others will soon unite with the church.

IOWA

Evangelist Harry O. Anderson of Berkeley, Cal., conducted meetings with the Elk Church, Alta., the latter part of June. On Sunday, June 24, a consecration service was held, and fifty persons came forward. Rev. M. A. Wesgaard is pastor.

LOYALTY LUNCHEONS

What Are They? Great inspirational gatherings of Baptist women, which will form the opening feature of the year's promotional program and so far as possible be held as a part of the Bible and Missionary Conferences.

Where Are They? They are to be held in eighty of the larger cities in our territory, each one to be followed by ten Echo Luncheons held in as many of the smaller cities and towns.

When Are They? There will be five teams of four women each in five sections of the country. The first Luncheon will be held October 15th and the last one November 15th.

Why Are They? (1) They are held in the interests of the entire Baptist program, state and national, and not solely or even chiefly for the benefit of the Women's Societies. By them we hope to create an atmosphere of love and work and prayer that shall permeate the whole denomination.

(2) The practical purpose of the Luncheons is to serve as a time of ingathering of half the funds of the Woman's Continuation Campaign. We plan and expect that by the help of God the women will bring in an offering of a million dollars.

How Are They? This big objective can only be realized by every woman beginning to work now to fill her "Might" box, to gather in her pledge; by every woman in full faith adventuring herself upon the power of our God who is able, and so devoting herself to the promotion and the perfecting of the plans.

membership of about seventy scattered over a wide area. For ten months the church was pastorless. November 1, Rev. D. S. McGlashan was called. He immediately began an evangelistic campaign which continued for six weeks. As a result there were more than twenty conversions and all departments of the church were stimulated. Since the close of the meetings interest in Bible study has noticeably increased.

MONTANA

Summer Assembly

The second summer assembly met at Helena, June 21-29. The attendance was about 100. A regular standard assembly program was carried out with a corps of competent teachers and lecturers. Among these were Dr. S. L. Roberts of Philadelphia, young people's work and teacher training; Miss Margaret White of Idaho, special work for girls; Mr. Ingram of India, mission study classes; Rev. Henry Van Engelen of Missoula, Bible study; Registrar Schlauch of Linfield College, educational enlistment.

The culmination of interest was reached on the evening when life enlistment was stressed. Last year there were thirty volunteers present, twelve of whom were at the meeting this year and came forward again. With them came twenty-four others who for the first time confessed Jesus or definitely enlisted for special service. Among the group were college and normal graduates.

Special mention should be made of the services of Rev. C. H. Burrill, state director of religious education, for his ability in caring for details; of Rev. T. L. Huxley of Livingston and Miss Edith Pease of Bozeman who conducted the social and recreational work; of Rev. J. A. Hoffman who acted as registrar of the meeting and made all assignments of entertainment and collected all fees.

The outstanding event of the assembly was the visit of President and Mrs. Harding. The presidential party spent seven hours in Helena on June 29. By special invitation from the assembly and the Baptists of the state, President Harding motored from the city to the assembly grounds. He was accompanied by two autos filled with reporters, photographers and secret service men. After exchanging greetings with Secretary Cress, the president and his party posed for special pictures with the Baptist young people of Montana. He then made a brief but inspiring address urging that Baptists stand for the principles and program that will advance the whole welfare of the nation. That evening eighty-five members of the assembly went to the Shrine Temple to hear the president speak. As he and Mrs. Harding were being seated in the presence of 3 000 people, Dorothea Burrill on behalf of the assembly presented Mrs. Harding a beautiful bouquet of cut flowers.

The following students are spending their summer vacations in Montana as supply pastors: Rev. C. A. Nissen, Rochester Seminary, at Manhattan and Belgrade; Rev. R. H. Lynn, University of Chicago, at Stevensville; Rev. Fred H. McNair, Colgate Seminary, at Valier; and Rev. Stanley

Our Book Shelf

Men, Women and God, by Herbert A. Gray, D.D. New York: Doran.

A very wise and reverent treatment of the sex question. The book produces in the mind of a reader the insistence of life as planned by God and must in its every aspect be kept in proper relation to him.

Jarvis, by Reginald Wright Kauffman. The St. Botolph Society.

A story of college life that has interest for those who like to read about the experiences of a young man who sows some wild oats and also reaps from the seed he has sown. This is the sort of a story that is dangerous reading for young people.

Recent Psychology and the Christian Religion, by Cyril E. Hudson, M. A., New York: Doran.

A thoughtful and worth-while discussion of the bearings of modern psychology on religious faith and practice. The book will have special interest for those who regard it as their duty to acquaint themselves with the details and conclusions of current psychological research as they are related to Christianity.

The Riverside New Testament, a translation from the original Greek into the English of today, by William G. Ballantine. New York: Houghton Mifflin. $3.

Of the translations of the New Testament which abound—somewhere near a dozen—none has as yet succeeded in replacing the great English versions. As commentaries on the New Testament some of them are valuable. This one is especially so and students of the New Testament will find it of great help as such. Mr. Ballantine has been faithful to the original text in his translation and has done a good piece of work in a reverent spirit. The book is well bound and printed on excellent paper in a most readable type.

Simon of Cyrene, by Thomas Hall Shastid, M.D., Sc.D. Ann Arbor, Mich.: George Wahr.

This is one of the truly great story books of the twentieth century. It is a story of a man's soul and a nation's soul, depicting in a most impressive way through the allegorical method the various periods of Jewish development. The primary story around which the allegory is woven is intensely interesting and forms a wonderfully attractive basis for the setting forth of those great internal thoughts and feelings that temper the history of Israel. Doctor Shastid has ever kept in mind the feelings of the reader and while much of the story is full of sadness he has carefully injected bits of the comic, making the story true to life as well as true to Bible chronicle. His underlying motive is to create and intensify a feeling of sympathy for the Jewish people whom he feels deserve a greater recognition as makers of history. He sets forth those qualities of soul that made Israel especially fitted to be chosen of God for his great work. Rev. Albert W. Ryan of St. Paul's Rectory, Duluth, Minn., says in the introduction, "My advice to one and all is to read this book; first for the sheer interest of the story itself, second for its great gallery of human portraits, third for its profound allegorical meaning."

OUR MUSIC CORNER

CONDUCTED BY WILLIAM LESTER

THE CHEERFUL SUBJECT OF HYMNS

York Bannard suggested awhile ago in the Musical News and Herald that a list of the hundred best hymn tunes should be published. He says: "A list drawn up by a few good guides would be exceedingly useful. Such an anthology, covering the whole period of hymnody could easily be compressed into one slight volume. The attempt would be well worth while if it did nothing more than provide a limited assortment of the best of hymn-tune literature over which we could 'ring the changes,' and so familiarize our congregations with the best, and the best only."

Truly a brilliant suggestion, and one that appeals strongly to the idealist.

But how would the judges be selected? Would they be taken from say half a dozen of the leading religious denominations, or would they be confined strictly to the musical elect? And how many? Which task would be more difficult, the selection of the final judges themselves, or the choosing of the "judges of the judges?"

The effort of Mr. H. G. Wells to decide upon the ten best books has apparently not met with overwhelming success. On numbers 1, 2, and 10 he has carried the crowd with him—but how about the intermediates?

The International Book Review has been trying to settle a comparatively easy question, "what are the best ten books written and published since 1900?"—but the results seem to be a trifle kaleidoscopic. This hymn-tune question is one of greater difficulty. Mr. Bannard speaks of "the whole period of hymnody"—that means at least one million tunes. If we throw out all but a mere thousand (single hymnals present nearly that number) we have left a "fearsome" job for the judiciary.

We wish it could be undertaken, but it has a Herculean aspect. Mr. Bannard says: "A compilation such as the one suggested would embody the very principles of tune-making and selection which the average church musician could understand, and which would enable him to discuss such matters on a basis more tangible than personal taste or fancy, or even mere hearsay. From even a casual acquaintance with such a volume he would gather that a tune is good not from one point of view merely, but from a variety of characteristics; and editors of music papers would be spared the stupid question whether a good tune should depend on melody or part writing or rhythm, or whether a proper balance of the three is essential. Excellence is to be determined according to circumstances; at the same time it is characteristic of every good tune that it is able to stand by itself; that it is diatonic and not chromatic; that it rises in the scale and has a responsive fall; and that it avoids elaboration and sentimentality. If the tune is a unison one, then obviously the main requirement is a good melody; a good melody is one that carries with it definite points of interest; one in which, while there is no wearisome reiteration of one note, every note has its telling part; one which arrests attention—sometimes by a judiciously placed high note, sometimes by the repetition of a phrase in the same or a different pitch, sometimes by unusual rhythm. Judge a tune from the harmonic standpoint, and the same melodic distinctness must be felt in the under parts, particularly in the bass part, or it fails. A first-class tune, too, has a stately and dignified rhythm; it insists upon correct emphasis; it gathers in its movement beauty and expressiveness."

Here we have, stated in no uncertain language, the characteristics of the "super" hymn tune.

We are told further: "Very many tunes—those which have become exceedingly popular by virtue of repeated use and association—cannot possibly survive these restrictions. The 'hundred best' would not include the innumerable little sentimental part-songs which some half century ago were added to our hymnology. The bulk of tunes by Dykes, with their repeated notes feebly supported by an unskilful and sometimes perfunctory harmonization will not find place."

An effort being made in England to get rid of Barnby's "Sarum" does not seem to be seconded in the slightest degree on this side of the water, where no hymnal provides an alternate.

Mr. Bannard renews the attack. He says: "Barnby's 'For All the Saints,' with its reckless disregard of emphasis must surely give way."

This whole question is fringed with difficulties. It would indeed be most instructive if we could have a compilation such as that suggested by Mr. Bannard. But there would certainly be "squabbles" among the judges. One of the few hymn tunes that is now almost universally printed without an alternate is Wesley's "Aurelia." Possibly it is the most popular tune in existence—not merely with congregations, but with musicians.

Yet when it first came out it was bitterly assailed by one if the most able critics in London!

If such a "row" could be created in 1868 over one single tune of importance, what on earth would happen over one hundred "best tunes" in 1923?—New Music Review.

Now and then one hears a minister announce the opening hymn in some such way as this: "Let us begin our service by singing hymn number so and so." The inference is, of course, that the organ prelude was not a part of the service. But is it not? If the organist is not convinced that it is, how can he possibly put his soul into it? And if the audience is not convinced that it is, how can it be expected to be worshipful and attentive while it is being played. If the organ prelude is not a real part of the service, then what business has it there at all? The organ prelude will be what organist and minister and congregation make it, and it can be made a most useful and helpful part of divine service.

Take a music bath once or twice a week for a few seasons. You will find it is to the soul what a water bath is to the body. This elevates and tends to maintain tone to one's mind. Seek, therefore, every clean opportunity for hearing it. Let music be as much a part of a day's routine as eating or reading or working.—Oliver Wendel Holmes.

Church News

Keldsen, Northern Baptist Seminary, at Glasgow.

Rev. R. O. Shannon has taken up the work on the Crow Reservation at Lodge Grass and Wyola, and Rev. W. L. Wilson has taken up the work at Hardin. Rev. S. A. Nelson, reservation colporter, is to have a new car this summer and will continue to serve the scattered white people who live among the Indians.

Secy. John S. Stump of the Home Mission Society will spend two weeks in Montana beginning July 22, accompanied by Secretary Cress, and will visit the following places in the interest of church edifice matters: Billings, Wyola, Hardin, Miles City, Roundup, Lewistown, Belt, Great Falls, Valier, Missoula, Darby, Manhattan and Belgrade.

Rev. George MacDougall has closed his work at Lewistown and Rev. G. J. E. Keetch will close his work at Eureka on Aug. 1.

Rev. H. P. Crego of Lewistown is spending the summer in Illinois; Rev. R. B. Thomas of Roundup is spending two months at Portland, Ore.; and Rev. C. B. Stephens of Bozeman is in Ohio for the summer.

Miss Mary Sundell will supply the church at Laurel for the months of July and August.

State Convention

The annual meeting of the Montana convention was held in the Broadwater Hotel, Helena, June 19-21. It was the largest body of Baptist delegates ever assembled in the state. The attendance was more than 225.

The annual sermon was delivered by Rev. George MacDougall and the annual report of the board of managers was given by Secy. G. Clifford Cress. Mrs. Edker Burton of Moscow, Ida., was the speaker for the women's work. Secy. J. C. Robbins of the Foreign Mission Society also addressed the meeting.

The following officers were elected: Pres., Rev. Henry Van Engelen, Missoula; corr. secy. for the ninth time, Rev. G. Clifford Cress; treas., Judge Jack Briscoe, Lewistown; director of women's department, Mrs. R. R. Rathbone of Dillon.

The treasurer's report showed all obligations paid and a balance on hand to begin the new year. The New World Movement receipts were approximately $12,500. Montana is still subnormal in its economic conditions as an entire state.

The convention passed a resolution denouncing the Dempsey-Gibbons prizefight; approved the denominational objectives for the current year; and without an opposing vote adopted the proposed denominational program for 1924-1925 as promulgated at Atlantic City. The churches in the state are led by earnest and capable men and there are fewer pastorless fields than at any time in the past five years. The program for the year includes a new pastor-at-large, an evangelist, four district missionaries, four colporter-missionaries, (one designated for urban work only), one woman field missionary, and about fifteen missionary pastors.

Montana won the banner offered by the Publication Society in class III in the bigger and better Sunday-school campaign. The women's department showed decided advance in organization and accomplishments. The membership report showed a small net gain. There will be a united effort of all our forces to make the evangelistic results of the year and the offerings for missionary work the largest in our history. The hope is also expressed that the good crop conditions this year will enable a number of our churches to put on building campaigns. The convention has only three or four adequate edifices in the state.—G. Clifford Cress.

The New Jersey Branch of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom has sent a short letter to the clergy of that state urging them on July 29, the day following the anniversary of the outbreak of the world war, to preach a sermon on the most effective way to obtain world peace.

The federate school of missions held its seventeenth annual assembly June 23-30 at Mt. Hermon, Cal. The enrolment was 208. Mrs. John Snape presided one day. Mrs. Lena Leonard Fisher, professor in the department of missions of the University of California, was the lecturer. Other teachers were Mrs. R. W. Blosser of San Francisco, Mrs. T. H. Hageman, Dr. Francis Russell, Dr. Hugo Harvey Guy, Mrs. Adelaide Aldrich and Mrs. David M. Thomas. Missionaries were present from Alaska, Korea, Colombia, South America and the Soudan. Dr. David Starr Jordan of Stanford University lectured on "Japan and the New Internationalism."

Obituary

RUSSELL TRUE STIVERS.

Russell True Stivers was born at Hornell, N. Y., May 5, 1844. At the age of five he removed with his parents to Seneca County, Ohio, where he grew up and as a boy attended the local academy.

He was baptized into the fellowship of the Baptist church at an early age. As a young man he attended Hillsdale College, Hillsdale, Mich., and later Western College, then located at Western, Ia. On December 26, 1870, he was united in marriage to Miss Eunice Barber, of Linn County, Ia., who died July 19, 1906.

For many years Mr. Stivers was engaged in missionary and evangelistic work in northern Iowa, organizing hundreds of Sabbath schools, delivering thousands of sermons and addresses, and traveling more than 100,000 miles, largely with horse and buggy. He was eminently successful as a promoter of Sunday-school and missionary work, and lectured widely on religious subjects. He was pastor, for a time, of the First Church of Nashua, Ia.

On June 23, 1915, Mr. Stivers was married to Miss Rachel Alice Maxson of Marble Rock, who was a congenial helpmate. Monday, June 11, 1923, he suffered a stroke of paralysis and passed away Friday, June 15, at 1:15 a. m. Funeral services were conducted by Rev. Carl Smith, pastor of the First Church of Marble Rock, and Doctor Tandy, pastor of the First Church, Mason City, Ia.

The deceased is survived by his wife, Mrs. R. T. Stivers, by his three children, Effie L., Lucien B., and Ernest D. Stivers, by a sister, Mrs. Jeannette Yost and by a brother, George Stivers.

Perpetuate the Work of Evangelism

The schools maintained by The American Baptist Home Mission Society are training the future preachers, teachers and Christian leaders of their groups.

The entire student bodies at El Cristo College, Cuba, and Bacone (Indian) College, Oklahoma, have been won to Christ. The American Baptist Home Mission Society's Mission schools for Negroes also are permeated with the revival spirit and are training thousands of Christian workers.

YOU may have a part in the advancement of Christian Education in the Mission Fields of North America.

By means of Legacies and Annuity Agreements many have planned to perpetuate the general work of this Society. For these friends and others there is offered the opportunity to make MEMORIAL GIFTS through Legacies and Annuity Agreements that will help endow our great mission schools.

The missionary institutions for which the American Baptist Home Mission Society is responsible are:

FOR NEGROES:

Benedict College, Columbia, S. C.
Bishop College, Marshall, Texas.
Jackson College, Jackson, Miss.
Morehouse College, Atlanta, Ga.
Shaw University, Raleigh, N. C.
Storer College, Harpers Ferry, W. Va.
Virginia Union University, Richmond, Va.

FOR INDIANS:

Bacone College, Muskogee, Okla., with students representing twenty-three Indian tribes.

FOR LATIN AMERICANS:

Colegios Internacionales, El Cristo, Cuba.

FOR FOREIGN SPEAKING AMERICANS

The International Baptist Seminary, East Orange, N. J., and its Spanish-American Department, Los Angeles, California.

A Suggestion

In making your will we hope you will make a bequest to The American Baptist Home Mission Society and also a bequest to one or more of the above Mission Schools.

Perpetual Love

CHRIST'S love is a perpetual love. "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." It is perpetual in that it goes backward through the eternities. This is a dateless love. When did it begin? "I have loved thee"—march out on that verb, travel over thousands and thousands and tens of thousands of years, and you will never get to the end of that verb. His love did not begin on the cross, that was the noonday splendor of eternal love. His love did not begin in a carpenter shop; that was the rough manifestation of a love that, like himself, was without beginning and is without ending. His love did not begin in the manger; the manger was the note first heard on earth of a song of eternal love, that had been singing in ages beyond human thought.

It is perpetual, also, so far as the future is concerned. It is the only thing that does abide. We talk of the "everlasting hills;" but they are not everlasting..... Nothing on earth abides.....Nothing abides but God and his love. He is the same yesterday, today and forever. God abides, with a heart tenderer than a father's and a pity gentler than a mother's. He whispers, amid the trials of life, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love."

—Robert Stuart MacArthur in "The Crowns of Christ."

Fresh from the Field

The Y. M. C. A. campaign to raise $525,000 for a new building at York, Pa., has gone over the top by a surplus of $65,000.

Dr. Rushbrooke has received a letter from Sofia stating that the new Baptist Chapel in the Bulgarian capital was dedicated on Sunday, June 10, in the midst of the revolutionary turmoil.

The honorary degree of doctor of human laws has been conferred upon W. C. Pearce, associate general secretary of the World's Sunday School Association, by Susquehanna University.

Resolutions have been adopted by the First Church of Cameron, Tex., requiring that members who have been absent from the community for a period of one year or on the inactive list for that length of time, make an explanation to the church before a letter be granted them.

Feeling that material recompense above that required for meeting the needs of living in a reasonably comfortable fashion should not be the motive of the minister, Rev. A. B. Philputt, pastor for a quarter of a century of the Central Christian Church, Indianapolis, recently refused an increase of $1,000 in his salary.

Rev. Walter Wynn recently began his twentieth year's pastorate in the Baptist church of the town of Chesham, England. The occasion was marked by collections and donations toward the building and extension fund, amounting to more than $5,000.

A tornado sweeping through Adams and Bowman counties, North Dakota, did much damage to homesteads and resulted in the death of seven. The loss is estimated at $150,000. This is especially hard on the farmers of this section of the country as they have had poor crops for several years due to successive droughts.

Scholarships totaling $10,000 and ranging from $200 to $1,000 each have been announced by the American Child Health Association for nurses qualified in child health work. The courses will be taken in colleges, normal schools and university departments of nursing and will include obstetrics, pediatrics and orthopedics, with practical experience. The scholarships will be for the school year beginning next fall and during the summer schools of 1924. Detailed information may be obtained by communicating with the headquarters of the association, 370 Seventh Ave., New York City.

The stereopticon department of the General Board of Promotion has prepared two new lectures on Japan to supplement study books. These can be secured from any of the depositories after Aug. 1. "Child Life of the Nation" is the title of the new Home Mission lecture picturing the work done by Baptists among children in the country districts and in the cities. This may also be secured from any of the depositories. After Aug. 15 the lecture on church vacation schools can be booked from the following depositories: New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Granville, Chicago, Des Moines and Portland.

The Baptist Church at New Mill, Tring, England, celebrated its two hundred and sixty-eighth anniversary June 10. The church was formed in 1655 with six members. The first pastor, who was later arrested and put in jail, with his congregation often went into the woods at night for worship. Rev. F. S. Kemp is the present pastor.

Dr. W. S. Cummings, of the University of Redlands, Cal., has undertaken a five weeks' lecture tour in Esthonia and Latvia prior to attending the Stockholm meeting. Doctor Cummings will confer the degree of doctor of divinity on Rev. John Alexander Frey, principal of the seminary at Riga, on behalf of the university.

A Man's Prayer

Lord, if one boon alone be granted me,
Let me but choose what that one boon shall be;
I shall not ask to live 'mid sheltered bliss,
In soft security—but only this:

Let me be not a coward in the strife
That sweeps across the battlefields of life;
Let me leave not for other lives to bear,
The burdens that were rightfully my share.

Let me not whine, nor seek to shirk,
But cheerfully bear my full load of work;
Then place a friendly shoulder 'neath the load
Of one who, fainting, falls beside the road.

Let me, oh Lord, be clean and unafraid;
Let me go forth to meet life, undismayed;
Until the final hour of life's brief span,
Let me walk upright—let me be a man!
Thus let me live that when, the day's work done,
I pitch my tent toward the setting sun,
Lie down to rest, and from my labors cease.
My soul, within its house, shall be at peace!

—Will Thomas Withrow

The Academy of Arts, Sciences and Belles Lettres of Paris, France, has elected Dr. John T. Christian of the Baptist Bible Institute, New Orleans, a member.

L. Wilbur Messer, for thirty-five years general secretary of the Y. M. C. A. at Chicago, died July 15. When Mr. Messer came to Chicago, the Y. M. C. A. work was being carried on at Farwell Hall in four small buildings. It was under his leadership that the present headquarters and office building on La Salle Street, the Y. M. C. A. Hotel, and activity buildings in different sections of the city, were erected. Mr. Messer's interest in the welfare of young men was worldwide. Because of ill health, he resigned the early part of this year.

It is reported that Dr. E. K. Sprague, chief public health officer for the port of New York, has received orders from Washington to the effect that in the future beer will be barred as medicine from all steamships entering or leaving the United States.

The cornerstone of what is declared will be the finest Baptist church building in the South, both from an architectural standpoint and in the appointments for taking care of all the activities of the church, was laid recently at Knoxville, Tenn. The structure is being erected by the First Church at a cost of more than $500,000. Dr. F. F. Brown is pastor.

The commission on the church and social service of the Federal Council of Churches has arranged a list of men and women prominent in fields of social work who will be available this autumn and winter to speak in churches on themes connected with the relation of the church to community life. The commission will be glad to send this list to directors of forums. Address the Federal Council, 105 East 22nd St., New York City.

Edgar V. Gage, father of Albert H. Gage, director of religious education in Chicago, and Mrs. Albertha Hotaling, wife of Rev. Ira A. Hotaling of Homer, N. Y., passed away at the home of his daughter in Homer, July 10, 1923, on his fifty-fourth wedding anniversary. Mr. Gage was seventy-eight years of age. He was buried from the Baptist church in Worcester, N. Y., of which he had been a member for many years.

At its recent meeting the board of bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church, after listening to reports from the rural field, officially went on record as favoring the organization of cooperative associations or corporations for the marketing of farm products and the purchase of farm supplies. Methodist ministers were urged to cooperate with such organizations where possible and it was suggested that in certain types of communities the church might well take the lead in the organization of cooperative enterprises. This is the first time that a purely ecclesiastical body has recognized the relations of the church to the cooperative movement and the economic and spiritual implications in this movement which give it significance from the religious point of view.—Federal Council Research Bulletin.

The Jewish Education Association has been making a study of juvenile delinquency in its relation to the decline in religious education among Jewish children in New York City. The association found after careful investigation that 90 per cent of the children who came under the observation of the courts, police and other official agencies, had little or no religious education. In neighborhoods where religious schools are few there is a higher percentage of delinquency, whereas in other poor neighborhoods with religious schools, the percentage is lower. To counteract this trend, the Jewish Education Association this year is planning to take 10,000 children off the streets and place them in Jewish religious schools. In this work the association will be supported by the authorities and business men's organizations.

The Spirit and the Letter

Out of our many thousands of subscribers, there is an infinitesimal per cent that persists in striving at the letter and, apparently, missing the spirit of the items and articles that appear weekly in THE BAPTIST. In great haste they send in by telegraph or special delivery the news that in such and such an issue was printed an "o" for an "e," or a comma where a semicolon should have appeared—and not a word about all of the good things that might be stimulating their spirits if their letter-blinded eye did not conceal from them the treasures before them. We might add that more often than not the spelling and diction of their own correction deserves the severest criticism. But another case of the mote and the beam.

Killam's Kollum

So Say We—

If you've got a thought that's happy,
Boil it down;
Make it short, and crisp and snappy—
Boil it down.
When your brain its coin has minted,
Down the page your pen has sprinted,
If you want your effort printed,
Boil it down.
Take out every surplus letter—
Boil it down;
Fewer syllables the better—
Boil it down.
Make your meaning plain—express it
So we'll know, not merely guess it;
Then, my friend, ere you address it,
Boil it down.
Skim it well, then skim the skimmings,
Boil it down.
When you're sure 'twould be a sin to Cut another sentence into,
Send it on, and we'll begin to
Boil it down.

—The American Friend.

Back Talk

We hail it with glee. Pats on the back are sometimes encouraging and occasionally soothing, but even a slap—an open and above-board one—is better than silence. Silence, eternal silence, is a cold, nerve-racking thing. It is the most potent vanquisher of a verbal enemy that we know of. It simply keeps him guessing. We don't want silence from our readers any more than a minister wants silence during the testimony service of a prayer meeting. We want to know what you are thinking about what we are giving you in the way of weekly pabulum. We're trying to keep the denomination informed as to its incomings and its outgoings, and, as well, we aim to give some strong, spirit-life-building stuff. If you like it, we like to know it. If you don't, we don't mind knowing that, either. Talk back whenever you feel like it. It will prove one thing, whether you're right or wrong, and that is that THE BAPTIST is being read—and if it is read we have no fear but there will be an ever-increasing circulation.

A Grateful Pastor

A letter from a pastor who some months ago accepted a call to a new field says: "It was your write-up of my work in X that brought my name before the church here." He had served for years on a difficult field. He had brought things to pass. We were personally acquainted with the facts and gave them brief mention in THE BAPTIST. We are glad, although not surprised at the result.

Dr. E. M. Poteat has joined the faculty of Shanghai College, China. He has accepted the chair of philosophy and ethics.

Louis Couperus, Dutch novelist died in Amsterdam, July 17. He is best known by his "Small Souls" series. Other of his works are "The Footsteps of Fate," "Majesty," "The Law Inevitable" and "Ecstasy."

It is announced that Prof. J. Enrique, Zanetti of Columbia University, has been appointed by the league of nations to a committee to investigate chemical warfare.

From the published reports it would appear that no recording secretary was elected for the Publication Society. This grew out of the fact that the printed ballot was incorrect, as it omitted the office and name of the nominee for recording secretary of the Publication Society. Dr. William H. Main was regularly elected to this office.

It is reported that a group of 139 students of the University of North Dakota were asked eight quotations from the Bible. Only 8½ per cent of the students passed an average of 75 per cent, the average for the whole group being less than 40 per cent. Less than 50 per cent could give ten books of the Old Testament, while 7 per cent could not name a book of that portion of the Bible.

The cornerstone of the new Osgoode Church building, Vernon, Canada, was recently laid by Sir Robert Borden. The new edifice will replace the old historic Baptist church which had stood for over half a century but which was razed in order to use some of its material in erecting the new building. It will cost $15,000 which has already been subscribed by members of the congregation which numbers 150.

The National Education Association of the United States recently closed a week of meetings and discussions at San Francisco. The official program was a comprehensive one. Among the most interesting of the joint meetings was that with the American Classical League. The place of Latin and Greek in modern education was championed by many speakers. The United States commissioner of education is in favor of making Latin a compulsory study in the public schools.

A new work by the Evangelistic Committee of New York and vicinity is the maintenance of a gospel automobile. It has a daily schedule of not less than nine meetings and it reaches thousands of people in various sections of the city. The automobile runs from the Battery to the Bronx, from Washington Heights to Brooklyn, in Queens and on Staten Island. Its motto is "Proclaming the gospel of salvation to the masses of the people."

The General Board of Promotion is in receipt of many resolutions passed by associations and organizations assuring it of hearty support and cooperation in the payment of unpaid pledges. Among those received, were assurances from the Buffalo Association, French Creek Association, Pa., board of directors of the Massachusetts convention, Rhode Island Ministers' Conference, executive committee of the Rhode Island state convention, Rhode Island state board of promotion, board of managers of the New Jersey state convention and many others.

The Publication Society has made Rev. George L. White, of Los Angeles, its western representative. He will serve the society in the west in all matters relating to its varied interests. In addition to his duties as western representative, he will direct the society's correspondence study department for the entire territory of the Northern Convention.

Before the war there was a Sunday school with a membership of more than 2,000 in Kessab, a mountain town about thirty miles from Antioch. After the Turks ravaged the town, there were only fifty children left in the school. Kessab formerly was one of the strongest centers for evangelical work in Turkey and North Syria.

Under the auspices of the Intercollegiate Cosmopolitan Club of New York City, an international student assembly has been formed. The assembly is composed of students from the universities and professional schools of the city and come from seventy different nations. One-third of the members are women. The purpose of the assembly is to exchange views and get the general sentiment of the members on international problems through frank discussion, and to show that a cooperative world is as possible as a cooperative family. Information regarding the club or the assembly may be obtained by addressing the director, 2929 Broadway, New York.

The Pebble

MY newly graveled path was rough that day:
One pebble, larger than the others, lay
Too near my feet, and with disdaining shoe
I struck it sharply and away it flew;

And as it sped, its quartz-veined surface flashed
A thought that left my blinded soul abashed:
A dullard's instant, only, do we take
To spurn what God worked centuries to make

—Anna Rozilla Crever,
in Christian Century.

On June 11, the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, voted in favor of uniting with the Congregational and Methodist churches of the Dominion, which had already voted in favor of the union. Legal action through parliamentary bills will be taken for putting the plan into effect.

Dr. Lathan A. Crandall, at one time editor-in-chief of THE BAPTIST, died July 20 at his home in Chicago. Funeral services were held at the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, Sunday, July 22, and at Trinity Church, Minneapolis. Doctor Crandall was a graduate of Hillsdale College and began preaching in 1874. Among the churches of which he has been pastor are the Trinity, Minneapolis; Euclid Avenue, Cleveland; Memorial, Chicago; Twenty-third Street, New York. For the past two and a half years Doctor Crandall has been one of the ministers of the Hyde Park Church.

According to a statement in an Indiana paper, after forty years of prohibition, Kansas last year had seventy-seven empty jails.

Usually Cambridge University, England, bestows honorary degrees only on eminent scientists and scholars. However, it is going to confer an honorary degree on a house-painter, who, though he has never been in school since he was eight years old, has written essays that have won thirty-six certificates in the correspondence work of Cambridge. He attended the university extension lectures for twenty-seven years.

Dr. James Harvey Hollingsworth, of Blanchester, Ohio, whose article "Without the Shedding of Blood There is no Remission" appears in this issue, died July 5 at the age of seventy-four. He was an alumnus of Hillsdale and Newton. During his ministry of forty-three years he had served sixteen churches in Massachusetts, New York, West Virginia and Ohio. He is survived by his wife, two sons and two daughters.

Mr. Lewis Benedict Reed, the oldest living graduate of New York University, recently celebrated his ninety-ninth birthday. He received his diploma from the university in 1843. In recognition of the anniversary Chancellor Elmer Ellsworth Brown sent a congratulatory message to Mr. Reed at his home in Los Angeles. Mr. Reed, who was born in New York in 1824, spent most of his life in Brooklyn, where he served as president of the Hamilton Club, the Hamilton Literary Association and the Brooklyn Baptist Social Union.

Federal prohibition commissioner Roy A. Haynes, recently made the statement that four times as many aliens as citizens violate the liquor laws in New York City. He also stated that not more than 10 per cent of 11,000 defendants arrested were convicted.

The Lutheran World Convention will be held at Eisenach, Germany, August 19-26. It is expected that 200 delegates will be present from twenty countries, seventeen of them in Europe. The United States, Canada and Australia will make up the total. With the exception of Great Britain, Spain and Italy, all the nationalities involved in the world war will be represented. Eisenach is a historic village in Saxony and has a Christian history extending back to the twelfth century.

Official announcement has recently been made by the board of trustees of the University of Chicago of the election to the board of Mr. Samuel C. Jennings, an official of the Columbian Bank Note Company. Mr. Jennings is a member of the First Church of Evanston.

As a means of furthering understanding and cooperation between the Protestant churches of France and America, Prof. William Adams Brown of Union Theological Seminary, has delivered a series of lectures at the theological schools at Strasbourg and Paris.

Rev. W. R. Jewell, formerly a teacher at the Missionary Training School and acting pastor of the First Church, Joliet, Ill., has been appointed director of religious education at Immanuel Church, Chicago. Beginning September he will also have charge of a similar department at the Missionary Training School. Mr. Jewell is a graduate of Rochester Theological Seminary and at one time was a member of the faculty of Linfield College.

Changing Types of Church Work

BAPTIST work, especially in the North, has fundamentally changed in the course of American history. The eighteenth century Baptist churches were predominantly of rural type, whereas the city or large-town type is most prominent today. Indeed it has been only within the past two generations, that the type has markedly changed. The very names of the churches, persisting still where the church has not died out with the changing years, tells the story, for the churches, most of them, do not bear the names of towns or cities but of the little stream near by—"See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?"

In one northern state there are still nearly a hundred churches whose names are sibilant with the sound of running water. There are Strange Creek, Spruce Creek, Singing Creek, Goose Creek, Turkey Creek, Witching Creek, Wolf Run, Middle Run, Long Run, Crooked Fork, Flat Fork, South Fork, Sandy Branch, Pack's Branch, Two Ripple, Deep Water, Jordan, Elim, Enon, Healing Stream, and scores with other aquatic designations. Or they have their names partly from the topography of scripture and partly from that prevalent in the state: Mt. Zion, Mt. Nebo, Mt. Tabor, Mt. Hope, Mt. Moriah, Mt. Gilead, Mt. Lebanon, Mt. Carbon. In some cases the names mark the optimistic spirit with which the little churches began, e.g., Bright Hope, New Hope, New Light, New Prospect, Bright Prospect, Sunday Road, Hopewell, Victory, Banner, Boomer, though certain of the names seem to suggest a pessimistic outlook from the beginning, as Jeremiah and Rainelle. There are names which tell of the intimate informality of these little bodies: Beulah Ann, Susannah, Elizabeth, Amy, Jennette, Hepsibah and Minnie Bell. There are churches whose name is a greeting, and these names are repeated in many states and sometimes in several associations of the same state—Welcome, Pleasant, Harmony, Concord, Evangel. How those names must have wooed the tired saint and the repentant sinner. But there are also churches whose names seem to have a sinister connotation, e.g., Left Hand, Cutlip, Hurricane, Big Hurricane, Volcano, Red Sulphur, Blue Sulphur and Burning Springs, though doubtless these designations are only topographical.

But all of these names suggest the rural character of the church life in the days of their inception. In segregated mountainous regions the type has remained little changed, but in the denomination at large the change is startling. The old isolation of the rural region is gone. The country and the smaller towns are almost as sophisticated as the city. Indeed our city churches are for the most part composed of those who came a few years ago from the country or town churches, bringing vigor and hope to many a congregation which was finding the battle with the strange and alien forces of city life a difficult one. The head of the greatest bank outside of New York City came from a small town in Iowa. The man called to straighten out the financial system of the national government came to the great city from a small town on the Ohio River.

The country has always furnished the most fruitful field for the securing of ministerial recruits. The small towns and the country furnish also a prolific stream of students for our state universities and for the colleges, and thence for the financial, manufacturing, professional, political and instructional tasks of the nation. But not all of these students fail to return to the farm or the smaller town. They have learned that science can work wonders with the old farm, and that the highest ability may well be employed upon the grain crops, the fruit, the stock and the poultry, with rich rewards and the most independent life. Wonderful machines facilitate the farmer's work in these days.

And the life in the rural and small-town region is no longer cut off from that of the city. The farmer can converse with his neighbors, with the near town and the far city with almost equal ease and almost at a moment's notice. He has the daily papers and all desirable periodicals, the government brings his mail to his door, and the railway and trolley have pierced their way far and near. But it is the automobile which has most fully abolished isolation, with its corollary gift of good roads.

THERE are two things which especially imperil our rural church work in the midst of, and in some measure by reason of, this astonishing rural progress in material things. One is the entrance of many foreigners into our rural life, together with the going of the bright young people of our American homes to the cities; and the early retirement of the successful farmer to some nearby town. The other is the failure of the rural church to keep pace with the general progress and prosperity of the country. It works both ways, for the failure of the church in attractiveness repels the prosperous farmer and his young people, and the drift away from the farm still further weakens the church.

Practical Stewardship

PRACTICAL stewardship puts into every act of living a recognition and acknowledgment of the lordship of Jesus Christ. There is a theoretical stewardship which means giving intellectual assent to the fact that as the creator of all life and things, God is the owner of all and we are only possessors. Such a theoretical acceptance of Christian stewardship will not help us to make progress in life if our conception of stewardship ends at that point. It will only help us to be classed among the hypocrites who say they believe a thing, but practice something else. The average Christian is far too much of a theorist and not enough of a practicing person.

What we need today in our Christian living and in our church experience is a large participation in practical stewardship. We mean by that statement to indicate that the rank and file of normal Christian people need to apply their theories of ownership and possession to the every-day practical Christian administration of the affairs of life. Think for a moment what would happen to our possessions if we did that.

We would cease to accumulate for the purpose of becoming rich and all our efforts to make money would be for the sole and only purpose of serving God with all that came into the life. Whether we separated or used or kept or gave away one or more portions we would be revealing God in it all.

The individual climbing the ladder of fame by doing unusual things in the realm of politics, science, education or economics would be striving after a place of greater opportunity in order to be of service to his Master, and all gains would be turned into the channels of his Lord's service to make a world more Christ-like. The fly in the ointment comes when Christian people serve for personal glory and fail to let their accomplishments serve the Lord or his church in a direct way. Such people are not practical stewards; they are theorists.

Practical stewardship turns every act of living into an accounting with God so that the Lord and Maker of all gets the first and best of life's fruitage as a separated portion and also the benefit of the proper use by his steward of the remainder. A theoretical stewardship for instance makes some people give to God the first tenth of the money that comes into the life but when that first tenth has been used for the Saviour's purposes, the handling of all the remainder tends to disprove the purposes of the first act because the lordship of Christ is nowhere in evidence when the nine-tenths is being used by them.

The world of today is a wonderful place in which to make practical use of Christian stewardship and the church of Jesus Christ will make headway whenever and insofar as local church members reveal a practical stewardship of all that is in their lives.

Summer Slackness

THERE should be no occasion for this article to be written but any one acquainted with the habits of the average church member will readily admit that it is a good word in proper season.

We were recently in the home of a church member who was soon to go away from her home in the city to spend a couple of months in the mountains. She is not rich and would not even be counted well-to-do, but must carefully plan her expenditures. Before leaving her home she figured up what would be due on her church pledges for current expenses and New World Movement for July and August and drew a check for the amount and mailed it to the church treasurer.

When we discovered what she had done, some probing revealed the fact that paying the Lord's portion in advance would leave her bank account somewhat bare but she dropped a remark which we pass on because it was worth while. "Yes," she said, "I will have to be careful of my expenditures for the next few weeks because I have paid my pledges in advance, but the fact that I must be careful about what is spent will be a constant reminder that I am a steward and a church member and therefore living in partnership with my Lord and Saviour, and that means everything in my life."

That good woman was not afflicted with summer slackness. But many a church member will leave home and church to be gone several weeks and in their absence the Lord's money will fail to come into the treasury to pay the bills for maintaining the work of the gospel at home and abroad. If you do not want to be guilty of summer slackness, follow the example of the woman described here and pay your church and missionary pledges in advance for the weeks you are to be away on vacation.

Encourage Combinations Then

HEAT, light and power companies are growing and merging to the great alarm of some people. But fears on this score are groundless. One of the eminent economic needs of the country and of the world is an adequate organization for the production of energy for both industrial and domestic uses. Since the community knows no better way to effect such organization than that of capitalistic exploitation and combination, the practical situation is the same as if there were no better way.

We must have heat, light and power. Capital combined on a large scale is able to produce them. Give it every encouragement to do so. The sooner the business is thoroughly organized the better for everybody.

By and by the community will become sufficiently educated to run its own business and to provide for its own needs. Then it can take over the plant which its capitalists have organized. But that matter can be considered when the time comes.

Sweden, happily free from the cares of empire, is showing how great a small state may be while content to be small. Incidentally to the development of the water power, it is now proposed to electrify the railways. This proposal is the more interesting in view of the fact that the state owns the railways. It disposes of the argument that public ownership is impracticable and disastrous.

Owning railroads has not destroyed initiative in Sweden.

Law Observance

IN his preface to the story of prohibition enforcement which is appearing in the daily press Roy A. Haynes, United States Prohibition Commissioner, says in part:

"The real crux of the whole matter, is found in the fact that the problem has greatly outgrown the prohibition question, for as in the 60's a greater problem than slavery grew out of that issue—the preservation of the union itself—just so a greater problem than the prohibition question has grown out of it, and that is the preservation of the sanctity and majesty of all law, the saving of the constitution, the foundation of the government itself. So all careful observers agree that America today is facing the testing time; the time when this great self-governing people is to determine whether or not a democracy is strong enough to make and enforce its own laws. That issue is paramount and dissociated from prohibition. It is no longer a question as to whether we are for or against that legislation, but it is whether or not we are for or against the constitution of the United States, and whether or not we will obey and support the laws of the land.

"The basis of all stability in all personal, domestic, business, community, national, or international relationships is the observance of covenants or contracts. Every citizen enters into a contract with his government to obey the laws of the land, and if there should be a general disregard of that contract upon the part of large numbers of our citizenship great danger to the republic would result. Therefore, the appeal today is one which should inspire every true, patriotic American. The appeal should receive such response that it should not longer be necessary to so stress the thought of prohibition law enforcement as the thought of law observance.

"In spite of cumbersome departmental procedure; in spite of imperfections here and weaknesses there; in spite of a noisy minority; in spite of unfavorable developments at times in the legislative or judicial departments of the government; in spite of all obstacles, substantial progress has been made, is being and will be made. As for the present status, let the record of accomplishments speak for itself."

"Whom God Hath Not Joined"

UNDER this title Rev. Joseph Fort Newton discusses divorce in the Atlantic Monthly for June. He believes that in a completely Christian social order there would be no divorce problem, for the Christian spirit would forgive everything. The church should recognize that comparatively few marriages are truly Christian, and either make a distinction between Christian and "common" marriages, or else perform religious ceremonies only for those who profess Christian principles, and then recognize no divorce. There are many marriages, he asserts, which should not have taken place, and in some of these the marriage relation is more immoral than divorce. "The sanctity of marriage lies in a sacred union of hearts," and where there is no longer love the true marriage has ceased. The law should not go into detail, but should provide special courts with both men and women judges where such questions can be dealt with properly. "The real remedy lies in making marriage a nobler and finer thing than it is. . . . Until we have learned to live with ourselves and keep the peace, we may not hope to live with another without friction."

England and the New York Liquor Seizures

STANLEY BALDWIN and Lloyd George share the view that America is within her rights in confiscating alcoholic liquor sent under seal into her own harbors. "The British government does not intend to challenge such action as the removal of liquor supplies from the White Star liner 'Baltic' and the Cunarder 'Berengaria,'" says the British Weekly. "'Medicinal stores' in abundant quantities are understood to have been left on board when the seals were broken. Mr. Lloyd George gave wise guidance on the matter in his address at the Welsh Baptist Chapel in Castle street on Sunday afternoon. He advised his fellow-countrymen to keep cool over the seizure of liquor in New York harbour. The United States, as he pointed out, are making a bold experiment to deal with one of the greatest curses of civilization. Palliatives proved useless, and America 'made up her mind with the decision, the courage and the sweep which characterises that great people to try such an experiment as has never been made on this earth before. Give her a fair chance.'"

An Expert in Modern Dancing

YOUNG people too often think of the minister or the church that takes a definite stand against certain phases of dancing as "old-fogeyish." Surely no such attribute would be applied to one of the leaders of the day in all manner of esthetic modern dancing. This is what Irene Castle says, through the Associated Press, concerning present-day dances: "I'm horrified at the manner of dancing, not alone in New York, but in the Central West. It is simply unspeakable. It is a shame and disgrace that police have to be retained by hotels to supervise dancing, yet that is what is being done nightly in New York."

Concerning the marathon dances, a rage for which recently swept the country, she says: "What a terrible thing! Think of human beings doing such absurd things as that—like primitive creatures of Central Africa dancing and jumping until they fall exhausted."

The Great Function of the Christian Church

By John A. Hutton

The first sermon preached in Westminster Chapel, London, by the recently called pastor, successor of Dr. John H. Jowett, in that pulpit
Until I went into the Sanctuary—Psalm lxxiii:17

THE conclusion that I want to arrive at, because it is the conclusion that the psalm arrives at, is that this life of ours is really not interpretable, in any full sense, on the plane of pure reason; that before you can begin to see a way you must take a point of view which is the point of view represented by this church. I say that is the conclusion that I should like to arrive at, because it is the conclusion that the psalm arrives at, but a conclusion by itself is really not of very much value to us.

Processes to Conclusions

What we are interested in is not a conclusion about life so much as sympathy with our difficult processes when we are arriving at conclusions. You know how tedious it is when we who are older say to those who are younger, who perhaps present us with some difficulties in the region of faith or life—when we say, out of our apparent knowledge, "Oh, my dear young man, that difficulty of yours has been answered and answered a thousand times. So and so answered it, and did you ever read a certain book by a certain man who answered it?" I know of nothing more depressing than that sort of treatment. If the man is ingenious to whom you are trying to get this kind of thing over, he will say to you, "But, my dear sir, surely there must be something in a difficulty that has had to be answered so often as you declare." In any case, you do not help him very much, because what that man is wanting at that time, and what we are wanting all the time, is not your easy conclusions about life on the solid ground that you may have arrived at, what we are wanting is some sympathy with us who may at the time be battling with difficult waters or whose feet may be struggling in sandy soil. And so, although the conclusion is as I have alleged, we too in our thinking about life arrive at a point where thinking as a purely intellectual act breaks down, and we must have our whole human apparatus revived and strengthened by an act of faith. You may wrestle with it as long as you like, it may humble your pride, but so it is.

Now, let us work up to it. The text, I always hold, is a thing you don't set out from, but a thing you arrive at. Take this seventy-third psalm. It is one of the very great psalms. Of course, all psalms are great psalms, that goes without saying, but there are degrees in glory. Even as one star differeth from another in glory so there are degrees in the glory of the psalms. This is one of the very great psalms because it deals with great things. As always is the case when you are dealing with a big psalm, you get the conclusion at the outset, you get what the whole thing is about at the beginning. Take Psalms 23, 121, 124 and so on, and you find that it is so. "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." That is a conclusion; that is how the psalm begins, with a conclusion. Then the good man proceeds to give you the process by which he arrives at that conclusion. "I will life up my eyes unto the hills." So another psalm begins: that is to say, so another psalm concludes.

Eyes in the Wrong Place

The good man there had discovered, after a good deal of observation of his own mental processes that what was wrong with him was just what is wrong with a great many of us; he kept his eyes in the wrong place. The whole art of life is to know what to do with your eyes, to keep your eyes on the right things. There are things that, if you keep your eyes on, as we shall see later, you break down, you do not arrive. There are other things, like the cross of Christ, if you keep your eyes on that, as the old hymn puts it, "There is life for a look." And so that good man who wrote Psalm 121 put down at the very outset, lest he should forget it later on, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills"; henceforward I shall go through life with my eyes directed in such a way that if God is disposed to disclose himself I shall be likely to see him; I shall not complain that I did not see the stars when all the time my eyes were on the ground; I shall keep up my head, and I shall look where, if there are stars at all, they are likely to be seen. A most sensible thing for a man to say.

Take Psalm 124, which deals with a different class of subject. "Now may Israel say: If it had not been the Lord who was on our side. . . . the proud waters had been over our souls." So the psalm begins, so it concludes, and thereafter follows a whole history of which that opening sentence is the conclusion and philosophy.

Bold Psalms

There are great psalms, I confess quite frankly, that do not arrive at any conclusion, and these are amongst the very greatest psalms in the Word of God. You see a poor soul tossing himself on his pillow and heaving about on his bed in distress of mind, and at the end of the psalm he does not see one inch further into the darkness than when he began. And yet these psalms are some of the very greatest. There are psalms in the Bible where bolder and more daring things are said about the government of this world than you would be allowed by the law of the land to publish today. I am thinking just now of the man who wrote the psalm that begins: "We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, the wonderful things thou didst in their days"—how thou didst so and so, and so and so, and so and so, and how thou didst promise this would happen, and that would happen, and that would happen; and how thou didst say that that would never happen, and that would never happen, and that would never happen. Then this man draws up a list on the other side. He says: "That is what our fathers have told us, now here is what we find: thou didst say that that would happen, it has not happened; thou didst say that that would happen, it has not happened; thou didst say that that would never happen, the heathen would never enter into thine inheritance; that has happened, the heathen have entered into thine inheritance." And the psalm closes. There you are. An old man, a hundred or two hundred years afterwards, coming across that psalm, did not know what to make of it, yet there it was, in the Book of Psalms, and so he wrote at the foot, though it proved nothing in particular, "Blessed is the Lord forevermore, Amen."

Why do I say that these are some of the greatest psalms in the Bible, those where a poor soul is seen tossing on a bed of affliction and at the end of all his tossing he is as distressed in spirit as when he began? Why do I say that those are some of the deepest psalms in the Bible? Do you remember Victor Hugo in "Les Miserables" describing that wonderful Abbe, that most Christ-like figure almost in all literature? You remember Victor Hugo says this about him: "He was one of those men who could sit beside a man—the man had just lost his young wife—for a whole hour and say nothing." Now, in those great psalms I see God listening, sitting beside us when we are wild and angry and unfair, listening. He could answer us if he cared, as he answered Job, but he knows that the deepest wounds do not heal except in their own blood, and the wounds of the soul never heal except in the expression of themselves to God. And so he allows us to talk, saying our wild devastating things, that he could answer, which later on we shall be ashamed of, but he allows us to go on saying them, knowing that all expression is a relief, and that thereby we rid our souls of very perilous stuff.

A Conclusion at the Outset

Here is a psalm that reaches a conclusion, and the conclusion you find at the very outset. The man thanks God that he very nearly did something but did not do it. A great many psalms begin in that way, with a kind of exhibition of gratitude to God for having escaped something. What was it that this man escaped? That is the whole subject. If a man were to meet you and me outside and tell us with a glowing countenance, "Truly God is good, for my feet had well-nigh slipped"—if a man were to say that to you and me, we should conclude at once that what the man was referring to was some particular breach of a command, some public transgression which he very nearly did, but which he thanks God he did not do; that he had felt the hot breath of some seduction for one awful moment; as he sees now he hovered on the edge of a horrible decision; and he thanks God that just when he was about to give himself away something happened to send him back on to the side of decency. That is what we should conclude. That is, in a sense, what the psalm is about. This good man—for I hold a man to be a good man who is fighting a battle—this good man is thanking God, not because he very nearly did something which he did not do, but because he very nearly said something, and he thanks God he never said it. You and I might think it was a less heinous offense to say a thing than to do a thing. That is where we are wrong. I really believe that the very deepest expression of ourselves is in our speech. What we say about life is the most decisive thing about us. A man does many a thing which he protests against, but if a man says a thing he is all in it at that time. So our Lord said, "By your words you shall be justified, and by your words you shall be condemned." The curious thing is that this man tells us that he very nearly said it, he tells us, indeed, that he thought the thing but he did not say it. We might say with that kind of smartness we have, "If a man thinks a thing he might as well say it." A thousand times, No. It depends upon what you mean by that. There are any number of things that visit us, you and me; they are not ours, we do not want them, they have come, we do not know where they have come from, but they visit us when we are tired, or in a certain climate, or amongst certain people, or have read a certain book, or have allowed certain things to happen within us for which we were perhaps partially responsible. But all sorts of things come. I do not know where they come from; they come from all sorts of places. They come to us; in a sense they are ours, in a sense they are not ours. One great section of our belief in God is that he can discriminate and sort out the things that are ours and the things that only simply come to us.

Psalm 73

TRULY God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart.

But, as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped.

For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.

For there are no bands in their death; but their strength is firm.

They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men.

Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment.

Their eyes stand out with fatness, they have more than heart could wish.

They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily.

They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth.

Therefore his people return hither; and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them.

And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the most high?

Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches.

Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency.

For all the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning.

No Lower than Dust

Take this line of thought for a moment. We human beings, on any hypothesis have come a long way—descent or ascent. I personally never was very much distressed by the evolutionary hypothesis as having any devastating effect upon faith. It always seemed to me really that you cannot say anything more humbling about man than the Bible itself says. You may suggest all sorts of lowly associations that we once had, away back in the abysm of time, but even so you do not arrive at anything more degrading about man than the Bible says, which declares that man was made out of the dust. You cannot get lower down than that. The Bible, however, declares that it was God who made him, and that is the whole difference. On any hypothesis we have come a long way. Able biologists and anatomists will tell you of absolutely indisputable proof that the human body, as a physical organism, contains all sorts of queer kinds of vestige, which explains a great deal. For example, they will show you the reminiscences of the gills of a fish within a man, and all sorts of other kinds of lowly and humbling things. A great number of my own good friends allow themselves to be worked up into a great deal of anxiety about that.

I do not think there is anything to be anxious about if you take it with faith, that is to say, with humor, because, on any hypothesis, we have not stayed down on that lower level. There is no one, not even the one who would say the blackest things about us, who would say that we stayed on that purely animal level. To put it quite concretely, we have got up. It is a hard thing to get up, even once, but to get up and to stay up for millions of years, why, I should suggest that nothing would explain that but God. Still, the fact that we have come a long way, and have had perhaps all sorts of lowly associations in passing, that has left behind us a certain liability. Our past is always likely to overtake us. Sometimes a wind—which, of course, is the very heart of Tennyson's teaching—sometimes a wind from our own past, from our own biological past, even, breathes over our spiritual life, and tries with its insinuations and innuendoes to trip us up on our purely human career.

That Which Defiles

There are low voices in literature which develop that particular line of seduction. So we live in an atmosphere where these things are offered to us. They are not ours until we make them ours. Our Lord, who is always in front of us, who seems to have understood all these difficulties that would ever occur to his faithful people, our Lord said in his infinite charity, "It is not what entereth into a man that defiles him, but what cometh from a man"—the things that he puts the seal of his personality to, saying, That is mine, that only, said Jesus, in the sight of God is his.

So this good man says that he thought certain things that he thanks God he did not say. What was it he thought? Here is it in a word. He very nearly lost his faith. That is just all. He very nearly said that life was a senseless, a rotten thing, and he tells us how it happened, and it is how it always happens. He saw what we call the inequalities of life; he saw some people, as he thought, unscrupulous, who, in the language of the world, had prospered amazingly. He saw some other people who, as the result—but all the same it may not have been true—who, as the result of their own sacrifice had not succeeded in the eyes of the world. As he gets thinking about those people who had prospered, he begins to get more and more unjust. He describes them as only a very angry man could describe them; that is to say, with great literary effect; he describes them so that you can see them. He tells you about violence covering them as a garment, and their eyes standing out with fatness; they have more than heart could wish. "They speak loftily"; they do not see the immediate thing. If anyone says, "Yes, but what about God?" they say, "God? what does God know about it?" Then they begin to talk science and philosophy, about the myriad stars, or the millions of years it took to lay the old red sandstone. We do not know for a little while what they are at, but it is just an attempt to browbeat you and me, simple people, out of our faith. Their idea is that God is such a wonderful Being, dealing with such wonderful things, so infinite, that he cannot be expected really to know or to care anything about the like of you and me. Do you see? Satan transformed into an angel of light. Satan talking philosophy and theology with a view of destroying our belief in God's particular providence. So they say, "How doth God know?" or, as the English prayerbook version of the psalms has it, "Tush, how should God perceive it?"

This good man tells us that that is how he was fixed. Life is full of it today. The great question today—you thoughtful people will agree with me—is not, Is Christianity true? but, Is Christianity possible, is it livable? That is the difficulty. We have got beyond the purely intellectual apologetic for Christianity and we are now in a far more difficult business. The Christian church has to prove, not, as in the early days, up to about the fifteenth century, that Christianity, or belief of any kind, is intellectually true, harmonious with the reach of man's mind; we have got a more difficult task to tackle in these days—to create a world in which Christianity is more credible. Do you see? Meanwhile, until that great day is arrived at, by our life and sympathy and prayers and faith, it is the whole business of our belief to make life livable for those who are still distressed.

This good man tells us the thing got so bad with him that he saw that if he kept his eye on these inequalities, and these prosperous bad people, and all that, he would really lose his faith; whereupon he did a wonderful thing, he ran into the church. I don't think you come to church properly unless you run into it in order to escape from something. I have no understanding of a faith which is not the deliverance from some confessed tragedy, some confessed bankruptcy of life. This man ran into the church in order to save his soul from the great negation. There he sat in a corner. I think there should be corners in the church. I mean places where people like Nicodemus could come and sit down without being pounced upon, and think out things.

The Lord and Nicodemus

There are a great many people today who are in that mood who want to come to Christ by night. We must not mock them, we must not be more censorious than our blessed Lord was. He did not reject Nicodemus for coming at night, he did not say, "Oh, no, no, unless you come right into the open and wear some insignia on your coat that you belong to me-I shall not begin to have anything to do with you." That is not Christianity at all. Well, this wild man sat in a corner, and there as he sat he thought these thoughts. I do not know what he saw in the church. For all churches that have been real churches have tried to mean the same thing both before Christ and after; they have tried to deal, with respect, with the tragic movements of the human soul. The good man, as he sat there, may have seen some old saint engaged in prayer, or he may have heard from some word of Holy Scripture the story of the faithful men of old who had suffered and who would not abandon their faith. Or, on that day, he may have seen some mothers in Israel bringing their little children on the eighth day to be dedicated to the Lord. I rather think it is that, you know; and as he saw these mothers in Israel—surely the real apostolical priesthood, surely the real vessels of faith, the mothers of the human race—as he saw these simple women holding up their little babies, declaring their belief in the ultimate decency of life—that is to say, in God—something went soft within him, and he remembered that once upon a time his mother, who perhaps was now in another land, had held him up and dedicated him to God. Suddenly it dawned upon this man and he saw the whole thing. He said, I would rather be wrong with these people—that old saint in prayer, and those Hebrew mothers holding up their babies to God and pledging thus that it did not matter what diseases their little children might have and what suffering, and how these little children might later on break their hearts—it did not matter, they were saying before God that they would be mothers to them to the end—I say, as this wild man in the corner saw these women holding up their children, suddenly his heart went soft and he said, I would rather be wrong with all these than right with those outside.

Your Faith a Vote

Now your faith is a vote. That is what I want to get at. My faith in Christ is a vote for him. When I say I believe in God I do not mean that I have absolute mathematical demonstration that a being, having the qualities attributed to God, exists. I do not know; I would require to be omniscient in order to be quite sure of that on the intellectual plane. But you never can be certain of anything that you believe. That is why we speak of dead certainties. All certainties are dead. I don't believe a man ever lost his faith, but many a man has lost his certainties and has been the better for it. Your faith is your vote. There is a great deal of religion in voting. We do it in the shabbiest possible way, but it might be done in a wonderful way. . . . There are the two names representing conflicting views of life, and you put your cross opposite the name which you believe represents a view of life nearer to the mind of God, and you signify your adhesion by the sign of the cross, namely, that that is a view of life for which, if called upon, you are prepared to lay down your life. That is your vote, your faith.

Here is this universe capable of all sorts of interpretation. There is a great deal to be said for the view that there is nothing in life but what you see. There is so much to be said for the disheartening view of life, that God sent his Son into the world in order to tilt the balance to the side of faith. You vote for the great view. You can have any universe you like. If you vote for the view that there is nothing in life, verily you are that kind of man; but if you vote for the view that life is sacred, a sacred thing, a thing in which the fine view is always being threatened, of course, and therefore live for it and die for it, then you are on the side of the sufferers and the saints, and on the side of needing people who will lay down their lives for it, if need be, and work for it and speak for it and Christ. It is your vote. What think ye of Christ, sirs, when all is said and done? Life, character, Christianity, may be true values. Have they your vote to be true?

I do not know of any test of a church comparable to this test. It is a test which I should like to try myself by in the years that lie before me, if God should so spare me—the test that this wild man subjected the church to which he entered. There was something in that church which made his wild heart quiet, something which delivered him from the despair of the things that are seen, and something that disposed him to take a high note himself, something that made him feel that it was worth while, that the best was worth while, and that to seek anything lower than the best is a disgraceful decision for a man. The church did that. That, then, it would appear, is the function of the church. As that wild man sat there he suddenly came within sight of a holier order of living, a new system of values in which the last were first and the first were last; he came within sight of the cross of Christ, that contradiction to the wisdom of the world; and he was satisfied. He decided that he would rather be wrong with Christ than right with those who cursed him.

The Cross in the Background

Long ago, in the old days, I suppose behind the preacher here there would be the figure of a cross, with our Lord stretched upon it, in stucco or wood. There would be the bloody brow, and the hands and the side and the feet, with gouts of blood. Our fathers took that down, I think quite rightly; but they were right only on one hypothesis. If they could do without it they were right. In those old days, anyone coming in could, in a sense, see what the whole thing was about. Well, now we have not that, therefore we must have the other. There must always be here something which softens a man's hard heart, or quiets his wildness and excess, or suggests to him something that he was forgetting, letting loose upon him a flood of most baptismal tears, in which he may leave this place a new man. The stoics knew a great deal about human nature who declared that the sense of shame is the basis of all virtues. I really believe that in the case of our blessed Lord, one great function of his sacrifice is in order to make us ashamed of ourselves. I do not know a finer feeling in the world, face to face with the cross of Christ, than just to be ashamed. "When I survey the wondrous cross on which the Prince of Glory died," I do well to be ashamed. And shame is not shame unless it embodies a holy resolution henceforward to be other and to be better.

Psalm 73

IF I say, I will speak thus: behold, I should offend against the generation of thy children.

When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me; UNTIL I WENT INTO THE SANCTUARY OF GOD; THEN UNDERSTOOD I THEIR END.

Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castest them down into destruction.

How, are they brought into desolation, as in a moment they are utterly consumed with terrors.

As a dream when one awaketh: so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image.

Thus my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my veins.

So foolish was I, and ignorant; I was as a beast before thee.

Nevertheless, I am continually with thee: thou hast holden me by my right hand.

Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory.

Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee.

My flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.

For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish: thou hast destroyed all them that go a-whoring from thee.

But it is good for me to draw near to God: I have put my trust in the Lord God, that I may declare all thy works.

Is China Worth Saving?

By E. S. Burket

FUTURE generations will in all probability look back upon this age in which we are living as the greatest age in the history of Christianity since that age of ages when our Lord himself came to earth. Think of the great world-movement of the modern church under the banner of the cross! When in all history was there such a crusade for the salvation of mankind as we see today? Some of us have doubtless looked on past ages and thought, "How wonderful to have lived in those days!" Yet a greater day than that is here. For we see today the churches of Christendom organized into more than 200 missionary societies and sending such a stream of men, money and prayers into the world-fields as must make the very angels of heaven exclaim in astonishment. The Baptist forces are up among the first five of these great enterprises. The sad thing about it is that there are still a few Baptist churches and a few more Baptist members here and there, who do not know what is transpiring under their very eyes!

Consider the great missionary field of China. What sort of background have we for our thinking concerning this great land and the mighty Christian movement now in progress there? How marvelous is the antiquity of the Chinese people. Nations and whole civilizations have come and gone, but China seemingly goes on forever. No other race has persisted as a nation for so long a period as the Chinese—between four and five thousand years. This means that when our ancestors, and our ancestors' ancestors, were ranging the forests of the old country, naked and savage, Chinese scholars in their silk gowns were reading histories of their native land already many hundreds of years old. Let this fact remain in our thought of these wonderful people.

Attitude of Superiority

What is our thought as to the intellectual attainments of the Chinese? Oftentimes we of the West assume an attitude of superiority towards the Oriental. It is only ignorance on our part which permits us to do so, for they have a literature and a philosophy of which any nation might well be proud. When Moses was leading the children of Israel out of Egypt, China had laws and literature excelling anything that proud Egypt had produced. China had state-conducted schools over 1500 years before Christ, ranging from lower grades on up to universities. There were in 190 B. C. already over 2700 books on philosophy written by 139 known authors. A thousand years ago 140 large columns were required to give just the titles and a brief description of the books on the two least popular religions, Buddhism and Taoism. The Manchu dynasty in a little over 200 years alone issued nearly 200,000 books, mostly on Confucianism. This does not include a vast number on Buddhism. Taoism and other philosophies and also light literature, novels and works on art and the drama. A digest of our western philosophy is contained in three large volumes of Baldwin's Dictionary of Philosophy. The Chinese Imperial Dictionary of Philosophy contains not three volumes, but 360! Our great encyclopedias exhaust western learning in about thirty volumes. In the Library of Congress at Washington is a set of Chinese books presented to the United States as an evidence of appreciation of the remission of the "Boxer indemnity." It is an encyclopedia compiled in the early part of the eighteenth century and contains 5,280 volumes, assembled in 528 large cases and requiring a shelf space of 210 linear feet. It has 852,408 pages. It is estimated that it contains four times as much text matter as the Encyclopedia Britannica! We read of the discovery of printing by Gutenburg in the fifteenth century. The Chinese were printing with wooden blocks nearly a thousand years before Gutenburg. So we might go on, to show in part what this great people have accomplished in things intellectual. What they have already done is a promise of what they may yet do when that mind is in them which was in Christ Jesus.

Not only should we have in the background of our thinking the work of the Chinese, but also something of their need. In spite of their great antiquity and brilliant intellectual attainments, they stand today a needy race. Think of the need of education. For centuries education has become a sort of intellectual aristocracy, beginning with the withdrawal of state support about 800 A. D. The statistics a few years ago showed that where in the United States $5.62 per capita was spent for education, in China only 7½ cents was spent. This means that only ten men in a hundred and one woman in a thousand, are able to read and write. The Chinese government has splendid plans to make education more universal in the nation and much has been done to carry them out. But internal strife and confusion have interfered to make most of the plans mere scraps of paper. It is estimated that China needs today eight times as many elementary schools and twenty-four times as many pupils as she already has. In other words, there are now in China over eighty million children of school age who are getting no schooling. Even if this were not the case, it would still be true that enough Christian schools are needed to train the multitudes of Christian boys and girls who are to be the future leaders of the coming kingdom in China. Christian leadership rarely comes from government schools.

We should have in mind, also, the lack of medical care for China's millions. Undoubtedly China has discovered many medicinal herbs which are of value in healing her sick. This we should not forget. Yet it is notoriously true that her population suffers untold evils because of the lack of modern sanitation and surgery. In spite of the fact that China has the largest population of children of any nation in the world, three out of every four, or seventy-five in every one hundred babies die before they are a year old. What an awful waste and suffering that means! Every missionary can tell of the unnumbered sick and dying, many of them neglected, most of them merely lacking sanitary methods and simple skilled treatment to get well again. Do we ever give thought to these pitiable facts?

Spiritual Needs

What conception have we of China's spiritual needs? With all due respect to the contributions to religious life and thought of Oriental religions, it remains true that they sadly lack that dynamic power of love, that lofty purity of insight into the Father-heart of the Eternal, which make Christianity the Way, the Truth and the Life, for all men everywhere. No one who has lived in the midst of the superstitious fear which dominates Chinese people can ever forget the tragedy of life for most of them. Superficially their cheerfulness and poise is often a marvel, but as one old non-Christian Chinese lady once said to the missionary, "Underneath, the heart is all tied up into hard knots." We should never lose sight of the fact that hearts everywhere were made for God and can in nowise be satisfied except as they find him in Jesus Christ our Lord.

So we might go on to show the needs of every phase of life, social, political, economical, industrial, and alleviation of which can only be found as the enlightening power of the gospel clears away the debris of superstition, lethargy and selfishness of the old order.

Lastly, we should set up in our minds, a vivid background relative to the progress already made in China under the banner of the cross. How can we have an adequate

Launching into the Deep

"And Simon answering said unto him, Master, we have toiled all night and have taken nothing. Nevertheless at thy command I will let down the net."

IN the world when a man fails, it says, "Stand aside, give another a chance," but Christ says "Launch out, you men who returned with empty nets." He always gives a second chance. What comfort and joy there is in this! This is Christ's way with a depressed worker. Those who fail he bids them try again. Has the humiliation of failure troubled you? Has the heartache of a night of fruitless toil made you sad? Have you been tempted to say foolish things and to question the worth of all you have done because of a failure when you expected success? Do not be discouraged. The price of all work that is real is heartache. All good work takes energy out of us. Christ can make you successful where you failed. His command carries with it the power to bring to glad fruition that for which you have labored so long. There are so many things needful in our lives—sincerity, earnestness, faith, fidelity and patience; but there is one thing above all others, and that is an ear to catch the word of the Master, and the faith contained in Peter's expression—"Nevertheless at thy command." What a privilege to face the world with the command of Christ, to stand before our failures and our sins and say "in my own strength I can do nothing more than I have done, but I can do all things through him who strengtheneth me!" A life that cultivates a faith and obedience like that will never fail!—A. T. Fowler.

interest in the outgoing of the kingdom in the Orient, if we are not conscious of the victories already won? Think of Morrison working seven years for his first convert, then thirty-five years for the first six! So difficult was the task that he predicted that 100 years of effort would see hardly 1000 converts. But we all know the story, how ninety-three years after Morrison first set foot on Chinese soil, or at the time of the dread Boxer uprising, there were 85,000 converts. And now today, about 100 years after Morrison made his prediction and twenty-three years after the Boxer movement, which was supposed to annihilate the Christian enterprise in China, today, we find approximately 400,000 converts in the Protestant ranks. (The Catholics claim another 1,500,000 converts). As has always been the case, instead of persecution retarding the spread of Christianity, it only made it speed up with increasing momentum. Over 35,000,000 Bibles were printed and distributed last year by the combined Bible societies of the world. And these were not enough to supply the demands! People speaking 770 different languages and dialects can now read the Bible in their own tongue. In China alone it is printed in over twenty-five dialects. Last year over one-half the number printed by the American Bible Society, were sold in China alone, or over 2,362,000 copies! It is a conservative estimate that this year in China about 5,000,000 copies have been sold by all agencies and these were not enough to meet the demands!

Think of mission schools, crowded to the doors and thousands turned away. The situation at Kaying among the Hakkas of South China, is typical of the whole of China. For over twenty-five years the students never numbered more than fifty at any one time. Many of these paid no fees. Some even were doubtless furnished with help on their rice. A few years ago the tide turned, and today we see about 650 students crowding every available space and other scores turned away for lack of equipment.

One of the most striking things in China today is the awakening to self-consciousness of the Chinese church. Just as a child one day suddenly and quite unconsciously, awakens to the fact that it is a person, a separate entity, so the Chinese church has come to that period in its history when it is becoming more and more conscious of itself as a possible power for righteousness and salvation in the nation. This awakening really dates back to 1911 at the birth of the republic, when the Christian forces of China demanded a hearing before parliament in the interests of religious liberty —with what results is well-known.

Do we know the facts and see them vividly when we thing of "foreign missions" so called? How well some of us remember hearing our fathers and mothers praying for "open doors" in non-Christian lands. Many of us also took up the prayer and besought God to open a way for us into the lands and hearts of the non-Christian world. Today what do we find? Not only has God opened the doors of entrance for us into Oriental lands. He has in many cases leveled the very walls before us! This is literally true, as witness the tearing down of the walls of the largest city in China, Canton, where a wide automobile boulevard now encircles the city instead of the old impregnable wall which was, for long, weary years, a barrier to all who would enter the city with the gospel.

Has God embarrassed us by his answer to our prayers? It would seem so unless we avail ourselves of the marvelous opportunities he has given us to go in and possess the lands and cities and human hearts for him. Let us see these non-Christian peoples in their worth-whileness as revealed in their history and accomplishments, for what they have been and are, are a promise of what they may yet become. Let us too, visualize them in their heart-appealing, mind-convincing needs; and, lastly, let us see and take courage from the fact of the truly stupendous progress that has already been made and the reasonable promise of even greater victories in the name of Christ in the days immediately before us. Where he leads let us dare to follow; nay, we dare not hold back.

Pitfalls of Higher Education

Oration given at Linfield College

By Edith Maria Clark

IN these days when success in life is measured by the size of a bank account, when science and culture have largely taken the place of religion, when the Bible is considered out of date and when the divinity of Jesus Christ is denied and the divinity of men declared established, it is high time that a clear note of warning be sounded against these yawning pitfalls of error which constantly present themselves in the path of the students in our institutions of higher education.

A young man trained in the old habits of thought in the home and the village church enters a university and finds himself in a whirl of new ideas and is soon torn by unsilenceable questions. He picks up from his professor's desk a magazine bearing the name of Christian and finds there revealed to him a new and startling teaching. He is fascinated to discover "that the world is to be redeemed by man through the enlightenment of science, that in him there is a spirit moving greater than himself equal to the task, that the city of God will be built by the hand of man, taught by the truth of science and moved by the Spirit of God." He is counseled to "think of God in the light of the highest truth his mind can know and the purest ideal his heart can dream," to thus create a God from his imagination, "to obey the law written in his heart, to make his own creed out of the truth learned by living." "Why!" he exclaims, "dad never taught me that." But, then, dad had never been to college. Thus all unaware the lad steps into the pitfall. With his eyes opened now to this new doctrine, he finds what he had somehow been blind to before, that almost every magazine he picks up, and many of his textbooks, are impregnated with similar teaching discussed in masterful and convincing ways. He clings to the contents of the pit thinking them to be erstwhile buried treasure, instead of mire and treacherous quicksand.

The students of America have always been eager to embrace great movements of progress and reform, for they realize that upon students will devolve the responsibility of leadership. During the last decade of the nineteenth century, the revolutionary literature of Europe came flooding into America from the hands of Shaw, Wells, Nietzsche, Marx, Anatole France, Ibsen, Tolstoi and Dostoievsky. A new philosophy, a new psychology, a new doctrine of salvation of mankind through drastic social action now open themselves before the student with a tingling fascination. The subject of religion is declared to be entirely out of date. It is not even a private matter. It is no matter at all.

As our ministerial student looks out upon a world indifferent to religion but saturated with "new" thought and "new" philosophy, he realizes that an immense problem confronts him; that people are not interested in gospel sermons, for they are being constantly attracted in every direction by some new teaching. He looks to the religious leaders in our seminaries and in the prominent churches of our country and he finds them rousing enthusiasm and filling their churhes to overflowing by taking a radical stand on the social problems of the day, preaching a salvation of mankind through social action, using a Bible with its divineness struck out, presenting a theology with sin denied or apologized for, the cross reduced to an object lesson, culture substituted for the work of the Holy Spirit, saintship made a matter chiefly of self-development, retribution a figure of speech and the pit of perdition either filled up or spanned with a bow of hope. Is in any wonder that he loses his faith in the old-fashioned gospel and yields to the argument which the outward success of these leaders presents to him? Is it any wonder that he loses sight of the fact that no amount of soul-growth or ethical culture can bring a man into the spiritual kingdom of God?

One of the most treacherous pitfalls for the student of science is that of materialism. The tendency to this new fashion of thought has been created by science and is guided by science. Not that all scientists are materialists; but it is the materialistic scientist who would conduct the student through the path of evolution until he lands him logically and inevitably in universal materialism. The pitfall here is a failure to distinguish between the inductions of science and the inferences of a shallow philosophy. How very easily is the student led to discard all faith in the word of God as authoritative when instructed by a professor such as the president in one of the largest state universities of the nation, who in a speech to 3,500 students said, "Religion must not be thought of as something that is inconsistent with reasonable scientific thinking in regard to the nature of the universe. If you cannot, however, reconcile religion with the things taught in biology, in psychology and in the other fields of study in this university, then you should throw your religion away.

Scientific truth is here to stay." True religion and science are not inconsistent. There is nothing either unreasonable or unscientific about Christianity, for facts are always facts, and the facts of religion and the facts of science cannot be in conflict with each other. It is the guessing, the statement of probabilities, suppositions and unsubstantiated theories presented as facts—these are doing the harm. The Darwinian theory of the evolutionary origin of species, declared over 800 times by its author to be merely speculation, is still taught as fact in many of our institutions. What is the logical conclusion of the acceptance of such teaching? A denial of the truth of the biblical account of creation, the placing of the story of the Garden of Eden in the realm of mythology—in short, to a denial of the inspiration of the Bible and all fundamentals of the Christian faith. James H. Leuba, professor of psychology in Bryn Mawr College in a book entitled "Belief in God and Immortality" asserts that belief in a personal God and personal immortality is out of date and is declining in the United States. He gives information obtained from the answers to questions which he himself sent out to 5,500 scientists, practically all of the prominent American scientists. He found that more than one-half of the scientists of the United States, those teaching biology, psychology, geology and history especially, have discarded belief in a personal God and in personal immortality. Leuba also questioned the students of nine representative colleges and found that while only 15 per cent of the freshmen had discarded the Christian religion, 30 per cent of the juniors and 40 to 45 per cent of the men graduates had repudiated the fundamental principles of the Christian faith. Do not these statistics reveal the existence of an alarming pitfall of materialism, atheism and agnosticism for the students of America?

A Subtle Pitfall

One of the most subtle pitfalls for the student of higher education is that philosophy which declares that religion and education are one and that spirituality is a matter of culture or education. Joseph Fort Newton in an article entitled "Salvation by Education," published in the Christian Century, declares education to be one with religion, since it is the faith that the spirit of man only needs to be enlightened to know and to serve the spirit of God. It is the dictum in this and other like statements that is so subtle. True it is and convincing that the spirit of man needs only to be enlightened to know and to serve the spirit of God, but the enlightenment can never come from man. Jesus Christ declared himself to be the light, while Joseph Newton and other advocates of his philosophy would substitute education or culture for Jesus Christ. Did education bring civilization to Christendom? Did culture bring about the emancipation of women and of slaves? Did philosophy demolish tyranny and establish upon the shores of America the principles of democracy? Where education has been brought among savages to redeem them, where culture has presumed to undertake the transformation of men into gods, where philosophy has attempted to point out a path to moral perfection, education, culture and philosophy have signally failed. Christianity, and Christianity alone, has demonstrated the accomplishment of these things through its age-long doctrines of redemption through repentance and faith in God, of belief in Jesus Christ as the only divine Man and of the attainment of moral perfection in the sight of God only through the covering of sin by the shed blood of the Savior.

Upon the higher educational institutions of our land rests a stupendous responsibility. The eager young men and women who enter college hopefully idealistic are to become the men and women in whose hands lies the direction of tomorrow's America. To insure them a leadership of true Christian character, how necessary it is for our Christian institutions to lead the way in removing the pitfalls in the path of their students by instituting a course of instruction that does not set at naught the fundamental truths of the Bible, that does not permit a so-called neutrality which excludes the Christian religion and admits materialistic and agnostic doctrines destructive of faith, that does not show itself to be Christian in name only, but that will take a definite stand and say, "As for us, we pledge ourselves to uphold uncompromising Christian standards of instruction." Neutrality will not suffice, for as surely as any college attempts to occupy middle ground, just as inevitably will positive anti-Christian teaching and ideals creep in.

American colleges must soon decide whether they are to forsake the "fountains of living waters and hew them out broken cisterns" that can hold no water. The educational world is waiting today for the emergence of institutions possessing the courage and initiative to build into the education of their students the unchanging truths of Almighty God and to uphold as their aim unswerving loyalty to the cause of Christ and his kingdom.

"And Without the Shedding of Blood is No Remission"

By J. H. Hollingsworth

DR. WILLIAM E. GARDNER, secretary of the department of religious education of the Episcopal church, recently made a talk defending modern youth, which has aroused much comment. He believes that religion should be made to fit young people, and not young people to fit religion. A writer for a popular daily paper in commenting on Doctor Gardner's observations declares that young people do not want a personal salvation that is bought at the price of another's agony.

I regard that teaching as an insidious slur on evangelical Christianity. That heresy is not something new, fished out of the great sea of false doctrines to fit the minds of critical youth. It is almost as old as Christianity itself. Away back in 319 A. D. Arius, in opposition to Bishop Alexander, taught the limitations of Jesus Christ. Arius was tall of stature, with a downcast look: (and that is not to be wondered at), for it seems to me that no heretic could stand up like a man and look an honest world in the face. His figure was said to be composed like a subtle serpent. His address was soft and smooth, calculated to persuade, so that he had drawn seven hundred virgins from the church to his party. Look into history and into the lives of men who have taught his views, and you will find many pen pictures of the arch enemy of Christianity. You will also be reminded that the adversary does not always come as a roaring lion, but often as an angel of light. Coming thus, he most adroitly endangers the spiritual life of men. All intelligent people are aware that vicarious suffering is a mystery. Between the finite and the infinite there are a thousand mistakes, and always will be. If it were not so the finite would at once become the infinite. We cannot explain vicarious suffering, or even justify it; it is in nature, however, as well as grace. It does not make any difference whether our young people want a salvation that is bought at the price of another's agony or not—this is the only salvation they will ever find. Both natural and spiritual birth come to us from this world of mystery. The mother goes down to the gate of death for her child, and hundreds of them return not at all. The one born has no choice in the matter, it is God's idea and it cannot be improved upon by mortals. Innocent little birds are made the prey of greater ones. As in air, so in ocean. The little fish yield up their lives that greater ones may live. Dr. D. Lewis, of woman's crusade fame, spent three years camping in California. He said while there he met with a change of heart. He had been out with his rifle and had brought down a beautiful deer, possibly the mother of a fawn that was tucked away somewhere in the mountain. As he looked at this fine specimen of God's creation, the change of heart came upon him, and he said I will never do that again. Yet he looked upon the destruction of thousands of squirrels without compunction of conscience. The children of Israel having been accustomed to carnivorous habits in Egypt longed for flesh in the wilderness, so the Lord sent quails—millions of them. They were beautiful birds and it seemed a pity to kill them, but they must die that the children of Israel might live.

Hundreds of people die from earthquakes, lightning and tornadoes. It is absolutely necessary that such things come upon the world, to enable it to fulfill its mission; therefore those who thus die, die vicariously. They die that masses may live and be happy.

The writer stood recently with bared head in the presence of his brothers' graves, and the graves of hundreds of other Union soldiers and soliloquized thus: "They died for me. Many of them were mere boys, they gave their young lives that I, and thousands of others might live a long and peaceful life in the greatest country in the world." The same is true of the hosts that died during the world war, and are buried here, and where the poppies grow. They all died vicariously, that the world might be a better habitat for the living.

There are great questions that if settled permanently, must be settled in blood. Man sin was one of them. Jesus Christ settled that intricate question on Calvary's tree nearly two thousand years ago.

Helping Prohibition, a Task for Missionary Women

By Helen Barrett Montgomery

MRS. Henry W. Peabody was recently elected president of the Federation of Women's Boards for Foreign Missions. It was not long before her deep interest in prohibition began to be seen in the actions taken by the federation. A resolution was adopted by the executive committee of the federation and presented to the Council of Women for Home Missions its adoption; then forwarded to the executive officers in our government, and to the senate and house of representatives.

The gist of this resolution was to deprecate the activities of the Anti-Volstead League and the Women's Liberty League in the interest of bringing back wine and beer. A personal letter received from Mrs. Peabody urges all the presidents of mission boards of foreign missions—some forty in number—to lay before their constituencies the need of active work in the interest of enforcing the eighteenth amendment of the constitution.

As church women we are all deeply interested in this question. It was due to the activities of great bodies of Christian people that the amendment was finally placed in the constitution, and the struggle to maintain and enforce this bit of legislation must be carried on by us. As president of the Woman's Foreign Mission Society, I am therefore urging the district, state and local auxiliaries to take every opportunity to exert an influence in the struggle. A few suggestions as to practical methods might not be out of place.

First: Let there be no annual meeting—district, state or associational—where resolutions regarding prohibition are not passed and sent to the state and national legislatures. The same kind of resolutions may be introduced at the annual meetings of local societies, and sent. It may seem that these resolutions will have comparatively little effect, but every one of them helps. In sending a resolution, it should be addressed to the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., % Hon. John Smith; or to the Senate of the United States, % Hon. Wm. Brown. (Of course using the right name of your representative or senator.) This form of address is preferable to sending them to the individual representative or senator, because it makes the communication the property of the house or the senate, and insures its publication.

Second: When legislation, either state or national, is pending, telegrams are an exceedingly forcible method of informing representatives or senators of the sentiment of the society. A night letter of forty words can be signed with the names of four officers of a local society without additional expense. Four individuals can unite in a telegram and sign their names without adding anything to the cost. Night letters should be sent, rather than straight telegrams. These should be carefully framed, and should not be mere formal expressions that seem to emanate from one source, but should be phrased individually by the senders. Such telegrams can be sent to the secretary of state, the attorney general, the president, or to governors of states, with very great power.

Third: Through properly appointed committees, see that items in regard to the progress of prohibition, the spread of prohibition principles in the Orient, its enforcement at home, and all kindred subjects, are sent to your local press. Remember that small local newspapers, in the aggregate, have very great influence, and keep them humming with the truth in regard to prohibition.

Fourth: See that the Anti-Saloon League in your state is actively supported in its fight for enforcement.

Fifth: Inform yourselves so that you can talk at luncheons or dinners or teas, informingly and truthfully, regarding the status of prohibition. You can get material from many sources. Mrs. Peabody mentions the following:

(a) The speech of Sept. 22, 1922, by Senator Morris Sheppard, published in the Congressional Record of that date.

(b) The pamphlet "Hold Fast America," which is the result of the investigation of Gifford Gordon, of Australia, on the operation of prohibition in the United States.

(c) The special article in the Outlook (New York City), of March 21, 1923, entitled, "Three Years of Prohibition."

Sixth: You can pray. This is a struggle, not against flesh and blood, but against intrenched wickedness in high places. We need to bring to the struggle the supernatural power of God. Organize prayer bands. Pray for public officials upon whom rests the enforcement of the law, and write them that you are praying for them. See that prayers in the interest of temperance and prohibition are made at your monthly meetings and give a period for silent prayer at your great conventions.

The Wide Scope of a Small Church

Embodying specific suggestions by many specialists. Paragraphs 10-13 are largely the phraseology of Rev. W. H. Thompson, director of town and country work of Ohio

BY LEMUEL CALL BARNES

THE glory of a local church, however small in number of members, is that it can have an eye upon and a hand in wide-reaching affairs. The wide reach is not only in time and space, but also in fascinating variety. The local church as a whole or in groups can select and undertake many of the things which Christ wants done in the world.

"The world is so full of a number of things I think we should all be as happy as kings."

As a help to this happiness, the following list is compiled. It might be twice as long. But doing half of these would be the making of any church. It is not a description but only a catalog, slightly annotated.

All the items are looked at from the unselfish point of view, "thy neighbor as thyself," and they are all considered as among the possibilities of a small church.

1. Neighboring. Jesus himself made "neighbor" one of the two greatest words in the world. He summed all religion up in hearty outgoing toward "God . . . and . . . neighbor." Neighborly friendliness is what gives delicious flavor in the fruitage of every-day life. All know that. True followers of Christ go deeper still and earnestly search how to saturate with his spirit everything that goes on in the neighborhood. It is the big thing yet to be done on earth.

2. Finding the neighbors. It is a great help, in bringing the neighbor spirit to clearness and specific thought, to make a list of the neighborhood folks, old and young, stating opposite each name relation to church, Sunday school, philanthropy, industry, and other neighborhood activities.

3. Inspiring reverence. "In a corner of of my heart there is a little plant called reverence which wants to be watered about once a week." (O. W. Holmes.) Making public worship winsome and strengthening serves everything in the vicinity. "The church has influenced society most when it has been most preoccupied with the vital experience of God."

4. Winning disciples. Getting individuals to make their own the spirit of Christ is the fundamental social service. The testimony of a neighbor is the best sermon. Winsome life and winsome words are both essential. The good news of the kingdom of heaven on earth involves an invitation which is to be pressed for the sake of the neighborhood as well as for the sake of the individual—in fact, for the sake of all mankind.

5. Exalting the family. The structural unit of society, the family, is stabilized as well as made heavenly by the ministries of the church at weddings, funerals, hours of strain and hours of gladness. The occasions it furnishes for young men and women to become acquainted with each other under refining conditions are a fundamental service to the community. So is its work for little children.

6. Training learners. Learner is the Anglo-Saxon of disciple. Bible school, young people's society, study class, team play, stimulated helpfulness, are of untold service to the whole neighborhood. Initiating the habit of service is in the highest degree useful. When started in that way some of the youth of the neighborhood are sure to become servants of humanity at large in various strategic places. A majority of the great leaders came from small churches.

7. Initiating the young in elemental living. Team-work is the key. Boy scouts, boys' clubs, girl scouts, campfire girls, are well known ways. Twenty different types of clubs for country girls alone have been listed. There is a "Classified Bibliography of Boy Life."

8. Approving wholesome amusement. "Practically every young person gives the major portion of his spare time to seeking enjoyment." Whatever the church may feel compelled to disapprove, it should make itself known chiefly, not by its negatives, but by its positive sympathies with young life, smiling ten times more than it frowns. Help both silently and vocally to get good things going. Youth makes character through play.

9. Christianizing industry. The chief occupation of most men is earning a living or a competency. Work is a primary means of grace. How it needs to be made gladsome and altruistic by the spirit of Christ! A church may not often know the complicated factors well enough to take sides in a labor dispute. But it is its business constantly to teach the principles of justice and fraternity which alone can finally settle such matters.

10. Furthering food production. Feeding the famishing is Christian service—still more so is preventing their famishing. The food supply of the human family is rapidly requiring increase. Farming and garden clubs are often helpful. State agricultural colleges provide lectures and demonstrations through their extension service dealing with every phase of country life, including home economics. Where there is a county agricultural agent this service may be secured through him. When farming pays, the church and the school prosper.

11. Securing health betterment. State boards of health in some instances are carrying out progressive programs of service to communities in conducting better health crusades, "swat the fly" campaigns and sanitation surveys. In some places cooperation with the Red Cross in securing public health nurses is highly useful. Jesus cured bodies as well as souls.

12. Invigorating the public schools. Intercession for teachers and pupils is vital. The church people can do much by way of sympathetic counsel to inspire the members of the school board to secure efficient teachers, enrich the curriculum, provide adequate buildings and equipment, inaugurate a wider use of the school plant, and at the same time help to create public opinion for these things.

13. Promoting higher education of all the people. Many state universities furnish popular and technical lectures covering practically every department of literature, art, science, medicine, education in civics, adapted to the needs of various communities. Observe a "go-to-college" day.

14. Encouraging the best reading. If a half dozen homes subscribe for as many good magazines and hand them around in regular rotation, all have the choicest at the smallest cost. Most states provide circulating libraries to communities wishing them—the books being sent upon request for the express charges. This would be interesting work for the young people's society.

15. Broadening and refining. A church moves in the realm of idealistic thought and high purpose. It is rooted in a long history and a diversified literature. Much of it essential work is making this history and literature known, understood and heeded. Through them it reaches the heart and will. Its means of doing so expand the mind and quicken intelligence. With all this inherent no wonder that the church becomes a mother of culture.

16. Encouraging good work. The church is not called upon to do everything, but it can joyfully and prayerfully furnish workers for many welfare undertakings. It should obviously be the "big brother" of every good enterprise.

17. Furthering public reforms. It is admitted, yea, loudly alleged, by enemies of

A Country Church Member Speaks Her Mind

PERSONALLY I believe that the pastor is the most important individual in a community and should be a community leader so far as he is fit—that there is nothing that will ever take the place of the morning service as now conducted especially if the pastor is wise enough to know that scolding in the pulpit seldom helps but that a thread of hope running through all his sermons will help everybody and be an ounce of prevention against Christian Scientists; that an element of surprise in any service, especially in the evening service will help keep up his own interest and that of his people; that something a little unusual in the evening service will help to draw out the young people—and here might come in the aid of outside organizations.

That people should be encouraged to keep flowers on the platform and to wear their most attractive garments and faces to church—for I must confess that sometimes I have gone to church too tired and discouraged to remember a word of the sermon but have remembered (even to this day) a beautiful bouquet or a pretty gown and smiling face, and, by the way, this very thing explains why some people leave their own church and sometimes go to town for Easter—they long for something new to look at. Some one has said that the more monotonous a man's life is the greater is his need for a stimulant of some kind and I am not joking when I say that sometimes people in the country, real good people too, get so deadly tired of looking at the same old hats, and pulpits, and everything that they go off to some other church for a Sunday and they feel sort of sneaking about it, too, because they do not know what is the matter with them. I believe if I happened to be a preacher and could not afford but one necktie I would leave it off occasionally just to break the monotony and would have my wife purchase hats that could be worn with the trimming on the back or the front so that she could present a different look to the congregation.

enforced temperance that it is the church people who have brought it about. Thank God! We have other vital issues to be forced; for example, industrial peace and world peace. Good roads are indispensable to human progress.

18. Undergirding citizenship. So many people take lightly their relationships to town, state and nation that the teaching of the prophets as to public righteousness is a profound necessity.

19. Enriching anniversaries. Not only Christmas, Easter, and special church anniversaries, but Independence Day, Labor Day, Arbor Day, and twenty other days may be given new zest and high meaning for the whole neighborhood. Inaugurate a community day with a picnic.

20. Incorporating benevolence. A church is itself a benevolent construction and it makes benevolence structural in its members. No other institution compares with it in the wide range of its benefactions. It is the best school of philanthropy, practical love of man—"thy neighbor."

21. Making world sympathy keen. Every continent, country, and island of the sea can be lifted above the horizon for study, prayer and good understanding. Pictures are useful. Many a small church has cultivated the interest of common people in far-away members of the human family and become a hot-bed of universal service.

22. Cooperating with other churches. In the thousands of cases where there is only one church in a community a manifold program may appear inviting. Where there is more than one church a primary opportunity is that of conferring together as to the welfare of the neighborhood and planning a division of labor in endeavoring to meet certain needs, and joint action in all matters in which that is practicable.

23. Rising above race prejudice. This is one of the greatest of miracles, especially if the races are of decidedly differing color. It is not too great for the church of Christ to perform.

24. Neighboring newest Americans. Almost everywhere the "stranger within the gates" about whom the Old Testament made such such careful provisions is hungry for neighborly fellowship. Practical exhibitions of good-will, teaching him English and brotherhood, making him a neighbor, can work miracles.

25. Undertaking only such things as are adapted to the particular makeup and surroundings of your church. Two or three things steadily pushed do more good than twenty things dabbled about. It will make a great difference in certain measures whether a small city church is in a residential or an industrial neighborhood and a small village church is concerned mainly with agricultural or with manufacturing people.

26. Remembering and never forgetting that the chief business of all followers of Christ individually and collectively is to make the spirit of Christ supreme in every human life and in all the relationships of life. We need to study deeply the ministry of Christ in order steadily to imbibe and to give forth the same spirit.

27. Lifting the outlook of the whole neighborhood toward infinite horizons. There is reality behind the phrase "a New England conscience." Many an old frontier hamlet carried on all its life "as in the sight of God," town meeting and all. Ultimately every community will do it. In our infinitely complex modern life the church is to make the sense of God luminous for every relationship with every neighbor.

How the Rural Church Looks to a Beginner

By A. W. Coates

AFTER three weeks on this rural field, and after studying the situation in all its broad and minute aspects, I must admit the present-day rural church looks rather interesting and encouraging. The people whom I serve here may be beyond the average rural church member intellectually and economically; the conditions which I have to face may not be a fair estimate of the strictly rural church of today, but I am fully convinced that the rural Protestant church looks hopeful and bright.

We may ask: How can we make the rural church progressive? By a reverent consideration for the spiritual life in the common places. We must assiduously see to the culture of their souls. I am inclined to think at times there is a tendency to neglect the soul's welfare. The hope of the rural church looks bright because this one aspect is being greatly emphasized.

There was a time, and is today, when the ministry preferred to locate in the town or city; leaving the country church to use those who themselves felt unqualified to work in the city churches. No church can progress beyond its ministry. If we have a country pastor who really knows how to construct a dynamic program, then the church will show the efforts being inaugurated. I do not mean myself to be an example, but I hope and pray that my conception may be more or less idealistic.

Again, our rural churches look progressive because of the conditions of their economic constituency. They have practically the same advantages and opportunities that our city people have; good roads, automobiles, electric lights and water in the homes. Then, too, we might see the fact that it is easier to arouse enthusiasm among the country people. They are not locally infested with those amusements which quite often prove a parasite to the city pastor.

Of course I am not here because it is easy. I have all the problems which human flesh can endure. I would not try to handle the work without God's assistance and the way in which the dear people stand by me.

What the rural as well as the city churches need today is a minister who can lead the people through prayer and sympathy. There is no place in our present churches for a despot. The church needs a man of God whose interest is in serving mankind, and to show to man the great love of God; above all a man who is thirsty for the growth of God's kingdom. The present-day rural minister should have the love and confidence of those to whom he administers. This attitude should not be less with the cosmopolitan twentieth century rural pastor who works with a rural constituency.

The Position of Romanists in Latvia

IN reply to an inquiry Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke has received the following explanation of the action of the Latvian government in transferring to the Roman Catholics an important church in the capital city. It will be seen that church and state are by on means independent of one another in this newly freed republic. Very considerable educational work needs to be undertaken in Europe before the ideals of British Baptists are understood, or the actual practice of America or Canada followed. The document, which emanates from the Latvian foreign office, is in the following terms:

"The seat of the Catholic bishopric of Riga was renewed in 1918, in the time of the German occupation. In Latvia there are about 400,000 Catholics, which, numbered according to the registration-data of 1920, makes one-fourth of all the inhabitants. After the foundation of independence, the government could not think of banishing from Latvia the pope's appointed bishop or abolishing the diocese. At that time the state of the Catholic church in Latvia was such: In Riga, the newly appointed Catholic bishop—a foreigner; Courland was subject to the Catholic bishop of Kovno; Lithuania and Latgalia to the bishop of Mohilex, who resided at Warsaw and was subject to the bishop-general of Warsaw. Consequently Latvia would have three Catholic bishops—all foreigners and being in other countries, would supervise the Latvian Catholics. Such condition could not be regarded as normal. The task of the government was the following: (1) To unite the three parts of Latvia—Livonia, Courland and Latgalia—in a diocese and under the supervision of a single bishop. (2) To take steps that the present bishop—foreigner in Riga, is recalled and replaced by a Latvian bishop to whom would be subjected all the Catholic congregations of Latvia. (3) To see that the Catholic clergy get their education in Latvian schools and are not foreigners. Consequently, the aim of the government was clearly political and national. There is neither talk nor thought of supporting a special creed. The government attains this aim by the concordat which guarantees the above-mentioned demands of the government. No special privilege, which would not be enjoyed by other confessions, is granted to the Catholic church. Religious freedom is strictly observed by the Latvian government. The transfer of the church to the Catholic bishop is the government's home affair, Rome has not exerted any influence nor has she raised any demands in this matter.

"The Government puts at the disposal of the Catholic bishop one of the state's churches (St. Jacobi) which was formerly a Catholic church. For Lutherans there are sufficient churches in Riga. In the concordat it is stated that the government gives to the Catholic bishop a church according to the choice of the government and that the Catholic bishop is entitled to bring up objections only in the case of this church proving to be insufficient for his services. The transfer of St. Jacobi has been effected by the parliament guided by the above-mentioned political and national motives and accepted by a great majority of votes."

National Religion

"Jesus Christ is civil governor among the nations"—The watchword of the National Reform Association

BY GEORGE E. BURLINGAME

AUGUSTINE'S splendid dream of "the "City of God" had a fresh revival at Winona during the first week in July, when the National Reform Association held its Christian Citizenship Conference, which was announced as preliminary to a world conference for which the association is preparing.

The charming and deservedly famous Christian summer resort of Winona Lake, Ind., placed all its resources material and spiritual at the disposal of the officials having charge of the extensive program for the conference; and proved its capacity to care for a large crowd, many of whom came in autos and remained only for a day or two.

On Independence Day, while the American people in general were suffering from Shelby-shock or indulging in sports and spectacles, Winona celebrated with three stirring sessions of the Conference on Christian Citizenship, culminating in an address by Citizen William Jennings Bryan on "Loyalty to Country and to Country's Lord," delivered to ten or twelve thousand people. A large portion of Mr. Bryan's message dealt with prohibition, which, he affirmed, was the longest-drawn-out contest the country ever had, and was not put over in a night. He declared that the appeal to quit drinking must go from every pulpit and from every schoolhouse in the land, if the law is to become completely effective. Discussing the ship-liquor controversy, Mr. Bryan said: "Any nation which gives the protection of its flag to a traffic which proposes to violate our laws against liquor outside the three-mile limit, cannot be trusted to obey our laws inside the three-mile limit."

Its Organization

The National Reform Association was organized in 1863. A delegate this year from Kansas, R. N. Redpath, was present at the first meeting sixty years ago. Several national conferences have been held, the last being at Portland, Ore. The leadership of the association is predominantly of ministers of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, although many Protestant bodies are cooperating in the movement. The national headquarters are at Pittsburgh, with regional offices at Chicago, Los Angeles, and elsewhere. The association is supported largely by annual subscriptions taken in the churches, and the method of promotion and extension is practically identical with that of the Anti-Saloon League of America. There are more than twenty speakers engaged in field work for the association, including ex-Senator Frank J. Cannon, and the veteran southern evangelist, Sam Small. One of the most dramatic incidents of the conference involved the latter. On July 4 he was giving a brief talk on the significance of the American flag, when he suddenly said: "I presume there is no one present except myself who ever fired on that flag"—and went on with his recital of how he had enlisted as a Tennessee boy of fourteen in the Confederate army in 1864, and was mustered out at the end of the conflct with the 25,000 lads under fifteen who surrendered to Grant and Sherman. He told of his service under Old Glory in the Spanish-American War, and of his solemn farewell to his two sons when they went to France to defend the flag on which their father and grandfather had fired. He avowed his sincere repentance for his rebellion, and exulted in the failure of secession—and by that time the audience was wild with patriotic fervor under the simple eloquence of his confession of love for the Union. "If New York is determined to secede from the Union," he cried, "we southerners will come up and bring her back. If we couldn't lick that flag we don't propose to let any other folks do it!"

"The Bible on every teacher's desk," is the persistent slogan of the leaders of the association. They state that already more than 80 per cent of the American people have, or may have, the Bible read daily in their public schools. Such reading is prohibited by law or by regulation in Illinois, California, Washington, Arizona, Missouri, Minnesota, Montana, and Louisiana. Daily Bible reading is required in the public schools of the following states: Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia and Mississippi; and in Washington, D. C., Indianapolis, Ind., and New York City. The Pennsylvania statute, enacted in 1913, is as follows:

> "At least ten verses from the Holy Bible shall be read or caused to be read without comment, at the opening of each and every school, upon each and every school day, by the teacher in charge; provided that where any teacher is under and subject to direction, then the teacher exercising the authority shall read the Holy Bible or cause it to be read as herein directed.
> "If any school teacher whose duty it shall be to read the Holy Bible or to cause it to be read, as directed in this act, shall fail to or omit to do so, said teacher shall, upon charges preferred for such failure or admission and proof of the same before the governing board of the school district, be discharged."

The session of the conference devoted to the Bible in the education of youth, was conducted by Prof. Nathaniel Butler of the University of Chicago, a member of Hyde Park Baptist Church. Doctor Butler came as the personal representative of President Ernest D. Burton, conveying assurances from the latter of his deep interest in the problem of teaching religion. At a later session the conference adopted a resolution defining its policy as follows:

"Inasmuch as this is a Christian nation, adhering to the Christian system of morals, it is the sense of this conference that those authorized to teach in the public schools should be in thorough sympathy with the ethics of Jesus as taught in the Bible; that in order to qualify as public schoolteachers they be required to pass an examination in methods of teaching moral principles; and that normal schools and teacher-training schools should be required to give a full course of instruction in the methods of teaching Christian morals to the children coming under instruction in our schools."

Christian Public Education

Dr. Charles F. Wishart, president of Wooster College, Ohio, and moderator of the Presbyterian Church U. S. A., in an evening address of remarkable insight and interest, advanced the reasons for Christian public education. He presented as of equal importance with the factor of change in the progress of civilization, the correlated factor of persistence. "Amid all the changes that have come and are yet to come in our civilization, we must conserve the thing that made us or we die!" Our debt to civilization requires that we shall transmit the precious heritage of the past to our posterity. "Education is the process by which we gather up the best things of the past civilization and put them at the disposal of the future civilization."

Baptists participating in the conference program included Prof. Nathaniel Butler, Clinton N. Howard of Rochester, N. Y., and Miss Martha Kralicek, representing the Czecho-Slovakian peo-

Fundamental Principles of the National Reform Association

1. The state or nation is itself a moral being, a personality, possessing intelligence, conscience and will, capable of right and wrong; and therefore a subject of moral law and responsible to God for its conduct.
2. Like all other moral beings, the nation is under the authority of Jesus Christ the Ruler of the universe, and therefore bound to own and serve him. The state should be religious.
3. The law of God, revealed through Jesus Christ and contained in the scriptures, is, in so far as it relates to nations, the rule of national life, the standard of national action, and should be accepted by nations as such.

Primary Aims

1. The adoption of the "Christian Amendment" to the federal constitution, explicitly avowing the power of God and the authority of Jesus Christ as the Ruler of nations.
2. The requirement by law that the Bible shall be read daily by the teacher in every public school in the United States.
3. The requirement by law that all teachers in public schools be qualified to teach Christian morals as a condition of their appointment.
4. The enactment of laws to prohibit Sabbath desecration.
5. The enactment of a national uniform divorce law in harmony with the teaching of Jesus.
6. The suppression of the evils of Mormonism through legislation.

ple. Dr. James W. Francis was among the announced speakers, but was not present. Other men of eminence on the program were Dr. Francis J. McConnell, Rev. W. M. Bell, and a long list of senators, representatives in congress, and governors.

The National Reform Association is comitteed to a constitutional amendment as its most fundamental task. Its distinctive theory of government, affirming that the nation is a personality and should have a religion and should avow its religious belief, leads to its advocacy of the "Christian Amendment." The classic preamble to the federal constitution written by Alexander Hamilton is printed, with the proposed addition indicated in italics:

"We, the people of the United States, acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all power, and the authority of Jesus Christ as the Ruler of nations, and of his will as supreme law in national life, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

"By Scripture Verified"

By E. M. Bixby

TO some, no doubt, the doctrinal controversies occupying the mind and pen for the past months may seem unimportant, but to me they mean new life, a stronger faith and better knowledge of Christian truth and duty. Increased circulation is as beneficial as physical health.

The church of the present day seems to be losing sight of some of the old landmarks of faith and practice held by our fathers, so highly prized, not because they are of the fathers, but of God. While I entertain no fear for the safety of the ark, yet when I hear the trumpet give an uncertain sound, I feel like climbing the ancient heights, and crying "Lord, place my feet on higher ground."

In view of decaying altar fires, is it not imperative that we strengthen the things that remain, that appear ready to die, lest that blindness in part, which happened to Israel, become the inheritance of the church in its approaching Laodicean period?

Unbelief of the vital teachings of Divine truth, like dead branches on a tree, are indicative of a loss of vitality. Let us very briefly consider from a layman's viewpoint one of the subjects so frequently mentioned in theological circles, the virgin birth, or deity of our Lord Jesus Christ. Of course, we are entirely dependent upon scripture record, but as this is one of the most important doctrines of our Christian faith, we would naturally expect it to be revealed in plain and definite language, so as to avoid all uncertainty. If every important truth stood forth in as bold relief as this, the many different opinions among men might materially lessen. Matthew's account of the birth of our Lord, given by inspiration, looks plain, straightforward and convincing. There is no reading between the lines, no unwritten law in sight.

Joseph, a worthy man, was espoused to a virgin, named Mary. We understand that in Jewish courts betrothal was considered almost as binding and sacred as marriage.

Joseph perceived some time during courtship that his intended bride had, as he thought, been untrue to him. His strong character and sincere affection would not permit him openly to condemn her, so he concluded quietly to dismiss her, without publicity; but while he thought the matter over, an angel of the Lord came to his rescue. He told Joseph plainly that Mary was not to blame, that her character was above reproach, that her condition was in harmony with the fulfilment of scripture as recorded by the prophet (Isa.-7-14) "A virgin shall be with child of the Holy Ghost, a Son shall be born whose name shall be called Jesus, Emanuel, God with us." Also Isa.. 9:6, 7. So Joseph did as the angel commanded him and took Mary to wife, as previously intended, sacredly preserving her virgin purity, until Jesus was born, as Matt. 1-25 plainly states.

We have also another record, Luke, chapter 1. The writer said he had perfect knowledge of all things from the very first. Luke gives us a fuller and more complete account of the design and fulfilment of the divine purpose.—Luke 1, 26-35 inclusive. This scripture account is too plain for unbelief to make an honest plea that Jesus Christ was born of human wedlock.

In scripture, when hereditary records are to be preserved, you will perceive that the name of the father takes precedent. For instance the Israelitish nation was called the seed of Abraham, and the twelve tribes were known by the names of Jacob's twelve sons.

The scattered remnant which were to repeople the earth after the flood were the generations of Noah, and his three sons. How, then, does it happen that in Gen. 3-15 the promised Messiah is called the seed of the woman? Was it not because God, through the divine spirit and not man, was the true Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Jesus must have a human mother and identify himself with the race, in order to qualify for his appointed task as Kinsman and Redeemer of Adam's lost estate.

He must have a divine father and be the only son of Heaven's inherited wealth, to be able to pay the price which divine justice required as penalty for disobedience and broken law. To deny the established fact of the deity, as well as humanity of our Lord, would undermine the basic foundations of sovereign grace, pluck the scepter from the hand of the rightful King of Glory, and make the greatest plan of infinite wisdom a tragic farce.

I will not take time or space to collect the many accounts of Old Testament teachings which Jesus revealed to the two disciples on their Emmaus journey, quotations from Moses, the prophets and the Psalms, for the Old Testament as well as the New is replete with elemental truths in divine settings, that the man of Nazareth and the only begotten Son of God, were in Bethlehem's manger, through divine mystery, made forever one and inseparable. The midnight air on Bethlehem's plains was full of its music, its radiant light was seen in eastern skies, while God the Father, in audible voice proclaimed it over Jordan's waves and on mountain height.

Witnesses

God, angels, disciples, devils, prophets, mighty works, and even nature bear testimony to its sublime and well-established facts. So important and necessary has the testimony of these witnesses been, that if they should hold their peace, the very stones would cry out. Infidelity, therefore, is left without even a brief, worthy of the signature of any person of note; and higher criticism (so-called) can take a long vacation and no one suffer loss.

With the verdict of St. Paul, a man who had seen Jesus, and heard the mention of his name at the right hand of the throne eternal, we will close, Romans 1-5: "Of whom as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God, blessed forever more. Also Heb. 1-8. But of the Son he saith.

"Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever,
Teach us the truth, thou living Christ,
Make it so simple, plain and strong,
That nearer to Thee, shall be our prayer,
And saved by blood, shall be our song."

The Strangled Life

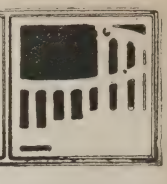
By Charles L. White

THE largest hard-wood trees in the tropics are crushed to death and dragged down to the earth by vines. The work of destruction progresses slowly. A seed carried by the wind lodges unobserved in some crevice between a limb and the trunk and takes root. As the plant grows its tiny tendrils sway in the air and the vine swinging free from the tree reaches the earth at length and roots itself in the soil. But its nature is to climb again and so it slowly creeps toward the tree to which it fastens. Then, circling the giant, it rises inch by inch, and threads its way upward among the branches sending off new tendrils which in turn girdle the body of the unsuspecting tree. The seasons pass and the vines, slowly growing large and tough, become huge cables tightening as the years go on which in the end strangle the life of the tree. At last it dies, decays and crashes to the earth a heap of broken wood tangled in the serpentine coils of its destroyer.



Such is sometimes the history of the faith of a man, a group, a nation. The seed of rationalism lodging undetected in some hidden recess gets its root into the soil of the intellect, where it grows unperceived at first and unheeded later, crushing out all spiritual activity and strength. It is the history of an individual life. It may be the history of a family, a community, a denomination. Reason unaided by revelation evolves rationalism and rationalism subordinates and destroys spiritual vitality. The process in its earlier stages is apparently beautiful and harmless but at last the collapse comes.

UNITY

In THE BAPTIST for June 30 appeared a re-print on the Page of Opinion from the Christian Register, on the subject of "Too Much 'Unity.'" The utterance, of course, was timely on that page, put forth merely as one opinion. But it was, even so, an utterance so reactionary as to call for another statement of some sort on the side of "unity."

Hence I am enclosing an excerpt from the annual report of the secretary of the Detroit Council of Churches, being a quotation from Dr. Charles S. McFarland, with which Dr. M. C. Pearson began his report.

"One cannot think aright about the question of unity among the churches, without approaching it from the background of the larger question of the unity of mankind. The whole world today, as never before, is seeking unity. In spite of strife and conflict, men everywhere are looking wistfully for some principle of fellowship, some way of life by which brotherhood shall become more than an elusive dream. And the Christian church has always claimed to possess the secret of unity, and declares that "in Jesus Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free"—in a word, that all divisive barriers between nation and nation, race and race, class and class, must be transcended through the power of Christ.

"Lack of unity, then, among the churches themselves, which possess in common this gospel of unity, must always be a terrific handicap, to their bearing the most convincing witness to the world. They declare to the world that there is one God who is Father of all, one Lord and Savior, in whom His will for human life has been revealed, one Spirit that is calling us all to that way of salvation. But how can they expect to persuade the world at large of the truth of their Gospel unless the churches themselves, which together hold it, can in their relations to one another express the meaning and reality of this ideal? Lack of unity on our own part imperils the very truth of the Gospel that we proclaim."—Dr. Charles S. McFarland.

The press report of the annual report and meeting stands out as an evidence of what can be done in practical cooperation on lines of Christian unity—not union. Having read the Christian Register's opinion at about the same time we were holding our annual council meeting, I was struck with the contrast between one statement of opinion and the array of facts presented here in Detroit.

I understand our denomination believes in itself, but also believes equally in the kind of Christian unity, which IS a principle, based on scripture, and which therefore tends to remove handicaps and to furnish assets to the whole gospel program.

"THE PERPETUAL CRISIS"

I became much interested in reading the article by Dr. Henry Van Dyke, in THE BAPTIST of June 30. I do not suppose that many real Baptists readily accept the sort of doctrine that is contained in that article entitled "The Perpetual Crisis in the Christian Church." It seems to me that it is such peculiar and questionable teachings that continue this "perpetual crisis," and stir the hearts of those of us who desire to believe God's Word and the statements contained therein, rather than such doubt-sowing poison-gas as the learned doctor spreads abroad by such statements as his. Far be it from me to criticize the policy or labors of the respected editor of our BAPTIST, and yet, it seems to me, that there are a lot of scriptural, Christ-honoring Baptist ministers, whose utterances would build us up in the Christian faith, and would be more acceptable to the majority of Baptists, and would encourage pastors to push the circulation of our Baptist paper.

I have no doubt whatsoever but that Doctor Van Dyke is as honest and sincere as any mortal can be, but to my mind his statements discredit and contradict plain statements of our Bible, and, therefore, I cannot accept as worthwhile the aforementioned article. On page 686, third column, we read, "The highly probable hypothesis of evolution, not yet proved," etc. The doctor suggests that certain ones "would do well to read before they talk." Apparently he has not practiced his own preaching, or else overlooked Gen. I:21-25.

To my mind, it takes just those five verses from God's Word to give the theory of evolution its deathblow. Five times in five verses we read, "after his kind," and twice is recorded, "after their kind." Then, regarding the "creation of man," we read, Gen. 1:27: "God created man in his own image," and in that one verse "created" appears three times. I may be slow of real comprehension, but I cannot fit Doctor Van Dyke's ideas into those few verses. Then, on page 704 and first column, Doctor Van Dyke suggests that Jesus "in effect" contradicted "Old Testament Scriptures," in spite of the fact that Jesus did say, "I came not to destroy, but to fulfill," Matt. 5:17-19. But any one reading Matt. 5:27 to 44, can readily see that Jesus did not contradict the "statement of old," but rather added to the admonition of law, the "second mile" of Christian grace; not contradiction, but addition. Next he questions the "oneness of Christ with the Father" by his assertion, "The dogma that the wonderful works of Christ were wrought by his own omnipotence is not scriptural." Jesus continually taught and insisted upon "his oneness with the Father," in fact that was the thing that stirred up Pharasaic hatred, John 5:18; and was endorsed by Paul, Phil. 2:6; also John in John 1:1, 9, 10.

Again, we read in Doctor Van Dyke's statement, "Finally, the dogma that Christ's resurrection body was entirely changed from the body buried in the tomb, is unscriptural." I am caused to wonder if Doctor Van Dyke has ever given careful consideration to the full account of the resurrection story. First, let us recall Ex. 12:10. God's instructions regarding the "passover lamb," the true type of Jesus, the "Lamb of God," and our passover. I Cor. 5:7. Not a particle of flesh of either was allowed to spoil, or see corruption. Then notice Acts 2:27, Peter, quoting Psalm 16:10, asserts plainly that it refers to the resurrection of Jesus, body and soul, if you please. The account of Jesus meeting with Mary, John 20:17, his admonition regarding his body. The meeting of the disciples and Jesus' words to doubting Thomas, "Come, sound the wound-scars, and know it is I." And that breakfast by the sea, John 21:9, with the account in Luke 24:36-43. After a consideration of such passages of scripture, I am fully convinced that the body of Jesus was raised up, the body that hung upon the cross, too, and no doubt later changed into a spiritual body by divine power. Mark 116:12 suggests such a change, and nowhere does it read as Doctor Van Dyke asserts, "The risen Christ passed through closed doors." But if I read correctly it is plainly stated, "the doors were shut, * * * came Jesus and stood in their midst." Now, if Doctor Van Dyke will show me my error and name the passage where it is stated that "Jesus went through closed doors," I shall be glad to humbly apologize in any proper fashion he may suggest. After some years of trying to "infer and read into" the Word, I stopped that sort of thing and began reading "what is written," and consequently became a Baptist, and I am proud of it, because I have a conviction that a Baptist is one who believes what the Bible says, and rejects all that is "inferred and supposed, without scriptural foundation." Should these remarks of mine be considered worthy of a place in your columns, I shall feel happy and honored, and also that two diverse viewpoints have received "fair play."

The International Sunday School Lesson for August 12

MARTHA AND MARY

Lesson: Luke 10:38-42; John 11:1-12:8; Mark 14:3-9

Golden Text: Luke 10:42

Introductory

The home of Mary and Martha and their brother Lazarus was in Bethany, a town on the southeastern slope of the Mount of Olives, two miles from Jerusalem. Mary and Martha are mentioned only in the passages recorded above.

The Lesson

The home of Mary and Martha seems to have been a favorite resting place of the Master's. It is probably here that he stayed on the nights of the last week preceding his crucifixion. It is a homely and most human scene—Mary seated at the feet of the Guest, listening to his word; Martha busied about the house making things comfortable for him. Her complaint about the negligence of her sister so far as household duties were concerned was received by Jesus with the tender reproach, "Martha, Martha, thou art anxious and troubled about many things . . . Mary hath chosen the better part which shall not be taken away from her." The second scene is also in Bethany but at the home of "Simon the leper," healed of his disease or he would not have been in his home entertaining guests. "There came a woman"—Mary of Bethany—"having an alabaster cruse of ointment of pure nard very costly; she brake the cruse and poured it over his head." This may have been an impetuous act of Mary's rather than a deliberately planned one, as it would seem logical that she had purchased this expensive ointment for the embalming of the body of her brother Lazarus. The Bethany sisters were not women "of substance" so far as is known. Mary's act created commotion among the onlookers, whose first thought was for the waste of money—"this ointment might have been sold for three hundred shillings, and given to the poor." But Jesus was not in sympathy with them. Back of the gift he saw the heart of Mary, and he knew the preciousness of what she had done for him. "Let her alone," he said. "Ye have the poor always with you; but me ye have not always. She hath done what she could. And wheresoever the gospel shall be preached, that also which this woman hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her." And so it has been.

Leading Thoughts

1. Martha, struggling with things temporal; Mary, clinging to "that which shall not be taken away from her." 2. Mary could be extravagant of time and other precious things for her Lord. 3. Martha, too, had vision. At the death of Lazarus she said to Jesus, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day," and "Yes, Lord, I have believed that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, even he that cometh into the world."

The Re-Making of Human Nature

It is perfectly natural that the persons who are convinced that more religious education is necessary should proceed to expand along lines already familiar. Let us teach more Bible, more missions, more church history. Let us place more emphasis upon drill and memorization. Let us make Bible stories more attractive and interesting. Let us have better text books, illustrative material and more elaborate equipment. Let us employ more of the methods which have been effective in public schools—map work, hand work, dramatization, expressional activities. We must seek in every possible way to get knowledge across, to motivate the instruction by means of credits and tests. Let us have more worship, the learning of more hymns and prayers.

If, however, our religious education is admittedly inadequate, it is a fair question as to whether the present unsatisfactory conditions in society will be remedied, or in any considerable measure improved, by simply increasing the amount of the same kind of education. It may be that we need a different kind. Before we commit ourselves finally to the building up of a new institution upon the old foundations, it would be well to examine afresh the aims for which the institution is to exist. It may be that we shall discover other fundamental reasons that help to account for the inadequacy of our religious education. It may be that the present unsatisfactory conditions in society are partly the result of conflicting aims in education, of uncorrelated teaching processes, of waste and confusion due to the overlapping of agencies and programs. If so, we should hardly remedy a bad situation by devising another agency of similar type to do the same sort of thing in more vigorous and determined fashion and thus add still more to the confusion and maladjustment from which the mind of the pupil already suffers.

This may seem a harsh way of putting the case. There is no desire to speak invidiously of week-day schools, or to disparage their efforts. There are obvious reasons why their aims should be, at the start, those which have been generally assumed in other schools. The very desire for more time, which has led many to seek for an allowance of time from the public school program, has brought pressure to bear from school boards which tends to strengthen the assumption that knowledge is the important thing in education. "Produce your text books, let us see your course of study, before you ask for public school time," they say. Public school efficiency, in the popular mind, has certain tangible aspects. It is apt to be judged by the elaborateness of courses of study, as apparent in text books, "stiffness" of courses, rigidity of discipline, "high standards."

Moreover, in asking support for these week-day schools, those who stand sponsor for them must show results. The public is not content to pour money into a new venture year after year with nothing to show for it. The easiest things to visualize the conception of religious education are "exhibits" of hand work, note-book work, essays, examination papers, models, memory drills, demonstrations, dramatizations—all of which leave still unanswered that deeper question: What have the pupils become? How differently do they feel and act? What habits and attitudes have been established? By what motives and purposes are they controlled? It is not so easy to make a convincing demonstration of these things, nor can a demonstration be made so speedily. It may require not months, but years, to convince a community of the real success of a school, judged by such tests as these. But these, after all, are the true tests.

We plead, then, for patience in the formulating of aims. Let us not lose this fine opportunity, offered by a widespread desire for something more and better, by failing to think through our educational processes until we arrive at something better, and not merely something more. Let us insist upon a fresh formulation of our aims in religious education; first, the great, central, controlling aim by which all elements which enter into the educational process are to be relentlessly judged. And then, the subsidiary aims around which to build in detail our future systems of religious education. The survey plainly discloses the fact that this is precisely what we have failed to do as yet. But how shall we proceed toward such formulations?

Have we not a clue in the very conviction out of which week-day schools have arisen, the conviction that the state of society is becoming intolerable, but also that it is improbable? Let us set out from this point of departure and ask the further questions: In what respects is the present order of society unsatisfactory? What kind of a world would we like to create, through education? What sorts of individuals would be necessary to make up such a world? And by what educational agencies and processes may such individuals be produced?

The Turtle's Daughter

(A True Story of the Helen Keller of Japan.)

THROUGH the kindness of Mrs. C. H. Fisher of Yokohama the following story of a remarkable Japanese girl was sent to me for use in our columns; for this year when Japan is to be a special study in all our churches it will surely be of unusual interest to read this account of the unfortunate Miss Umeko Ishimoto, described by some one who signs herself merely "Sakai" in the Japan Advertiser of Tokyo.

Last year I called on the Turtle's Daughter," Miss Umeko Ishimoto of Yokohama. She was just as unfortunate in her disabilities as Helen Keller. Her hands and feet were absolutely useless and she was able to move only her neck and head. Due to the assiduous endeavors of those who cared for her she developed the muscles of her neck, face, and lips to such an extent that the mouth served the purpose of hands.

Umeko was born in Yokohama on July 7, 1884, the daughter of a certain Mr. Shigezo Ishmoto. So far as looks were concerned she had nothing to be ashamed of in any circle, but her four limbs were completely withered and of no use to her at all. She could not stretch them out. Since she thus was confined to her bed and able to move only her head, people nicknamed her the "turtle's daughter." In 1893, when Umeko was ten years of age, she lost both her parents in an epidemic. She was then taken to the municipal poorhouse, where she passed a most lonely existence.

In 1904 Mr. Takejiro Yoshino became interested in her case and brought her to his own home for more particular care. At that time Mr. Yoshino was caring for seventeen orphans, rearing them with all the kindness of a true parent. Especially towards Umeko were both he and his wife so kind and thoughtful that Umeko came to love them deeply, calling them father and mother. Here for the first time she tasted the warmth of human kindness and began to experience some joy in human life. Her former melancholy was completely transformed into something so glad and happy that she was quite like another person. The Yoshinos, being strong Christians, members of the Tobe Methodist church, always had evening prayers with the orphans. As a result of hearing Christianity explained at prayers, Umeko entered upon the life of faith. Where before she was cruelly treated as an unfortunate person, now she was cared for as the very daughter of the Yoshino. The Christians in the church took turns in calling on her and in giving her many kindly consolations. So it is no wonder she became a zealous Christian and lead a life of joy and thankfulness. Last year when I went with the pastor of the Methodist church to call on her, I went intending to sympathize with her over her piteous condition, but on seeing her deep faith, I, who had a strong healthy body, became conscious of my great lack of faith. After I had talked with her about her Christian life, I asked her:

"What verse in the Bible do you like best?"

She replied:

"I have been greatly helped by I Timothy, 6:6, 'But godliness with contentment is great gain.' "

She did not rail at the Providence that so ordered that from birth she should live a life of complete helplessness—a shut-in-life. Confined to her bed, year in and year out, with only her head showing out of the top of the bed quilts, truly she looked like a turtle's daughter. However, on her part, there was no bemoaning her lack of freedom and it truly was wonderful to think of her content and gladly thankful to pass her days from morning to night, singing her hymns and reading her Bible.

Of course, being deformed from the day of her birth, Umeko was unable to assist in doing her share of the day's work about the home. And she made good use of her time in gaining an intimate knowledge of her Bible and hymn book. But more than once did she express an appreciation of the freedom of her life in the loving care of her foster-parents and frequent sympathetic visits of the Christians. After joining the Christian church, she lost all pessimistic thoughts and in a spirit of true thankfulness attained an optimistic understanding and view of things in general.

As soon as the Yoshinos took Umeko into her home, they began to teach her the A, B, C's. At first it appeared to be a very painful task, but after learning forty-eight characters at one sitting she became exceedingly enthusiastic over her new accomplishment and applied herself with such great delight to study that she made very rapid progress. Later Mr. Yoshino taught her to write by holding a brush in her mouth and soon she could write as well as the average person, sending cards and letters to her intimate friends. Due to her zealous faith and sincere gratitude for kindness shown her, she thus made great progress in anything to which she applied herself.

By the side of Umeko's bed there were always arranged a doll, flowers, her Bible and hymn book, as well as various other things she needed. When she wanted to open a book, she did so very easily to any page with the aid of a hair-pin.

Besides her letters, the Yoshinos taught her various other accomplishments for the purpose of developing the function of her mouth. She could fold paper into various shapes, such as delight the children—storks, boxes and such things. When I called on her, I had her fold two paper storks. Holding down the paper with something like a pair of scissors, she creased the paper with a hairpin and cut off a piece about five bu (a little more than one half an inch) square and skillfully with the hair-pin folded it into the shape of a stork only two bu in size, smaller than even a person with hands could do. She received no help from any one, but in a most marvelous fashion accomplished the feat by the use of the one thing—a hair pin, held in her mouth.

By her head was a doll of three or four sun (inch) in height dressed in a beautiful kimono, which, it appears, were all made by the mouth of Umeko without the aid of any person's hands. I did not see Umeko sew anything, but I did really see her thread a needle with remarkable ease. Consequently, after seeing her fold the paper stork, I realized that it was not impossible for her to have made the kimono. According to the Yoshinos, if you gave Umeko some cotton cloth, needle and thread, she would be happy by herself sewing the whole day long. Most of the articles she made were little money purses.

The Yoshinos remarked to me on leaving, that perhaps I was surprised at Umeko's sewing a doll's kimono and little money purses, but the thing that amazed them more than anything was her ability to shave some of the boys in the orphanage. She noticed one day that the boys' hair needed attention and asked for a razor. The Yoshinos did not think that she ought to try anything like that and so at first refused, but when she still insisted that she could do it, they gave her a razor and after propping her up a little one of the boys kneeled down low by her side and she successfully shaved him. Of course, it took rather a long time, but they were certainly surprised at the fine and careful shaving she was able to do.

Due to certain considerations, towards the last of her life, Umeko was transferred from the care of the Yoshinos to the home of a certain foreigner, and finally she had to be taken back to the municipal poorhouse, where after a lonely month and year she passed out of this life in September, 1921.

When a person loses the senses of sight and hearing, the sense of touch becomes keener and the memory stronger. It was an event long to be remembered when I shook hands with Helen Keller. All the powers of sight and hearing became centered in her sense of touch. So in Ukemo's case, the powers that were lacking elsewhere in her body, were gathered into her mouth and neck. Truly in man's body are hidden wonderful powers. Man is the temple of God.

Miss Hiro Kawakami, of Kobe on the Inland Sea

WHEN good Captain Bickel was building the Gospel Ship years ago, in Yokohama, he found a gem in the mud, picked it up and brought it to Soshin Jogakko (the Mary L. Colby School). It was a wild bit of humanity, dirty outside and in, unresponsive to kind treatment. The captain left his gem with us and went on his way, but he never forgot the child. Money for food, clothing and tuition came regularly but that was not all. Every day in the midst of his busy life he remembered to pray for her. His good wife also carried the child on her heart and sent tender messages of love to her. It was hard to overcome the evil in Hiro Kawakami, as she seemed to have little moral sense, but one after another of the older girls voluntarily took special charge of her, and one summer there appeared, as never before, repentance and a looking upward. She confessed her faith in Jesus and asked for baptism. We kept her waiting for awhile. There were frequent lapses, but she proved to us all that she was a different girl, and one day all were glad to see her buried with Christ in baptism. She finally graduated from the high-school department, a Christian girl, trusted and loved by everybody, and went at once to the islands to help Captain Bickel.

She held Sunday schools and children's meetings and taught in the kindergarten. Later she married a Christian man, but their life together was short, as he died of tuberculosis and the un-Christian parents compelled her to even give up his name. So she is still called Kawakami.

In Kobe there are crèches where poor mothers may leave their babies for the day, as they go to work early in the morning. At a crèche where the very poorest of the poor children are cared for, Hiro Kawakami is in charge.

She writes, "I was lonely—no mother, no father, no sister, no brother, kind Captain Bickel gone, and now my husband taken. Had God indeed forsaken me? Could I have no one to love, no one to love me? Then in the darkness of my loneliness and sorrow I remembered that kind friends had been given me all my life, that even in this last sorrow and disappointment there were those who cared for me, who thought for me. God gave me this place to work. The children are the poorest of the poor but in their heart and spirit they are just as sweet and loving as are the children of the rich and prosperous. They look up into my face with a welcoming, loving smile; they wait for my coming; they love me. I will take this work that God is giving me and with his help, I will do my best for these poor children so long as I have the opportunity."

Thus the uncut gem, picked out of the mud years ago by good Captain Bickel, is shining for Jesus now, and like a magnet is drawing to herself and to Christ hundreds of little gems to sparkle in his coronet.—Gen. Board of Promotion.

The New Contest

"LITTLE Miss Centipede

And at Shoofly and Company's
Made her first stop.
Mr. Shoofly came forward
All becoming and gay:
'And what can I do for you

He showed her a seat;
But the poor clerks turned pale
When she put out her feet.
'How many?' they faltered.
'As many as these,'
She replied very sweetly,
'And hurry up, please.'"
(—By Amos and Ann and Journeying Man!)

Dear Young Reserves,

You haven't forgotten that there is a summer contest for us this year, have you? The prizes are sitting tied up in attractive bundles just waiting for the successful boy and the successful girl who submit the best story on Japan, according to the simple rules laid down in the Chimney Corner for July 7. Already one story has come in, and it evidently is going to interest a lot of you, for here are some letters which say so:

"Dear Miss Applegarth,

Although I am only ten I want to enter that new story contest. Mother says it won't be hard because there will be a lot of new books on Japan this year since everybody will be studying them. Can you tell me what some of these books are, if you please. I liked My Lord Bag O' Rice in this week's issue. You give us lots of nice things to sharpen our wits on don't you? I'm your new little friend.,

Stasia Sidney Cather, Albany, N. Y.

"Dear Miss Applegarth,

I don't know anything about Japan except that it's islands and the Japs wear kimonos. My Sunday-school teacher thinks the Japanese contest will be lovely. As I am secretary of the class she asked me to write you where we can find aid. Maybe we will all compete although some of the girls go away, and I am at my grandmother's farm in Canada all summer. But you'll hear from us later, I think.

Very truly your loving friend,
Susie Mercer, Montreal.

In answer to Susie's question and Stasia's, too, let me give you this list of books which are in the juvenile section of all public libraries:

"Ame' Sau in Japan."

"The Japanese Twins." (Perkins.)

Many books of Japanese fairy stories can always be found, as well as "Things Japanese" by Basil Chamberlain. This books is for older people, but it gives a great many interesting customs which will help you.

Then there is a new junior story book called "The Honorable Japanese Fan," which you will be studying in your Crusader and Junior B. Y. P. U. this winter. The author (whom I know very, very personally!!) has told some facts about a brother and sister called Rough River and Miss Open Sea, not to mention the baby Bo Chan. There are two dozen pictures of these polite young Japanese, and since you can buy it for only forty cents perhaps you would like to order a copy from Literature Department, General Board of Promotion, 276 Fifth Ave., New York.

Please, oh please, Susie and all the rest of you, don't call the Japanese "Japs," it lacks the beautiful dignity which is their due for being such polite and artistic people; as one Japanese girl once said to an American: "Maybe I call you just 'Can' instead American, all the same to you? No?"

Here are two more letters:

"Dear Miss Applegarth,

What do you suppose? Well it's this—I told your story 'Mother Of Pearl' in school when we had our closing exercise and everybodys' mother was there. Nobody else was a Baptist, so they do not see the Chimney Corner, and they liked the story ever so well. They laughed in all the right places. Now that I am fifteen I am supposed to take a class in Sunday school. Do you think that I am honestly old enough? I often wonder how old you are. Sometimes you sound as if you were just my age. If you ever come to Chicago let me know so I can see you. I am reading 'Freckles,' have you read it? I have also read 'Oliver Twist' and 'Vanity Fair' this year. I did not like them very much. 'Vanity Fair' had people who don't really exist now I guess. Am I too old for the new contest now that I am fourteen?

"With kind regards,
"Elsie Snyder, Chicago."

"Dear Chimney Corner,

I want to write when I grow up, so the only thing to do is to begin by writing to you. I read all your stories, and maybe some day I will do one well enough to print. Will you? I am nine. I am in Maine visiting my aunt, two uncles, a cousin and two second cousins. I like relatives. They keep a horse and two carriages. One is just a wagon for hay, etc. I like it better than the other, for the hay smells nice. We do not have hay in the city. Maine is very pretty all over. We drive over to the sea in the good carriage. I hope you are well.

"Very lovingly,
"Shirley Thorne, Portland, Me."

Topic for August 12

WHAT CAN BE DONE TOWARD ABOLISHING POVERTY
Luke 16:19-30

What a tremendous question! People are just as insistent in the asking of it as they have been for hundreds of years. In answer to the question those who are in better circumstances are wont to reply "For the poor ye have always with you."

If poverty is to be abolished, something more than the surface will have to be scratched. Deep-rooted economic evils will have to be uprooted. Unfair competition outlawed. The power of the whiskey interests forever broken. Human selfishness will have to be overcome. If the young people of today who are responsible for the activities of the church of today as well as of tomorrow are going to answer adequately the question there are a number of things which will have to be done.

1. Adequate study: One great reason why there is such a meager effort for the abolition of poverty is because the folks who live on Main Street are scarcely ever touched by the infirmities of the weak who live on Siding Street. The folks from Main Street never visit their way and certainly the folks from Siding Street never make their appearance in the homes of the better class, except possibly as subordinates and oftentimes in the most menial labor. They receive their pay such as it is and go back to their dens. This is not an overdrawn picture. It can be found in nearly every town of ordinary size and in the great city areas where human beings have to live like lower animals.

2. A program: In addition to accurate knowledge there must be a program commensurate with the needs as mentioned above. Simply to say that various social agencies will take care is not sufficient. Jesus Christ never intended his church to do his work by proxy. The greatest element in all relief work is that of human personality. But not only must the immediate need be met. The program will call for measures of prevention as well.

3. A passion: It is very easy even in religion to forget how far we have come and what we might have been had it not been for the grace of God. Persons who are going out to assist in answering the question of abolishing poverty must have that same love which sent the Master to the cross. The service is in behalf of his little ones. To be sure, such work will not call forth headlines in the daily press, but it will call forth the commendation of One who lived among us, and who loved us, and who gave himself for us.

Convention Impressions

This convention has meant a lot to me. When I attended the Friday night session I was not saved, but was a backslider. After the meeting different delegates met at the Common and had a song service. I joined in with them too, and after the service I was determined to live for Christ again, and I'm still going on, thanks to the Convention.—Leo. C. Sabella.

Could only attend the Sunday services but the little Hopi Indians of my mission in Arizona will have what I got today.—Dorothy Humes.

Human intellect cannot estimate the power of God working in such a body as was represented in this convention. We can only catch the torch of our heavenly Father and bear it on.—C. B. Chapman.

Whether democracy be safe for America, or America be safe for democracy, or both, of this I am persuaded, that with all these hundreds of America's best youth consecrating themselves to Christian service, there is hope for the world.—Henry F. Widen.

As to those who received the loaves beside the sea,
So has this great convention been to me.
—Chas. H. Hesburn.

This convention has meant a great deal to me. I am not a church member, but I have resolved to dedicate my life to Jesus.—Mildred Marcy.

A Baptist convention that can compel the attendance at every session of an Epworth Leaguer must of a truth be inspired of God. . . . I have been strengthened in every way and thank God for Christian fellowship that has made this possible.—Gladys Vogt.

The convention has been the means of showing me that I can never grow old and has made the "attractive Christ" more attractive.—Joseph Westcott.

My son, who was twenty-one on July 5, opened his manhood years with you in the convention and speaks to you in my stead after forty years of service, most of it with young people.—C. S. Cregar.

What will you do when every support is taken away? Then we will cling to Christ for salvation. I will. Will you? This convention has helped me to think more of God.—M. G. Linn.

With inspiration came determination. I intend to use my talents, such as they are, for Christ, knowing that he from whom I receive them will help me and increase them to their full capacity.—Vera M. Timlin.

Spiritual realization that stewardship of my life will be controlled by Christ.—P. Walker.

This convention has fed my soul with the bread of life, thus giving me strength to go and labor in the vineyards of my Lord.—Marion V. Peterson.

This is my first convention and has meant much to me in many ways. I have resolved to go home to my own society and live and tell them about the "attractive Christ" as I have caught a newer and clearer vision of my Christ.

The convention brought me to the highest point of my spiritual joy and aspirations.—Lloyd Pobst.

Last summer I attended the Y. M. C. A. conference at Lake Geneva, Wis., and thought that I would never find such a Christ-like atmosphere again, but I am glad to say that I have just found one, and right at home at that.—Richard Knawles.

This convention has helped me to want to be a better servant for my Lord. —Louise MacMullen.

I realize more than ever before the great need of loyalty to our Christ by each member of our B. Y. P. U.'s in America.—Matie Halbrook.

Burma

By J. Herbert Cope

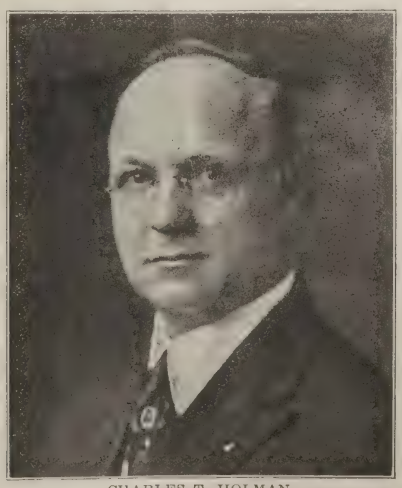
In a disagreement with the educational authorities, there sprung up all over Burma a few years ago a number of independent schools which adopted the name national and refused government supervision and aid. A college was made the crown of the system. When the first enthusiasm had worn off, the schools had hard sledding financially and many were forced to close. Then negotiations were opened with the educational department with the result they are to be allowed to receive government aid on condition that they submit to inspection. It was a pill, but some of them have already swallowed it and will thus be able to carry on. There are about 100 of these schools remaining. But the intention is to continue the college independently, probably because they see no possibility of bringing it up to educational requirements. With these new schools added to the educational system, education is more and more being placed under authorities other than government. There are now twice as many Anglo-vernacular high schools in the province under mission control as under government supervision.

Those who attended the summer assembly at Maymyo are more enthusiastic than ever. It was a great time. The idea was to make it as much like assemblies at home as possible, not to ape America, but to take advantage of experience. Thus the day began with devotional classes at seven in the morning, followed by Bible classes in various languages. After breakfast came conferences on various forms of work such as Sunday schools and young people's societies. At two-thirty all work ceased and the afternoons were spent in sports and recreations. Two days or rather afternoons were spent on side trips. There were platform meetings in the evenings which this year were of a devotional nature. The leaders who attend these conferences come back enthusiastic.

At the same time, Judson College is following the example set by the colleges and universities at home. The members of the faculty hold a summer camp during the vacation which is attended by perhaps thirty students, some of whom are non-Christian. Although the spiritual tone of the camp this year does not seem to have been equal to that of last year, it was a helpful time.

When the cuts in appropriations came, the idea of reopening Hsipaw station had to be abandoned. This is one of the most difficult in Burma from a health standpoint. But voluntary contributions were made by various friends and it is now possible to carry on the work with a Burman worker and his devoted wife. It is a hard field; the Shan is not easily won. But there are entirely too few workers in that great area known as the Shan Federated States.

Last night's mail brought the Burman report for 1922. It is the best the mission has put out. Send immediately to New York for it. You will learn a lot about the Burman mission.



One missionary writes that he has travelled in his Ford 2,500 miles in three months. He could hardly have done that in three years by oxomobile. A motor is more needed by the present day missionary than the pastor at home. Where the roads are good everyone ought to have one.

Dr. Holman Assumes New Duties

On July 1, Rev. Charles T. Holman pastor of the Normal Park Church, Chicago, joined the faculty of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago as assistant professor of pastoral duties and extension secretary. His appointment is in line with the recent development of the divinity school's policy of furnishing large opportunity for practical training. Prof. J. M. Artman, director of vocational training, has had oversight of students who are engaged in religious work, and Professor Holman will share in this important work. He will also visit churches, especially those whose pastors are former students of the divinity school, for the purpose of rendering help as may be desired. Mr. Holman will organize institutes and conferences, visit colleges and conventions, and give counsel to pastorless churches. In general, he will seek to act in accordance with the resolution adopted in 1922 by the Illinois Convention looking toward a "closer fellowship between the Divinity School of the University of Chicago and the Baptist churches of Illinois."

In addition to this work in the field, Professor Holman will hold classes, thus bringing to the divinity school students the sense of the real workings of the churches and the needs of the field.

Professor Holman's success as pastor of the Normal Park Church and as one of the leaders of the Baptist Ministers' Conference of Chicago, warrants that his work will be of great service not only to the divinity school but to the community at large.

The Story of One Christian Home

A Tribute to Edgar V. Gage by His Son, Albert H. Gage

Seventy-seven years ago a boy was born in a farmer home in the hills of Otsego County, New York. It was soon evident that he was handicapped. He was not so strong as his brothers and sisters, and when he started to school he had frequent attacks of severe headache. Probably he needed glasses, but they did not think of such things in those days. To his great disappointment he could not go to school beyond the little red district school of his neighborhood. He had a secret longing to be a minister, but knew that this was impossible. So he worked on the farm. There was another handicap to his secret ambition. He stammered.

When he was thirteen years old he was converted and joined the Baptist church. Every convert was expected to testify. He believed it his duty to bear witness; so he tried. Sometimes he would stand up to give his testimony and not be able to say a word, but he soon discovered a wonderful thing. Though he could not talk with men, he could talk with God; for when he prayed, his tongue was unloosed. Because he was denied the privilege of talking easily with men, he learned to talk with God. When he would try to give a testimony and could not, he would kneel and pour out his heart to God in prayer. Thus he developed a marvelous prayer life. He was asked frequently to pray in public, at funerals, at associations and in community gatherings. When he rose and shut his eyes, he was in the presence of his Father to whom he talked as lovingly and simply as a child. His own brother became a professor in Cornell University, and in later years said: "I would rather hear him pray than any man I have ever heard. It makes me feel that our heavenly Father is very real to hear his appeals, his confidence and trust."

When he was twenty-four he met and married a beautiful Christian girl in his own church. Together they started a Christian home around the open Bible. The children came; five strong, healthy little ones. When Sunday came they took turns about in going to church. Then a terrible scourge of diphtheria passed through that community and when it had passed the home was empty. No more the song and laughter of little voices. In one brief month all the children had gone to be with their Saviour. These good Christians did not lose their faith nor cease their prayer life. A great revival broke out in the schoolhouse. Religion and the winning of others to Christ became their solace. In direct answer to prayer, as they firmly believed, God gave them the promise of another little one. At the fulfillment their joy was doubled for there was a boy and a girl, twins. The proud father said, "God always answers better than we ask."

The boy went to district school and later to high school. His father was his closest chum and friend. They talked and planned for college almost from the boy's earliest remembrance. Each Sunday found them in God's house for worship and for Sunday school. Every day at the family altar the mother read from the Bible and the father prayed for their church and for their pastor, for more ministers and missionaries and for the extension of Christ's kingdom in earth's uttermost bounds. The boy graduated from high school at the age of seventeen. One day soon after, he told his father as they were doing chores in the barn that he had heard God call him into the Christian ministry. The father said: "I am not surprised. I want to tell you something that I never told any one before. I wanted to be a minister, but I knew I could not with my old stammering tongue. I hoped that one of your older brothers would, but God took them. I gave you to the Lord before you were born, and there has not been a day since that I have not prayed that God would call you to serve him."

The boy went to college and to theological seminary. The memory of his home and the prayers of his parents followed him and helped him. In the spring term of his senior year in the seminary there came the call of need in the foreign field. He became a Student Volunteer and applied to the Foreign Board and was accepted as a missionary to Southern India. His father and mother gave him their blessing and approval. He went to his boyhood church to be ordained. His father, though he was only a layman in the church, was asked to give the ordaining prayer. This is his prayer as he laid his hands upon the lad's head:

O God, thou didst have but one Son.
Thou didst give him to be our Saviour.
We give to Thee this, our only son.
Take him, send him anywhere thou wilt,
Only make him a winner of souls.
Oh, make him a winner of many, many precious souls.

The lad's way was blocked to the foreign field. He became a pastor in the homeland. When the father had reached his seventieth birthday he wrote this letter to his preacher boy:

"We do pray for you that you may be the means in God's hands of winning many souls for him. You and your work have been on my mind a good deal the past week. God has been good to me to let me live the threescore and ten years. I feel that God is letting me live to pray for the upbuilding of his cause and for our dear ones that they may be soul-winners for Christ. I want to be more faithful in his cause as the days go by. I wake up in the night and pray for you. God does hear all true prayers and gives answers of peace and love.

"We went to church and Sunday school today. The pastor preached a good sermon.

"How I would like to be with you for a few days to help in those extra meetings. Well, if we cannot be there in body we can in spirit. We do love you all very much.

"Good-bye.

From your loving father."

I am a minister of Jesus Christ because that man is my father.

Robert Stuart MacArthur

An Appreciation

By W. Scott

I wish to lay a red rose on the grave of Robert Stuart MacArthur. The rose is a symbol of affection; the red rose, of warm affection.

Fifty-six years ago I first met Doctor MacArthur. He was then a student at Rochester Theological Seminary and I a senior at Union College. He chanced to be passing through Schenectady, stopped over to visit the college, and it fell to me to show him about the buildings and grounds. Union College was well worth a visit. Its location was admirable, its landed property ample and its buildings, though plain, had been laid out by the French landscape architect who planned the city of Washington. Prior to the Civil War it was in the first rank of American colleges. At one time its faculty had Eliphalet Nott, Francis Wayland, Alonzo Potter and other men of great ability. The college garden was one of the celebrated gardens of the country.

I have no distinct recollection of this meeting but it must have been agreeable for the same year returning from a visit to Michigan University I was the guest of Doctor MacArthur for a night. When the time for retiring came, he took up his Bible and led in the evening's devotion. I do not recall his reading or prayer, but I have never forgotten the incident. I had roomed with a number of students during my college course but neither any of them nor myself ever offered to conduct evening worship. The only person I knew who had done that was my mother who led in family worship at home.

Doctor MacArthur was at that time a tall and well proportioned young man, graceful and quick in his movements. His face was manly and animated; his manner courteous. He was several years my senior and perhaps I always had toward him some of that feeling which a freshman has towards seniors, but on his part there was no assumption of superiority. His voice was musical and flexible; it seemed to have a quality I have noticed among some Scottish preachers, like that of the wind as it sounds through the glen—a quality that lends itself to pathos, humor, sympathy, characteristic of the Barnabas type of preachers, sons of consolation. I thought it also had a quality like the pipes without their monotony, a far-reaching, penetrating, quality which enabled its possessor easily to address large assemblages. I refer to his voice because while not the only valuable possession of a public speaker or preacher, combined with other things, is an element of power.

I was in New York on the first Sunday of Doctor MacArthur's settlement at Calvary Church on Twenty-third Street. Two of his predecessors, Doctors Gillette and Buckland, it was my privilege to know. They were older men but men of unusual ability, devotion and social charm. There were also men in Calvary Church who would have been conspicuous anywhere for their intelli to give to his character, naturally buoy- There were also women similarly gifted These all rallied around the new pastor and he was supported during a long and useful ministry by a loyal church. Of this pastorate others better qualified than I, will doubtless speak. A long pastorate, like a long life, has its ups and downs, its lights and shadows, its joys and difficulties, its houses of mourning and of feasting. Through all these Doctor MacArthur bore himself well as a good minister of Jesus Christ but I have often thought that since he bore pastoral as well as private and personal burdens, he carried far more than the average burdens of life. All this seemed to give to his character, naturally buoyant and radiant, a certain touch of seriousness and affected his attitude toward life as a whole. This kept him from abnormal ambitions to which so capable a man might be exposed and helped to ripen him as preeminently a shepherd and bishop of souls.

Perhaps a few words as to Doctor MacArthur's qualifications as a public speaker, preacher and pastor may be in place. He was an economist of time. He had a facility for despatching business in committee work, a quickness of decision like that of an efficient head of a department store or a railroad traffic manager. This trait made him methodical in the distribution of his time. It prevented much of the waste of time too liable in the variety of calls by a pastor especially at a great center. It increased also his skill in economy of time in his studies, occasional addresses, lectures and sermons as well as in personal interviews. Beside, it lessened or prevented the appearance of a hurried habit which impairs the manner of not a few men in the pastorate and other fields. Some men give one the impression they are busy, and have no time at their disposal, while they have really all the time there is. This is sometimes called "Americanitis" but it is not limited to this country.

Doctor MacArthur's printed sermons and other publications I am not familiar with and must leave to others to estimate their value. However my appreciation of him on the platform and in the pulpit may have some interest to others. His literary style owes something to Macaulay of whom he was an admirer in early manhood and possibly to some extent followed as a model as Franklin did "The Spectator." He had also a trace of the condensed epigrammatic style of Emerson, and did not seem to cultivate the Saxon style of Bunyan, Lincoln, Bright, Spurgeon, but I speak only in a general way. How he may rank among the English speakers and preachers of the past century as a sermonizer I am not competent to judge; but I have heard him preach great sermons. On more than one occasion I have heard him preach on city missions with an impressiveness, power and understanding worthy of a Christian statesman who realized the normal function of the city in civilization and the perils which in various ways make their nest and breeding place in colossal cities. This leads me to say that he seemed more interested in the practical, motor aspects of religion than in theological, philosophical, or scientific issues with which religion has more or less to do. Here again one may fail to render justice to his eminent pulpit service for it was many sided, popular, enriched with study, sympathetic and pastoral. I have been also not a little interested in noting his rare power on the lecture platform. He gave a lecture course in Baltimore less than ten years ago on American history which he had given formerly at Chautauquas. The lectures revealed careful historical study, remarkable memory, fluency of speech, power of graphic statement, surprising physical energy. I have thought age seemed in no way to lessen his powers of public speech. This leads me also to add that I think his great power was not a simple or single quality but a complex or combination of qualities. I think of him as a radiant personality, variously and richly endowed, animated by a high lifelong motive. I, therefore, call him a shepherd and bishop of souls, and there leave it.

A word as to his genius for friendship. If you met him personally and took his hand, he for the time belonged to you. We meet persons at a reception who take our hand, and gently pass us on as much as to say—"Well, I am done with you," and you, feeling a twinge of original sin, reciprocate the unspoken thought. Not so with Doctor MacArthur. Time or separation seemed powerless to bury or lessen his friendship once formed. I have known some others who had this trait as did Rauschenbusch, one of the best interpreters of social Christianity.

It is not my aim nor am I able to estimate Doctor MacArthur's life as a whole or even to set forth the life plan which he followed. Very naturally he became the president of the Baptist World Alliance. He had broad Christian sympathies and was strongly attached to Baptist people in all lands. He served in the extensive field of a metropolitan pastorate. He never sought to found institutions or detract from the value of the existing agencies of the denomination which had been founded in prayer, sacrifice and labor. While he befriended many men who had some special religious service to render, his church was a generous and constant supporter of the great denominational enterprises at home and abroad.

There is an element that went into the building of his character on which I cannot speak. Doctor Calvert has touched this potent influence when he mentions Doctor MacArthur's early and later home. Here I may not enter. Every man who knows the worth of home can appreciate its significance. Doctor MacArthur was an inspirer of strong men, a defence to the weak, a consolation to the troubled, a benediction to multitudes.

MASSACHUSETTS

THE RESIGNATION OF Dr. P. H. McDowell from the pastorate of the First Church, Melrose, to accept the call of the church at Glens Falls, N. Y., comes as a surprise. Doctor McDowell has made a strong nine years' record at Melrose, broadening the activities of the church, and organizing them. He has been a recognized force in the city, and his going is an occasion of general regret. Among the ministers, he has fully mingled in their fellowship, and will be missed in conference and council. This leaves a vacancy in one of the strongest and most attractive churches in the suburbs of Boston, and New York wins a devoted and achieving minister.

THE FIRST CHURCH, New Bedford, has been celebrating its one hundred and tenth anniversary. Dr. H. B. Williams, the pastor, made the occasion one that did honor and justice to the past, and looked with hope and purpose into the future. The history was prepared and read by Miss Isabel Horr. She wrote a terse and graphic story, giving at the outset the names of "the intrepid little company that founded the church in June, 1813." Miss Horr's mention of the roster of ministers from the organization of the church to the present was discriminating and informing. It is a church with an interesting and progressive record, and one that has kept pace with the growing city, having a present membership of nearly 600. Doctor Williams confidently works toward larger things, and his people are happily cooperating. President Horr of Newton was the anniversary preacher and gave a sermon of marked timeliness, strength, and spiritual insight.

THE RUGGLES STREET DIFFICULTY is on the way to solution, but it is not yet clear what it will be. It is a difficulty wholly without friction or suspicion on either side. Under the will of Daniel S. Ford there are things in the way of legal control that the social union must do; it is an obligation. There are other things which changing conditions might make desirable, that they cannot do. Probably it is in the things that the trustees of the social union may do that some solution may be found. Doctor Ross, the pastor, has thoroughly studied the problem and has given out his printed statement, at the close of which he asked that his resignation be accepted, to take effect the last of September. The church refused to accept the resignation and asked a further consideration of the matter for two weeks. In recognition of the importance of the whole subject, Doctor Ross agreed to that. It would be a happy issue if the present leadership might be continued.

THE CORNERSTONE of the new Colonial meeting house for the church at Weston was laid with appropriate ceremonies on the afternoon of July 15. Dr. Joseph E. Perry, the pastor, made the occasion memorable. Now the superstructure will go forward with expedition, and a worthy people will soon be happy in a worthy house.

DR. ELISHA M. LAKE is acceptably ministering to the church at Roslindale, during the prolonged illness of Pastor Blakeslee. He reports good congregations.

CONNECTICUT

REV. J. HAVERGAL SHEPPARD, pastor of the Deep River Church, takes up his new work as pastor of the Mantua Church, Philadelphia, Sept. 1. Mr. Sheppard has made a place for himself in the life of the community and is in demand as a speaker by various organizations.

THE SECOND ANNIVERSARY of the pastorate of Rev. D. A. Pitt of the Central Church, Norwich, was recently celebrated. Since the beginning of the pastorate of Mr. Pitt, 114 persons have been added to the membership. He was presented with a car by the congregation. Mr. Pitt plans to attend Union Theological Seminary during the summer. The following ministers will supply the pulpit during his absence: Revs. Frank W. Pattison, Clarence M. Gallup, Peter C. Wright, J. N. Lackey and E. S. Holloway.

VERMONT

IN FEBRUARY THE NORTH TROY CHURCH suffered a severe blow through a disastrous fire which badly damaged the church building. However, the insurance together with the generous gifts of friends, have made it possible to repair the damage and make some alterations in the church auditorium. The church is especially indebted to the First Church of Newport for the gift of a pulpit set, and to the Blair Veneer Company of North Troy for the donation of pews for the auditorium. The opening and rededicatory service was held on June 3 and was conducted by the pastor, Rev. C. E. Gould. With the building again ready for service, the church faces the future with courage and hope.

ON JULY 27 THE ENOSBURG FALLS CHURCH celebrated its centenary. The pastor, Rev. W. W. White, arranged an interesting program in which pastors of the churches at Richford, Montgomery Center and St. Albans were present and made theri contributions to the service. Dr. W. A. Davison delivered an address on "The Church, Its Organization and Obligation to the Community."

THE RUTLAND CHURCH, Rev. George W. Peck, Jr., pastor, has sustained a loss in the death of Mr. Walter R. Kinsman, who was for many years a faithful and efficient member. Mr. Kinsman was clerk of the church and one of the trustees. He was also a trustee of the state convention for more than thirteen years. At the time of his death he was vice-president of the Baxter National Bank in the city of Rutland and president of the Rutland Rotary Club. He was formerly president of the state Christian Endeavor Society. His funeral was held July 15, Rev. G. W. Peck officiated, assisted by Dr. W. A. Davison.

REV. ELBERT J. SMITH closed his work as pastor of the Fair Haven and Hydeville churches on July 8. Mr. Smith has accepted a call as pastor of the First Church of Iowa City and as university pastor for the state university.

THE POWNAL BAPTIST and North Pownal Congregational churches recently extended a unanimous call to Rev. C. E. Van Schaick of Elizabethtown, N. Y., to become pastor of both churches. Mr. Van Schaick is already at work on these fields. He was formerly a colporter in the state and also pastor of the Pownal and Fairfax churches.

REV. L. T. REED recently tendered his resignation as pastor of the Poultney Church and will close his work Sept. 1 in order to take up work with the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. Reed's headquarters will be at Syracuse, N. Y.

REV. CHRISTIAN PETERSON, pastor of the Windsor Church, tendered his resignation, effective Aug. 1, when he will become chaplain of the state prison at Windsor.

THE IRA CHURCH, Rev. W. G. Cooper, pastor, recently received two members by baptism.

REV. H. R. GOODCHILD recently closed his work as pastor of the Community Church at Montgomery Center, after two years of service and moved to Springfield, Mass. Rev. A. Ritchie Lowe of Nyack, N. Y., accepted the unanimous call of the Montgomery Church and is at work on the field.

AMONG THE SPEAKERS already secured for the ministers' and missionaries' conference and school of methods, which is to be held at Vermont Academy, Saxtons River, Sept. 4-6, are Rev. J. J. Ross, Rev. Alvah S. Hobart, Rev. W. H. Bowler, and Miss Elsie Kappan of the General Board of Promotion. Every pastor should plan to be present and bring his wife who will be entertained by the convention.

IT IS HOPED THAT MANY CHURCHES and every association will be represented at the New England evangelistic conference which is to be held in Tremont Temple, Boston, Sept. 9-12. An unusual program has been arranged. This conference follows evangelism Sunday, when every pastor in New England will be asked to preach on evangelism.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

THE PROPERTY OF THE HINSDALE CHURCH, including both the meeting house and parsonage, was sold July 6. The convention had reversionary right in this property and the proceeds will go to the permanent fund of the state convention and will be known as the Hinsdale General Fund. The sale of the property seemed unavoidable as the local membership had become reduced to four members. The mortgage was paid off at the time of the sale. The convention held in trust $500 for the church and this, by terms of the original donor, will become a part of the state convention fund. The site upon which the church now stands will probably be used for a public library. Parties purchasing the property will present it to the town of Hinsdale and it is expected that the town will appropriate money for the erection of a library building. This means that the church edifice will be razed.

THE AMHERST CHURCH is feeling the stimulus of the ministry of Rev. G. F. Sibley. Three persons were recently baptized.

SUMMER PREACHING FOR SMALL RURAL churches has been more extensively arranged for the present season than ever before. This has been made possible because of the willingness of some of the pastors to extend their ministry during the summer months.

REV. W. A. PAIGE, pastor at Claremont for six years, has resigned. He will probably spend a year in Franklin before accepting another pastorate, although he will be available for supply work. Mr. Paige is a member of the board of trustees of the state convention.

THE PASTOR AT MILTON MILLS, Rev. H. Whitcomb, was recently given a $200 increase in salary.

ALMOST 100 CHILDREN have registered at the vacation school at the First Church, Manchester, Rev. C. P. MacGregor, pastor. There is promise of as successful a school this year as a year ago.

THE PEOPLES' CHURCH of Manchester, Rev. H. R. Whitelock, pastor, has opened a vacation school with a large registration. There will be a school exhibition at the close of the summer session the first Sunday in August. Mr. and Mrs. Whitelock

The first baptism among the Swedes of America. The scene is the Mississippi river at Rock Island and the minister is Rev. Gustav Palmquist, the well-known Baptist pioneer of Sweden and of this country among the Swedish people. Mr. Palmquist is baptizing the father of Dr. Frank Peterson, of Minneapolis, who, in the picture, is the little boy looking on. The incident took place seventy years ago. The original painting, by Rev. Reynold Lund of Port Arthur, Can., has been sent to Stockholm for exhibit during the jubilee and the congress.

will spend their vacation in New Hampshire and Maine touring in the automobile presented to Mr. Whitelock by the church. He will hold open air preaching services along the way. The last two weeks in August Mr. Whitelock will spend in Brooklyn, N. Y., and, with an automobile furnished by one of the city churches, will hold open air services in that city.

THE LAKE AVENUE CHURCH, ROCHESTER, has a radio broadcasting station where the services are sent out from time to time. While the instrument is owned by the church, the broadcasting is done through the courtesy of the Hickson Electric Company. The station is WABO.

SOME TIME AGO THE BAPTIST printed a request from Rev. H. Wyse Jones, director of evangelism, for a Ford sedan and a tent. Mr. Jones writes that several checks have been received and that others have been promised. The Glens Falls Sunday-school pledged $57. However, Mr. Jones urges haste in making remittances as the tent cannot be used in cold weather and the Ford is needed immediately. This is an urgent need and it is hoped all who can will respond.

THE SUMMER CONFERENCE will meet at Keuka Park, Aug. 20-26. Registration should be made as soon as possible. Some of the teachers are Dr. Milton G. Evans who will conduct a Bible class in the gospel of Mark; Rev. C. A. Nichols of Burma and Mrs. G. Howard Estey who will have a class in missions; Rev. F. W. Tomlinson who will have a course on the rural church; Rev. S. L. Roberts and Mrs. F. W. Tomlinson who will conduct a class on religious education; and Rev. George A. Briggs who will lecture on pastoral experience. A course on stewardship and tithing will be taught by Benjamin Starr. Miss Vivian Beard of Parkersburg, W. Va., will conduct a daily vacation Bible school for the children. There will be special features for pastor's wives. The low rate of $5.00 will be charged for room and board during the conference, thus making it possible for every pastor and his family to attend. Send registrations to Dr. A. H. Norton, Keuka Park.

NEW JERSEY

ON JULY 6, THE ELDER DAUGHTER of Rev. and Mrs. W. P. Chase of Livingston was killed in an auto accident near Red Bank. The family has the sympathy of many friends in their bereavement. Funeral services were held from the First Church, Red Bank, and were conducted by Rev. William E. Braisted and Rev. A. H. Sutphin of New Monmouth.

A COUNCIL WAS CALLED JUNE 26 at the First Church, Camden, to examine Leonard J. Fox Ruttan, a member of Grace Church. Thirty-three delegates, representing seventeen churches, were present. The ordination took place July 6. Dr. Milton G. Evans delivered the sermon.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

REV. E. C. HOUCK died June 27. Mr. Houck was a Civil War veteran and was nearly ninety years old. He held pastorates at Picture Rocks, Milesburg, Westover and Brisbin. Mr. Houck was a member of the Westover Church and the funeral services were conducted by its pastor, Rev. J. A. Metzger. Other ministers who assisted were Revs. E. J. Radcliffe of Bloomsburg, N. T. Lewis of Ansonville, and Mr. Cooke.

Summer Assembly

The summer assembly was held at Ridgeview Park, July 9-16. There were 285 delegates present from fifty-six churches in six associations. Dr. James S. Braker, pastor of the First Church, McKeesport, was dean. Rev. Frank W. Stanton of Knoxville Church, Pittsburgh, was chaplain. One of the first actions of the assembly was to exchange greetings with Virginia Baptists in their assembly at Virginia Beach.

Some of the speakers were Dr. I. G. Mathews, Mrs. Elizabeth M. Finn, Miss Elsie Oberg, Dr. William G. Russell, Miss Margaret Holley, Rev. Douglas Haring, and Dr. Raymond M. West. Rev. J. S. Brownlee of the Reynoldsville Church preached on Sunday morning. His subject was "Jesus Advanced." Rev. Havard Griffith of Monongahela spoke in the evening.

There were forty decisions for definite service in the B. Y. P. U.; twenty-nine to teach Bible class; sixty-nine for soul-winning; forty-three for kingdom work; one for the ministry; six for foreign missions and fifteen for other definite Christian service. A tentative state B. Y. P. U. organization was formed.

The Re-Making of Human Nature

If we could but answer these questions we should be in a position to test and evaluate our materials, our methods, and our results in the teaching process.

This leads us at once to the heart of the problem. If it is our hope to improve society, then our education must be such as to lead each pupil to reflect upon, and to seek to change the world in which he is living, the real world of his every-day experience, the world in which he finds his every-day relationships to parents, brothers and sisters, schoolmates and playmates. Our education must seek to make God a real fact in every part of this experience, a reality not only to be reckoned with but also to be cooperated with and helped by—not only a fact of experience, but a potent factor in the attainment of satisfaction in living. And if we are convinced that certain attitudes and responses which children make to this world of their experiences result only in making their own and others' lives miserable, then our education must set itself to the cultivation of other attitudes anad responses and habits which lead to the opposite result.

This leads us, then, to the study of the motives from which children act to a study of the strains and problems of childhood, the instincts and desires which now control conduct, and to a study of the processes by means of which these motive forces may be transformed into others. We are concerned, in other words, with nothing less than the making and remaking of human nature, as Professor Hocking has put it, with nothing less than the transformation of instinct and the supplying of powerful new motives.—Benjamin S. Cinchester in "Week-Day Religious Education," Doran.

Our Book Shelf

America and the World Liquor Problem, by Earnest Hurst Cherrington. Westerville, Ohio: American Issue Press.

This volume shows the progress of prohibition under the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law which gives the amendment its edge. Statistical features are not overlooked but are not as full as would be desirable. The book is written largely to commend prohibition to foreign countries by showing its success and beneficence in our own country. Friends of and workers in the cause will find it a most convenient reference book on the prohibition problem, and to foreign workers in the cause it will be a vital help.

A Short History of Our Religion, by D. C. Somerville. New York: MacMillan.

The author enters this great field with the conviction that the Bible teachings of the past have been too much occupied with political, biographical and geographical details. He contends that the one thing that makes Bible history worth studying is the religious history which it reveals and explains.

It is not the aim of the author to sustitute any thing for the Bible itself in the teaching of religion but to present a single line of historical development that gives the proper place to Christianity. Part one deals with the Hebrew religion, out of which Christianity grew, covering the last thirteen centuries before Christ. Part two deals with the foundations of Christianity and its development as a "rebel" religion within the Roman Empire to the end of the fourteenth century. Part three contains the history of the western church from Augustine down to and including the Reformation. Part four gives the outline of the development of the religious life and thought from the Elizabethan settlement to the present day.

Parts of the book are somewhat critical yet is it written in a very attractive manner and gives a brief and most comprehensive study of this great subject. The elaborate index and table of contents makes it a ready reference work. The author being a schoolmaster has kept in mind the needs of young people.

Christian Education and the National Consciousness in China, by James B. Webster, Ph.D., Shanghai College, China. New York: E. P. Dutton and Co. $2.50.

This book discusses issues of deep interest alike to education and religion. Not alone in western lands are supposedly settled questions being reopened, but the Orient is seething with discussion of questions political, economical, social, religious and educational. Under it all is the urge for self-expression individually and nationally. Any suggestion of inferiority is a scourge falling on bare flesh, and the Orient is tending to resent the exotic in religion and foreign control either in religion or education. In America much of long-accepted methods in education and beliefs in religion is being challenged, and our younger missionaries and teachers, for the most part, go out to their fields not unprepared to accept new views and methods as to their tasks. It is beyond dispute that the new deference to national ideas and aspirations and a broader sympathy with the native point of view is a tendency in the right direction. Doubtless, also, there may be danger of failure to conserve sufficiently the permanent values of the past. Doctor Webster seems to be in the front line of the movement for reconstruction of educational ideas both in the West and the East. He makes valuable quotations from modern educational authorities and furnishes interesting statistics and facts from his own educational experience in China. The book is one which those concerned with missionary and educational policies in that land will not wish to ignore.
